Why these salaries appear to the British "wildly extravagant"—to quote the London Economist—is apparent by a few comparisons. To earn $30,000 after taxes a Britisher would need a gross income of $400,000 in the United Kingdom. To have $17,500 left, he would need a gross income of $80,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer receives "only" $20,000 before taxes; the Permanent Secretary of the Treasury, $14,000; the chairman of the Midland Bank, $40,000. There are in all Britain only 60 subjects of His Majesty whose income equals that of Mr. White and Mr. Collado.

Czechoslovakia's Minister of Foreign Affairs receives as salary and allowances, and before taxes, only $5,600. In all Latin America there is no government official, not even a president, whose salary equals that which the American delegation at Savannah put across for the fund and bank executive directors. All this was done with the blank-check powers voted by Congress when it adopted the Bretton Woods Agreements "as is." Even when the Senate confirmed the American executive directors of fund and bank earlier this year, it made no inquiry as to the emoluments of the office. Now, though it is too late, some Senators are raising questions.

SENATORS ASK INFORMATION

In the midst of the turmoil over the expiration of the OPA, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee took off a morning to consider and confirm the nominations of Mr. Edmond M. Hanrahan to the SEC, Mr. John W. Snyder as American Governor of the World Fund and Bank, Mr. John Stam Hooker to be American alternate executive director of the bank, and Mr. George F Luthringer to be alternate executive director of the fund. Most of the meeting was given over to an examination of the qualifications of Hooker and Luthringer and the reasons for the high salaries which are being paid by fund and bank.

Eliciting from 35-year-old Mr. Hooker—he pointed out that he will be 36 on August 8—the fact that the salary of an alternate executive director is $11,500 after taxes, Senator TAFT asked the nominee: "What qualifications have you got for being appointed to such an important position, international position, at such a salary (the equivalent of $18,000 before taxes, according to TAFT)?"

Mr. Hooker: "I have worked since 1934 on these specific problems relating to the bank and have followed the work on these subjects in this Government right from that time."

Senator TAFT: "Well, you mean about 4 years ago the plan came in and started and you since then have been in the Treasury under the same gentlemen who have been appointed to the higher positions; you have been their assistant right through and now you want to move in there with this $18,000 salary. * * * Are the State Department and the Treasury Department going to fill all these big-salaried jobs out of those two departments only without going into the general field and looking for people with long experience?"

Proceeding to question Hooker of his experience in and after college, TAFT asked:

Senator TAFT: "Have you ever had any experience in the sale of securities?"

Mr. Hooker: "No, sir."

Senator TAFT: "Have you ever been a member of a firm that had the problem of marketing securities in the United States?"

Mr. Hooker: "No, sir. That will be the essential function of the staff of the bank, rather than the directors of the bank. The bank will have to hire people experienced in marketing securities. I mean the technique and the details of getting up a bond indenture, etc., the legal questions involved."

Senator TAFT: "Do you know anything about, for instance, have you had any experience that would qualify you to judge whether a water-power development, we will say, in Palestine or in Russia, is a sound proposition to be guaranteed by the bank? Are you an engineer in any way?"

Mr. Hooker: "I am not an engineer; no, sir. I have been in on all the projects submitted to the Export-Import Bank."

Senator TAFT: "You mean you have read the reports?"

Mr. Hooker: "No, sir. I have actually considered them and formulated opinions when I was in the Treasury and * * * State Department."

Senator TAFT: "Were you at the Savannah Conference?"

Mr. Hooker: "Yes."

Senator TAFT: "What was the purpose of fixing these high salaries so much higher than the general standard of Government salaries? What was the purpose of fixing them at that rate?"

Mr. Hooker: "The purpose was * * * so that they could get into the Bank, particularly the staff of the Bank, qualified people."

Senator TAFT: "Yes, it was to get better men with experience, wasn't it?"

Mr. Hooker: "Yes."

Senator TAFT: "It was not just to put a bunch of State Department and Treasury Department people into better paid jobs, was it?"

Mr. Hooker: "Well, Senator, if you have been working on the particular questions which the Bank is going to consider, or similar questions, and requests for loans—and the United States has been the only country which has had the funds in this whole period to loan out—I don't really think you would say that wasn't any experience in what the Bank is going to do."

Asked by Senator BARKLEY what salary he had earned in the State Department, Hooker replied $9,950. "What was it before July 1?" BARKLEY inquired. "Eight thousand seven hundred and fifty," said Hooker.

Senator BARKLEY: "Was it necessary to double the salary to get you to go into the Bank?"

Mr. Hooker: "Sir, I did not set the salaries in the Bank or the Fund."

Senator BARKLEY: "I know that, but you said a while ago, and I think it is to be assumed, that the high salaries were set in order to get people who might not otherwise be interested in the Bank, men of experience. I wondered if it was necessary to double the salary of the men already in the Government, with experience, in order to get them to be transferred to the Bank."

Mr. Hooker: "Senator, the primary reason, in my opinion, for the high salaries was the job of getting for the Bank a president and other high officers of the staff. * * * The salary of the president of the International Bank was set at $30,000. In order to get qualified people with experience in securities, you have got to set the salary rather high."

Senator TAFT: "It is free of taxes, though."

Mr. Hooker: "It is free of taxes. But you have got to pay them a salary which is somewhat comparable to the salaries they get in New York."

Mr. Luthringer, also, was questioned on the salary of his post. During the discussion, Senator MURDOCK of Utah commented: "It might be these salaries were fixed, anticipating we were going to get rid of price control."

TAFT questions Luthringer about his qualifications to be assistant to Mr. Harry White, the American Executive Director of the Fund. There followed this colloquy:

Senator TAFT: "What is Mr. White's salary?"

Mr. Luthringer: "$17,500 after taxes."

Senator TAFT: "How many other State Department or Treasury Department officials are moving into this Fund at these salaries, besides Mr. White and yourself?"

Mr. Luthringer: "I don't know, sir, what salaries they are paying the staff."

Senator TAFT: "There is quite a force that has moved out of the Treasury Department and State Department into the Fund at these higher salaries?"

Mr. Luthringer: "I don't know about the Treasury. From the State Department there were only three: Mr. Collado, Mr. Hooker, and myself."

Asking whether the salary scale determined at Savannah had not been practically fixed by the American delegation, Luthringer answered:

"The American position on the salaries was cleared with the NAC. As I understand, the matter was also taken up with the White House."

This caused Senator MILLIKIN, from the great mining State of Colorado, to comment: "There seems to be gold in them thar international hills."

And from TAFT: "I understood they were putting them high in order to get people from the country who had some actual experience in business, and not to move over the forces of the State and Treasury Departments at more or less double their present salaries."

CLAYTON DEFENDS APPOINTMENTS

Later, Assistant Secretary of State Will Clayton testified in support of the Department's selections and the high salaries. He endorsed Hooker and Luthringer as able men. But TAFT persisted: "What seems to me so doubtful is to move the whole staff over from the State and Treasury Departments without going out and looking for people with wide experience in the international business field, because that business field is something that gives a great deal of experience. The reason a fellow gets $25,000 to $50,000 at a bank, which incidentally if it were $50,000 would give him about $35,000 net, is that he has had experience in banking. He knows exactly how to do the things a banker has to do. With all due respect, I don't think any bankers will come over and pick out Mr. Hooker and make him the president or vice-president of a bank at a salary equivalent to $18,000 a year. But it seems to me the purpose was to enable you to get someone from the outside to go in there, not just to increase the salaries of State Department officials who might or might not get an offer from private industry."

Senator WAGNER: "I think the Government is fortunate in having Harry White to take this position."

Senator TAFT: "Oh, he would have a hard job to go out and get $30,000 a year from a bank. That is a better salary than anybody in the Government has, except the President of the United States."

STAFF, TOO, WELL PAID

Apart from the top officers of fund and bank, who rank immediately after the managing director and president of the two institutions, higher members of the staffs also are to be paid considerably more than corresponding United States Government salaries, when taxes are taken into consideration. While salary policies are reportedly still flexible, a chief of division, it appears, will receive as much as $15,000 net after taxes. Assistant division chiefs will get up to $11,000 net, and section chiefs generally up to $8,000, but in a few cases $9,000 net.

Among those who have moved from the Treasury to better-paying positions with the fund or bank are Mr. Ansel Luxford, now acting general counsel of the bank; E. M. Bernstein, now acting chief of research in the fund at a reported salary of $12,000 net; Mr. V. Frank Coe, now secretary of the fund; Mr. Irving Friedman, now working with Mr. Bernstein in the fund; Mr. Richard Brenner, now in the legal department of the fund; and several others. Mr. Orvis Schmidt, Treasury Department director of foreign funds control, is expected to join the fund shortly. Mr. Walter Loucheim of the Washington office of the SEC will probably soon get an important post on the World Bank. From the Federal Reserve Board as of this writing only Mr. Robert Triffin is at present known to be going to the fund, where he will be in charge of research on exchange-control matters. The writer has heard of no important positions in the fund and bank being awarded as yet to non-Americans or to Americans outside of Government officials.

Good Advice From Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Minneapolis Star of July 22, 1946, and also article headed "AFL's advice to labor":

GOOD ADVICE FROM LABOR

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, is doing labor and the Nation a valuable service by vigorously promoting the idea that increased real wages for workers depend upon increased production. A message from Green and an appraisal of production problems from the AFL's monthly economic review are reprinted herewith.

Leaders of the big trade union groups have at their command well-trained economic advisers. These advisers know the score on production. Had their views prevailed, labor might not have fallen into the error of pushing for 18½-cent raises before industry had finished reconversion and caught up on the most pressing of pent-up consumer demands.

The administration, of course, ignored sound economic advice just as completely by hastily shedding wage controls.

Organized labor has much to lose by pressing now for new wage increases, which could only force the inflation spiral higher. Boom-and-bust means unemployment, the loss of union members.

The CIO has suggested a new labor-management conference to work out a general wage and price formula. The idea is excellent. At the national labor-management gathering last year, the question of wages virtually was ruled out. Also too many elements were spoiling for a fight and not content to seriously settle problems over a conference table.

The costly strikes since last autumn may have cooled some of the pugilistic ardor on both sides. Auto workers, for example, will labor more than a year at their new hourly rates to recover the dollars they lost in idleness.

But America needs even more than a sober realization of the economic factors which control prices and wages. It needs a rebirth of the cooperative spirit which did so much to win the war. It needs less of the greed expressed in the idea: "Everybody else is getting his; why shouldn't I?" America needs a reawakening of its spiritual patriotism which has served so well in other times of stress.

A. F. OF L.'S ADVICE TO LABOR: "ONLY HIGHER PRODUCTIVITY CAN OPEN THE DOORS TO BETTER LIVING"

MESSAGE TO WORKERS

"The sudden ending of OPA brings a responsibility to business and to labor for carrying on policies that will safeguard the interests of all. We were already in the current of inflation and some price increases are inevitable to readjust production to more satisfactory levels.

"Minor temporary increases can be absorbed with little permanent change in the purchasing power of our wages. Our major need is increased volume of production.

"Our safety lies in getting through this period of transition with no major increases in costs or stoppages of production. Major changes will be cumulative in effect and may start the chain of dangerous inflation. Some employers' organizations are wisely taking action against price and rent increases.

"For their own safety the wage earners of the United States should exercise self-discipline, and good judgment, and refrain from taking ill considered and unwise action pending action by Congress.

"Labor will then be in a position to demand cooperation for holding prices and especially rent levels. Wage earners can best stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production which can wipe out scarcities and the danger of run-away inflation.

"As workers in a free economy let's first strengthen our foundations so that our strongholds will weather the difficulties. As citizens of a democracy we must preserve our rights by insuring the general welfare.

"WILLIAM GREEN."

Members of the American Federation of Labor can be counted on to take their full responsibility in this emergency. For the next few months we will have to buy in a "sellers' market," where the man with goods to sell can charge almost any price because shortages are acute.

Several months of top speed production will be needed to end this shortage—some place the time at 6 months, but it may be much shorter if all cooperate in speeding production. Supply is already catching up with demand in many lines. Shipments of durable goods in the first 4 months of 1946 were back to 1941 levels, with nondurable goods exceeding 1941 by 25 percent.

When the supply of goods balances demand, we can expect a buyer's market, with prices coming down to reasonable levels. Then stores will compete again to sell the best products at the lowest price. Business observers believe that prices may rise 15 to 25 percent before the downturn starts, but if production rises, the price increase will be short lived.

For American workers there are three commandments in the months ahead:

1. Produce: Turn out all the goods you can. Whatever you produce will help to flood the market with products you want to buy and bring down the price you pay.

2. Improve efficiency at your plant: Look ahead. You will want a wage increase later on and you want to avoid a strike. Put this proposal to your management: Cooperation of union and management to increase production per man-hour and prevent waste; records showing financial gains from this cooperation to be furnished by management to the union for collective bargaining.

Increased efficiency is the way to higher wages, lower prices for the consumer, a better market for your product, and a more secure job for you. Increased efficiency does not mean speed-up when accomplished through union-management cooperation.

3. Refuse to buy where prices are too high: If you cannot find reasonably priced goods, then put off buying things not urgently needed until you can get your money's worth. Invest in United States savings bonds.

PRODUCTIVITY AND RISING WAGES

Traditionally, America has paid for rising wages by increasing productivity, and this is the only way to raise living standards. The other alternative—to pay for wage increases by raising prices—is no gain at all for workers, because living cost increases cancel wage gains.

We must begin at once to increase productivity so the next wage increases can be paid without raising living costs.

MANUFACTURING

A peculiar problem confronts many manufacturing industries today. Because our greatest effort was thrown into war production from 1942 to 1945, productivity in war plants rose 61 percent in this period.

Our all-out effort accomplished in less than 4 years a productivity increase which would normally take 15 years. But we did this by sacrificing progress in our civilian industries. Plants producing civilian goods lost thousands of highly skilled workers to war plants and to the Army; their machinery wore out and could not be replaced because steel was needed for munitions and the best modern machinery was essential for war plants. So productivity in civilian industry declined slightly during the war and did not begin to increase again until 1945.

The latest figures (1945) show productivity in civilian industries less than 2 percent above 1942, while productivity in war industries rose 61 percent in the same period. Under wartime controls, "real" hourly earnings rose 9 percent in war industries and 14 percent in civilian or nonwar industries in this period.

Wage increases in nonwar industries were possible because production rose from semi-depression levels to full-capacity levels, greatly reducing overhead costs. These savings in overhead made it possible for companies to raise wages. But in 1946, with civilian industry already at high levels, further large savings on overhead cannot be counted on. Wage increases this spring have been paid for by raising prices. Since VJ-day almost 20,000,000 workers have received wage increases averaging 10 to 20 cents an hour. Many AFL members received more.

Today America's ability to raise wages without increasing prices and living costs depends on increasing productivity in civilian industries. We start now with a deficit to make up. These industries are 4 years behind their normal productivity increase. Many plants need new tools and machinery; many have not yet completed reconversion from war work.

Some are still short of skilled workers. Every effort must now be exerted to make up this productivity deficit and swing our industries back to their normal progress which can raise "real" wages and living standards. This can only be done by the same cooperation of management and labor that created our productivity miracle in war industries.

Here is the challenge to free labor and free enterprise today: Cooperate to increase productivity and raise living standards without strikes.

A Summons to Reason

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Ted B. Hayward:

A SUMMONS TO REASON

God gave us the eternal light,
To see things that are deemed as right
Yet, there are those who overlook,
His teachings in His chosen Book.
Regret it is, they cannot see
The righteous way, as it should be.
But greed, that mortals ere embrace,
Has made this world a doubting place.
'Twas ever thus through ages past,
And so will be until the last.
We speak of peace throughout this world.
In sombre tones our flag's unfurled,
Beyond our shore, where ere the cause,
But seldom do we ever pause
To comprehend the domestic greed
That nullifies most every deed.
It has been said our heart is light,
That we're unconscious of our might
Good neighbors all we seek to be
To banish want and poverty.
Such thoughts, of course, demand respect,
But what of home, in the retrospect?
We cannot give beyond our means,
Nor plant ourselves in all the scenes,
Where man controls the universe,
Unless we go from bad to worse.
There is no sesame of wealth,
That's built upon the theme of stealth.
But only in the honest giving
Within the limits of our living,
Time is the essence of all things,
Fleet as it is, as though on wings,
But God has established a definite plan,
Controlling the destiny of mortal man,
Embracing honesty to the last degree,
Take heed America! If you love liberty.

Communists in the Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 12, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the present situation in regard to new applicants for civil-service ratings has received very little attention in the press, or on the floor of this House.

Yet the composition of our civil service is one of the fundamentals on which the efficiency and dependability of our governmental structure depends.

In this connection, I ask leave to insert into the RECORD two pertinent articles, one by John F. Cramer, which appeared in the Washington Daily News on June 20, 1946, and the other by Jerry Kluttz, which appeared in the Washington Post on May 6, 1946.

Consideration of these facts is important to both legislators and the public.

[From the Washington Daily News of June 26, 1946]

DOOR WIDE OPEN FOR COMMUNISTS ON FEDERAL PAY ROLL

(By John F. Cramer)

There's more than meets the eye in Representative EDWARD REES' (Republican, Kansas) current feud with Civil Service Commission over Communists in Uncle Sam's government.

The truth is that the machinery for keeping Communists, and other subversives, off the Federal pay roll has almost completely broken down.

The gate is wide open for Communists to land Government jobs—and keep Government jobs. There's almost nothing to prevent it.

Civil Service Commission investigates the loyalty to the United States of only 1 out of about every 15 candidates who qualify for United States jobs. (Starting July 1, it will be only 1 out of 200 or 300.)

It can't (or won't) investigate an employee—except in rare instances—once he's on the pay roll.

It can't (or won't) reopen an investigation once an employee has been declared eligible. He can spread Communist doctrine to his heart's content, and the Commission will do nothing about it.

Mr. REES is disturbed about this. And other officials ought to be disturbed, too—especially those in Congress, who are mainly to blame. Let's take a look.

The law says Communists and other subversives can't hold Government jobs—for the simple reason that they are dedicated to overthrowing the Government.

But in the 5 years ending last July, Civil Service appointed approximately 4,500,000 persons to the Federal pay roll. Yet it investigated only 344,119.

And in the 12 months beginning July 1, it will appoint an estimated several hundred thousand. Yet Congress has given it funds for only 95 investigators—and about 1,400 investigations.

One of Mr. REES' main complaints is the Commission's refusal to reopen investigations. The Commission has yet to answer that one. It says merely that if it did reopen, it would have no authority to fire an employee who might be found disloyal.

Incidentally, some of the things the Commission doesn't know about its own operations would amaze you. Yesterday, for instance, it was unable to say definitely how many persons had been appointed to the Federal pay roll in the last 5 years. It didn't know how many had been appointed subject to investigation. Or how many of these had been subsequently investigated. Or how many had been appointed not subject to investigation. In other words, the Commission isn't quite sure who has been investigated and who hasn't.

[From the Washington Post of May 6, 1946]

UNITED STATES COMPLACENT IN CHECKING LOYALTY OF NEW EMPLOYEES

(By Jerry Kluttz)

The person who would damage our Government now has his opportunity to work from within.

It is a fact that today very few new employees are given the customary character and loyalty investigation incoming workers were subjected to during the war years. With the war won, Uncle Sam has become complacent and he has dropped his guard.

These loyalty investigations were made largely by the investigating staff of the Civil Service Commission in cooperation with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. And this is the story, in brief, of what has happened in the past year:

The Commission's staff of investigators has been cut down from 750 to 104 and these 104 employees have been given so much other work to do that not even one out of every 750 new employees is given a loyalty check. For the 1947 fiscal year, the Commission estimates it will be able to examine only 1,400 applicants.

Contrary to the general impression, the FBI does not check new employees of any agency except its own. The intelligence staffs of War, Navy, and Treasury also check a few of their new employees but none to the extent followed during the war.

Unofficially, it's reported that the loyalty of no new employee be inquired into unless the hiring agency specifically requests it of Civil Service. At this point there seems to be some doubt if even a routine check will be made of new employees against the FBI files.

Now this is why the deputed 104-man staff at Civil Service is making only a handful of character investigations: This staff must first give priority to (1) all appeals from veterans who are dismissed and furloughed; (2) appeals from veterans who are turned down for Federal jobs; (3) viclations of Civil Service rules and regulations; (4) charges of discrimination in hiring and firing, (5) postmaster examination cases.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS DENIED

The Civil Service Commission put up a fight to get additional funds for its investigating staff as revealed in hearings before the House Appropriations Committee. It was turned down cold.

I realize fully that some of the investigators asked a lot of silly and stupid questions that had no bearing whatever on a person's loyalty to his Government. Furthermore, that some had prejudices that influenced their decisions. That's bad and the offenders must be fired.

But I know, too, that the investigators stopped the hiring of a lot of disloyal and questionable people by the Government and I happen to believe a loyalty check by people who know their business is good insurance by any government in the world of today.

And that brings me to this point—why I have emphasized the pro-Russian foreign policy resolution adopted by CIO's United Public Workers. Since I have become an issue in the controversy, I shall state my position as simply and clearly as I know how—I do not believe any employee or group of employees of any government should do anything that even approaches disloyalty to their government. Of all people, government employees should be first in loyalty to their government.

United States Would Control Farm-Machinery Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Mr. T. N. Sandifer, writing in the National Live Stock Producer for July-August 1946, points out how the Government has tied farm-machinery manufacturers "in granny knots for about 15 wartime months." He infers that this is part of a plan to place this industry under Government control. He confirms what many of us have believed for a long time—that many bureaucrats intend to socialize and communize American industry, if they get half a chance. It is time that the public understands this fact. Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the article by Mr. Sandifer:

FARM MACHINERY WAS GUINEA PIG FOR UNITED STATES CONTROL—WAR AND PRESENT SHORTAGE TRACED TO "CONCENTRATION" PLAN FOR WAR PRODUCTION

(By T. N. Sandifer)

Chickens come home to roost in Washington, as well as on the farm. The oversized one, now roosting on the shoulders of the global thinkers and government-by-directive boys, is the lack of farm machinery. That no small part of the trouble results from the farm-machinery manufacturers having been tied in granny knots for about 15 wartime months now is disclosed by two official documents of the War Production Board which—in a very limited way—are just beginning to see the light.

Primary responsibility rests with Leon Henderson, former oversize boss of OPA, then Director, Division of Civilian Supply, and Joseph L. Weiner, Deputy Director. Others actively connected with the farm-machinery program were Arthur R. Burns, Harold Stein, G. H. Willis, and J. T. Palmer.

"In view of the fact that there existed no adequate precedents in United States history for handling such a situation, Henderson looked to European experience with concentration of production, and found it good," the report states. Quite frankly it adds that "these men approached their work with a background primarily of economic research, administration, and university teaching," and cites details of bitter opposition of men with practical experience in business and industry.

"The opinion persisted among many persons in the United States Department of Agriculture," according to the record, "that continued or increased purchases of farm equipment would aggravate the farm problem by releasing farm labor more rapidly than it could be absorbed in defense work, and by increasing the capital investment of farmers beyond their future ability to pay. Reflecting this view, a proposal was being drafted in USDA to restrict the production of farm equipment to about 75 percent of the 1940 level." (This was in March and April 1941.)

HENDERSON BORROWED NAZI IDEA

Saner, or at least more practical minds, were able to defer such a program for many months. On November 17, 1941, Samuel S. Stratton wrote his superior, J. S. Knowlson, Deputy Priorities Director:

"The situation in the farm-equipment industry is in my opinion serious. * * * It calls for quick action and not for further prolonged discussion of ways and means to bring into effect some allocation scheme. * * * Less important and less complicated industries in my opinion should be made the guinea pigs when we start industry allocations." (The report notes that OPACS calls its orders allocation programs in deference to the Office of Production Management which objected to the use of the term "priorities.")

But the professors won out. They won despite the fact that the idea they wanted to put over was alien to the United States—was in fact borrowed from the earliest days of the Nazi regime. Also, in spite of the fact that it did not work out according to plan even when the Nazis tried it—no more than it did over here.

"Although Leon Henderson had prophesied eventual need of concentration, in an article in the July 1941 issue of Fortune," the report explains that "the first specific proposal for concentration of production was made in connection with the farm machinery and equipment industry. In order to save iron and steel, of which this industry was a heavy consumer, the Supply Priorities and Allocations Board directed, late in September 1941, that production of all farm machinery except dairy equipment should be cut back to 1940 levels where possible. In common with most other industries producing metal products for civilian use, the farm machinery industry was rounding out three-quarters of a year of record production and metals were growing scarcer."

TAKE BUREAUCRATIC ORDERS—OR ELSE

Briefly, the idea was to use the big farm machinery industry—largest of its kind in the world—as a guinea pig for centralized government control. First, they would pick out the biggest plants and the most efficient operators. These would then be told to take war contracts. If they did not, then they would be shut down, their help taken away, or their steel and other materials shut off. Meanwhile, regular production of farm machinery business would be parceled and assigned to various small manufacturing plants throughout the country, while larger plants were engaged on enforced war work. We quote again:

"Having discovered that the industry division would be more than coole to the idea of concentration, the Division of Civilian Supply prepared a memorandum for Leon Henderson to present to the War Production Board. The memorandum was given a preliminary circulation among Henderson's subordinates on March 9, 1942. The Division of Civilian Supply and OPA generally approved the memorandum. * * *

"David Ginsburg, general counsel of OPA, wrote: 'In my judgment, the memorandum regarding the civilian supply steel program, as it is presently drafted, is excellent and does not require any changes or additions from the point of view of OPA.'" The report explains that "OPA's interest in concentration arose from the fact that it might be the solution to the price inflation threatening to result from increased production costs caused by curtailed operation."

Here is the basic program cooked up for farm machinery workers under the guise of helping the war along:

1. Quotas on as many different implements as possible would be transferred from the seven large companies to the smaller ones.

2. All tools made were to be labeled "Victory" models, with a legend such as "Made for IH, Case, etc., by Blount Plow Co."

3. Distribution would be handled by having each company place its order for its quota with the producing nucleus plant, with distribution by the purchasing company through its regular channels.

POORLY PLANNED AND ILL-ORGANIZED

While some other industries were gutted by the same process, it is a startling fact—in view of all the pressure for maximum food production during the war—that the farm-machinery industry was one of the first to be monkeyed with. And the slang is well used in this case, that a bunch of left-footed monkeys could not have done a more thorough job. The WPB report, in fact, says much the same thing although in different words, i. e., "considered on its face, the concentration program might well be found to be poorly planned, ill-organized, and haphazardly carried out."

The WPB tries later to excuse the boys, but the fact that farm machinery is so extremely short today, when it is a matter of short supply at home and starvation abroad, speaks for itself. The net result of the concentration idea was to keep the industry disorganized and in a chaotic state for more than a year.

NECESSARILY RUTHLESS DISLOCATION

The kind of European commissar thinking that dictated this experiment is revealed in the summary of a discussion at one WPB meeting. The WPB report, without naming the speaker, quotes someone as saying that "the selection of certain plants for continued operation—and others for suspended animation, if not actual extinction—is a necessarily ruthless dislocation of the national economy." Whoever was doing the talking evidently enjoyed the prospect of being necessarily ruthless toward American industry, under the guise of war necessity. The big hitch, it was complained in the meeting, was that the idea didn't coincide with the tradition of free American enterprise and that some of the strictly American enterprise advocates wouldn't go along.

WPB's labor division was definitely in favor of concentration, believing that "there is especial need for adopting programs of concentration of civilian production in nucleus plants in certain industries" it is stated in the report. And quoting again:

"James S. Knowlson, director of industry operations, just as definitely did not favor mandatory concentration although his assistant, John F. Fennelly, took a more moderate view. On April 9, 1942, Fennelly wrote to Knowlson that he felt concentration was theoretically a desirable objective and also, within limits, desirable from a practical standpoint. I should agree that more efficient operation would result from such a development and, furthermore, a considerable simplification of control."

The following is quoted from Fennelly's letter to Knowlson:

"The core of the argument seems to be the extent to which it is deemed necessary to move in this direction and also the methods by which it should be achieved. Leon Henderson apparently takes the position that the job should be done by initial arbitrary action, regardless of the natural resistances and the complications which may result. As I understand it, your position is that such concentration will tend to take place automatically after civilian industries have been placed on limited and uneconomic production schedules.

"My own position would be somewhere in between the above two stated positions. Thus, I think there is a great deal to be said for avoiding unnecessary resistances and complex technical problems by permitting the system to evolve naturally up to a certain point. On the other hand, I honestly do not believe that we will get the desired concentration by sitting still and awaiting the automatic process. For instance, I was talking the other day, to a hosiery manufacturer whose production has been cut down severely as a result of the nylon allocations and he told me that he would like very much to see some definite step in the direction of concentration taken by the War Production Board for his industry. Thus, he has already reached a point where he would welcome such action but probably will be slow to take it himself unless directed by the War Production Board."

"LEGISLATIVE PROCESS" INCONVENIENT

In line with that thought, Leon Henderson is actually quoted in one meeting, when he was comparing the way Canada did it, as saying "Up there you don't have such a thing as this legislative process, and it is a little more convenient." In other words, it would be a heap easier to put these big ideas over if some Congressmen didn't have to be soothed first. "I am not advocating it," he said piously, "but it is certainly convenient." Having to explain things to an American Congress was one of the things that, in the long run really threw these thinkers and helped put the situation straight.

According to the report, Leon Henderson spearheaded a drive for funds from Congress to be used for a subsidy, to poultice the small businesses also being put out of existence by the concentration program. When he couldn't get the subsidy, it was the beginning of the end for the entire program.

It is interesting to note, incidentally, that the CIO was very active in this whole situation. It would appear, too, that a primary interest was in keeping union labor employed. A CIO committee, early in the game, met with Office of Production Management—predecessor agency to WPB—to urge that farm machinery plants be made to go on large-scale war work. The idea was that these factories, if they were working on war contracts instead of continuing to make farm machines, could furnish work for labor which lost jobs in other industries which had been shut down by Government regulation.

CIO TELLS HOW TO RUN THINGS

Furthermore, these official reports disclose that the CIO proposed that, in each plant, a labor-management organization would run things. As a step to force this condition, they proposed that materials for normal civilian manufacture be allowed to go only to smaller plants. In other words, a big plant would have to take a war contract or it would die of starvation for materials.

Well, this planning, and resulting uncertainty and chaos for the industry, lasted for 15 months. Concentration of industry was planned for 39 different industries. It was actually ordered for 5, and in only 2 industries—stoves and farm machinery—was it actually enforced. It is noted that before the order was issued for farm machinery to concentrate, a representative of Harry Hopkins asked at one of the meetings if there had been any trouble in carrying out the scheme in the earlier experiment with the stove industry. (Do you remember that you couldn't get stoves for a long time, too?) According to the WPB report, Joseph Weiner, one of those favoring the scheme and disregarding an assistant's adverse report, said there had been no major difficulty. Which prompts the question as to just what he would call today's situation.

Space does not permit a comprehensive summary of the 318 typewritten pages of the two reports, or even the many pages directly concerned with farm machinery. For the record, however, it should be noted that order L–170 was issued October 19, 1942, concentrating production in the farm machinery and equipment industry. This had been in operation some 5 months when, in March 1943, the director of the Food Production Administration, United States Department of Agriculture, reported on the effects of concentration upon the 1943 agricultural production:

"A detailed examination of concentration shows that undoubtedly the benefits from it are much less than the reduction it will bring about in farm production."

AND THE NET RESULT WAS CHAOS

"The adverse effects of concentration on farm production without doubt will be direct and positive. It will come about in part by delay of machinery production until it is too late to serve farmers in 1943, and in part, by a direct further reduction in amount of machinery reaching the farmer on account of the chaos that concentration has brought in disrupting and paralyzing the distribution of machinery at every step from the manufacturer to States, counties, jobbers, dealers, and, finally, to the farmers. * * *

"To summarize, it can be said that concentration of the farm-machinery industry has done little to increase direct war production. It has probably not appreciably increased the use of labor for this purpose. On the other hand, it has introduced uncertainty and confusion in the food-production work of the Nation, when every possible effort should be made to facilitate vital war production. It has been a pronounced failure, and should be so recognized and discarded at the earliest possible moment."

On June 14, 1943, order L–170 was superseded by order L–257, which eliminated the concentration provisions based on size and class distinction and was in effect a return to the earlier method of horizontal percentagewise curtailment from a given base.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAY LeFEVRE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, consistently I have voted for the bills to extend the Office of Price Administration because I honestly felt that this agency was needed during the war and with scarcities prevailing in so many of our commodities following the war. I have felt that some controls were necessary during the reconversion period. The conference report, so overwhelmingly passed by both Houses of Congress in June, was a workable bill and provided for the orderly and gradual dissolution of the agency. However, our President saw fit to veto this measure and was without a doubt poorly advised after being advised to sign the bill by our Speaker, Mr. RAYBURN, and by the leader of the Senate, Mr. BARKLEY, both men of his own party and highly respected by both Houses of the Congress; I hold no sympathy for him.

The last day of June found us without any price control. The people everywhere seemed fearful of an immediate skyrocketing of prices. I will admit there were some who jumped at the opportunity to take advantage of the situation, but by and large American business, through its leaders and associations, pledged that they would hold prices and their profits to a minimum. For 3 weeks the shackles were removed from industry and agriculture. Production seemed to forge ahead and we found many items coming to the shelves of our department stores and foods to the counters of our grocery stores and markets that we had seldom seen for months. Some items came in such quantities that the prices were below the OPA ceilings. Other commodities never did reach the ceiling prices, plus the subsidies that had been granted. True, some very scarce articles took quite a jump, but from reliable sources I had learned that many black-market operators loaded up heavy in certain lines, only to learn to their sorrow that the people cannot be fooled all the time; they refused to pay unreasonable prices in this apparent free market. The result was that these perishable items had to be moved and these gouging racketeers took their licking. And I am not weeping for them, as I have learned that many of these operators were the very ones threatening us and urging us to vote for an OPA bill, without the so-called crippling amendments, or else.

On July 23 we received the new OPA extension bill and a more impracticable, unworkable conglomeration I have never read. We had just learned that good old American enterprise was not dead. It had come to life. When, lo and behold, the House voted it back into a straitjacket again, along with the approximate 30,000 employees, rearing to regiment our American economy, using the good taxpayers' dollars to bring back scarcities, the black markets, and all the corruption that goes with it. In this conference report I can see nothing but chaos and confusion. I am indeed sorry that the motion to recommit the bill, instructing the conferees to bring back a bill only providing for rent controls, was defeated. I voted for this and sincerely hoped it would pass. My fear now is that having lost this opportunity to reestablish free markets, the chance may not come again for many moons. The "take" of black markets will be increased manyfold and the general contempt for law will increase with tragic results.

Information has come to me that several of the best men, formerly on the OPA staff, secured transfers to other Government departments during the stagnation period and therefore these recent predictions as to what can be so favorably accomplished, fades into thin air.

The OPA's old record of delays and procrastinations caused many an anxious worry and the loss of thousands of dollars to American business and agriculture. Should they have to operate with incompetent or inexperience staff workers, we have reason to be alarmed. Instead of staving off inflation, it will continue to foster the very scarcities that stimulate inflation. The Department of Agriculture informs us that we can expect the largest wheat and corn crop in all history. We know our livestock population is larger than average. This combination should assure us of an abundance of meat, poultry, eggs, and dairy products. However, we have a new setup with this bill. A three-man Decontrol Board has the power to reestablish controls. It can override the OPA and the Secretary of Agriculture. Some industrial price ceilings have already been restored. No controls can be imposed on poultry, eggs, petroleum, or tobacco before August 21 and on that date only if the Board orders them. On August 21 also the bill provides that prices in effect on June 30 be restored on meat, dairy products, and grain. Much depends on the good judgment of our Secretary of Agriculture and the hope that the Decontrol Board will cooperate with him in soon announcing that controls on agricultural products will not be resumed on August 21. If this is not done, we are again sure of having scarcities and a flourishing black market, and what is worse, an ever-broadening disrespect for law. There are many, many other provisions in the last bill, too complicated to explain here, that only add more confusion for everyone. I received hundreds of letters protesting my votes on the other OPA extension bills, with their so-called crippling amendments. To me these measures appeared logical and workable—provided we agree that any Government control agency should only function during an emergency. I do not believe these people, who objected to the other bills, could possibly favor this monstrosity. Give our free economy an opportunity to function, unshackled, for a reasonable length of time and the old law of supply and demand will furnish us with plenty and at fair and reasonable prices.

Veterans' Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, before the close of this session I want to refer to some of the legislation we have passed during the Seventy-eighth and Seventy-ninth Congress in the interest of the veterans.

And, may I say that the Members of the House are to be congratulated for the great interest they have taken in effecting legislation on a wide front in an effort to render the greatest possible assistance to the veterans who defended this country and to their families.

The laws we have passed to aid the veterans and their dependents are a fitting tribute expressing the gratitude of the Members of Congress and of the American people for the services they have rendered to our country.

As a member of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee I have fought for the interest of the veterans, in helping to draft legislation and in securing its enactment on the floor of the House. History will record that we Members of Congress have gone further in legislation helpful to the veterans than any nation in the world and probably farther than the Members of this House in the beginning ever anticipated.

As for myself I believe every dollar of the billions we have obligated the Government to pay in the interest of our servicemen and veterans has been justified. Some of you may recall that I have made the statement in the debates, that if this Government would practice more economy and better business policies that by so doing we could save twice the billions of dollars each year that would be necessary to take care of the veterans and their dependents.

I pointed out in the debates on one occasion that while the bills we were considering in the interest of the veterans would cost $4,500,000,000 a year, that the administration could take 1,500,000 persons off of the Federal pay roll and save the $4,500,000,000 which would pay the entire bill for all of the aid necessary for the veterans for a whole year.

Again I pointed out when the British loan was under consideration that rather than to loan $4,000,000,000 we had better spend it on our own people, pointing out that this vast amount of money would build a million low-priced homes needed for our veterans.

In the Seventy-eighth Congress we passed the GI bill of rights which was sponsored by the national officers of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and practically all veterans' organizations. This, indeed, was a great piece of legislation. The Members of the House and most of the veterans are familiar with the provisions of this bill. Naturally, when the bill was put into operation we found on testing it out that it could be improved by amendments.

During this Seventy-ninth Congress much study was given to the bill and it was amended in several instances to make it more workable. I am informed by the Veterans' Administration that it is working much better, and as well as could be expected with the great volume of applications from veterans desiring to take advantage of the provisions of this bill.

Never before in this country was such an effort made by the Congress to make up to the servicemen some of the losses they have sustained by being called away from civilian pursuits. For instance, provisions were made for every young man whose education had been interrupted or delayed to return to high school or college, tuition free, with the Government paying partial subsistence for him while completing his education. On the job training with partial subsistence provided for those who wanted to engage in a trade or profession. Subsistence and vocational training for those who were wounded in an effort to put them in position where they could maintain themselves in civilian life in the future. Provisions were made, with the Government cooperating, for loans to those who wanted to buy a business, a home or a farm.

Let me cite only two instances to show how the veterans are making use of the opportunities provided for them under the GI bill of rights.

Up to June 1, 1946, 178,162 loans were made for homes, farms and business, totaling $819,139,000 in loans at 4 percent on long and favorable terms guaranteed by the Government. To the credit of the veterans may I point out that out of this vast number only 138 have defaulted on such loans which is, indeed, a remarkable record.

May I further point out that as of June 1, 1946, under the educational provision there has been enrolled 839,454 veterans. There are now additional applications for these educational features which have been approved in the amount of 1,567,273. Reports from all of the educational institutions come to us that but with few exceptions, the veterans are serious, energetic and studious, ranking high in their classes.

We have provided priority in civil service for veterans which will permit hundreds of thousands of them to more easily secure jobs. Many other helpful provisions, too numerous to mention, were written into the GI bill of rights for the veterans.

With reference to compensation and pensions; legislation has been passed greatly increasing these meritorious aids for the veterans and their dependents. The insurance provisions for those who desire to continue to carry governmental insurance has been written into the law through amendments that gives the veterans the best insurance for their money in America today.

Back in 1933 when President Roosevelt had enacted what was known as the Economy Act, the compensation of many veterans was completely taken away. For some single veterans the compensation was reduced to $8.20 per month when they went to a hospital and the compensation was reduced to about $20 a month for married veterans when they were compelled to be hospitalized.

We passed a bill recently correcting these two wrongs by allowing the veteran to retain his full compensation without any reduction when it was necessary for him to be hospitalized. Because of the general increase of living costs during the past 2 years we passed bills increasing all compensation to veterans by a total of 37½ percent. The passage of this bill brought some additional relief to over a million veterans of World Wars I and II. Time will not permit me to go into detail as to general increases and benefits all along the line which this Congress has brought to the veterans of World Wars I and II through the great amount of legislation which we have placed upon the statute books.

Mr. Speaker, we Members of the House have felt that the regular GI or enlisted man was entitled to receive his terminal leave pay the same as has been received by the officers. We felt that this injustice should be corrected.

This House of Representatives, as you know, has passed the terminal leave pay bill and it is now before the Senate. I have always felt that the enlisted man was as much entitled to terminal leave pay as were the officers. I am glad the House has taken favorable action as the payment of terminal leave will give to all enlisted men an average of about $165 which will help many thousands of the GI's of my district and throughout the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, as the Members know, the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee made a thorough investigation of the Veterans' Administration in an effort to find out what was wrong generally in the Administration so that the direction of veterans' affairs in the future would bring the best possible care and assistance to the veterans who were hospitalized throughout the Nation. I believe this move was one of great importance to the veterans and I am sure will result in lasting good.

Under the new administration of General Bradley, one of the greatest accomplishments, in my judgment, was to make possible through legislation a new era in the advancement of more up-to-date methods and policies of administration, giving the new Administrator, General Bradley, who is assisted by Major General Hawley in charge of the Department of Medicine and Surgery, an opportunity to raise the standards of medical, surgical, mental, and all types of treatment for those veterans who find it necessary to become patients in our veterans' hospitals throughout the Nation.

The keystone in this new advancement was the bill we passed setting up the Medical Corps in the Department of Medicine and Surgery. We raised salaries so that we might be able to secure and hold in the service the best men in medical science throughout the country. We made it possible through raising of salaries and other requirements to bring to the veterans the best men there are in the dental profession. We made it possible, by revamping all salaries, to secure and hold a nursing service equal to that in any hospital in the Nation. I cannot overemphasize the importance of the best there is in nursing service for the veterans.

In many of the veterans' hospitals, because of the excellent service now being rendered, the average time required for the recovery of a patient has been lowered within the past 6 months from 42 days to 19 days. This better service has raised the patient-day cost from $5.03 to $7.75, but, through the reduction of the time necessary for treatment for the recovery of the patient, the cost per individual patient by reason of this better service has dropped from $210 to $147. This means that better medical treatment and nursing service has brought a quicker recovery to the patient at a greater saving financially to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I realize there is much yet to be accomplished and the Members of this House will have an opportunity to consider further legislation with the beginning of the eightieth session come next January 1947.

I realize that there has been considerable delay in the opportunity of the veterans to get into the hospitals and receive the attention they desire. This could not be avoided because with the millions of men coming out of the service and for the years past, with the lack of building materials and men to do construction work there was an oversupply of men needing hospitalization and an undersupply of facilities with which to accommodate them. The situation has been eased considerably and as the program of building of new hospitals is pushed, possibly within a year we will have sufficient hospitals and sufficient beds to promptly care for all veterans needing hospitalization.

The hospitalization and care of the veterans throughout the years to come will continue to be of first importance and one of our biggest problems. When you realize that we have 99,509 beds already provided and are rapidly pushing forward with building construction, you can begin to conceive of the tremendous responsibility and task that rests upon the shoulders of General Bradley, Major General Hawley, and the thousands of top-flight doctors and nurses who must carry on and direct the work of the Veterans' Administration.

In order to get some conception of the vastness of this problem, may I point out to you that there are in the various veterans' hospitals in the Nation today what is known as 26,980 general medicine and surgical mental cases. There are, in addition, 44,699 mental cases in regular psychoneurosis hospitals. There are 8,000 veterans afflicted with tuberculosis in the hospitals and 28,375 hospitalized for physical disability and wounds which are service connected. Roughly speaking, as of June 27, 1946, there was something over 100,000 patients. This will give you an idea of the vastness and the importance of this great and necessary work.

Naturally, in an organization as big as the Veterans' Administration, even with the highest type of leadership, with the best there is in organization, there is bound to be some delay, some things overlooked, someone disappointed in the service they receive.

Mr. Speaker, General Bradley, General Hawley, and others have come before our committee many times. We have had an excellent opportunity in discussing the problems concerning the veterans, to evaluate their earnestness, sincerity, and integrity of purpose. I think I speak the sentiments of every member of the Veterans' Committee when I say that these men in their straight-forward honest approaches to the problems confronting us have won the unanimous respect and confidence of the members of our committee.

Mr. Speaker, the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee has brought much far-reaching legislation to the floor of this House. I want to compliment the Members of the House of Representatives generally for the interest you have all show in the veterans. I think your cooperation can best be appreciated and established when I say to you, that by overwhelming majorities you have approved every piece of legislation our committee has reported to the House. We have made a great start in this great humanitarian work of trying to build back, so far as medical science and nursing care will do it, the health and physical well-being of the defenders of our country.

There is much to be done and I am certain that the Members of this House will follow this course through year after year until a grateful nation will have expressed its fullest gratitude to these defenders of our country.

Single Department of Defense Legislation Should Be Passed; Editorials Point Up Important Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I believe that necessary legislation to create a single Department of Defense should have been acted on prior to the recess or the adjournment of Congress. It is my further belief that the compelling reasons for the consolidation, and the giving of coequal status for air, land, and sea forces, are recognized by the American people. Action should be taken early next year.

I herewith include two informative and challenging editorials on this vital subject:

[From the Washington Post of July 26, 1946]

MERGER NOW

Any regard for the Nation's security would keep Members of Congress in town till action had been taken on the Army and Navy merger bill. The latest spur is furnished by the majority report of the joint committee set up to investigate the Pearl Harbor disaster. Unfortunately, however, the majority, in a verbose 250,000-word report, did not spell out the sum total of their recommendations. All the 25 supervisory, administrative, and organization deficiencies which are held to require correction add up to one basic need, viz, unification. They have to do with human frailties, but all of them could be traced to traditional loyalties to department or branch springing from the separation and competition of the armed services. Why the majority did not advocate the over-all reform specifically instead of allowing it to arise out of the report is beyond our comprehension. The neglect leaves the recommendations up in the air, as, for instance, when the committee proposes "immediate action be taken to insure that unity of command is imposed at all military and naval outposts."

How is it possible to have unity of command in the field and divided command at home? This is a question which is much more intriguing than the question which, the majority Members say, intrigued them: Why was it possible for a Pearl Harbor to occur? No matter what machinery is set up outside Washington, division at the top is bound to reappear all the way down the line, if only out of personal or service loyalty. There would be the same lack of intercommunication which frustrated service relations before Pearl Harbor and brought about disaster. It is to end this sort of thing that the single department bill has been proposed. The reform is held up mainly by a moss-backed clinging to tradition on the part of Congress, aided and abetted by the disinclination to change which is part of the human equation.

These obstacles have proved insurmountable for the last 30 years. Twenty years before Pearl Harbor, Billy Mitchell, encountering precisely the same situation of noncoordination at Pearl Harbor that the Japanese encountered, told a congressional committee, "I have never seen anything like it." A unified command in Hawaii, in Mitchell's opinion, was the first step to general unification. Congress was so impressed by Mitchell's warnings that it almost enacted reform. President Harding, thinking the step was coming, had the appointees ready for a single department of defense. Indeed, it is said that John W. Weeks and Edwin Denby had accepted appointments as under secretaries in the combined department. But the change never came off. The reason was that the brass hats, appalled over the prospective overturn of their vested interests, threatened to resign, and Congress lacked the courage to apply the counsel of common sense that Billy Mitchell provided.

The disaster that Billy Mitchell envisaged as the result of lack of coordination duly occurred. And the Pearl Harbor Committee, both in the majority and minority reports, duly apportions the blame among the men upon whom the Nation relies for its security. The report, however, says not a word about the failure of Congress, in the face of such warnings as Mitchell gave, to change the divisive organization in which our commanders operate. But the legislative arm cannot escape some responsibility. And now, with the lessons of Pearl Harbor so clear that the most distinguished voices in the armed services have joined that of the departed Mitchell, action is required primarily from Congress to put those lessons into effect. Our security cannot afford any more procrastination. The state of armed peace which is now our condition requires a streamlining of our national defense system which the merger bill affords. It must be top-to-bottom reorganization. "Since the basic principle of success in war is unity of command under leaders trained in and selected for their knowledge and skill in the use of all arms," says an officer who is both a sailor and a statesman, Admiral H. E. Yarnell, "it seems logical to assume that there should be the same unity in the military departments and general staffs of the Government." The onus is upon Congress to put our security ahead of the kind of traditions which are simply the safeguards of vested interests.

THE AIR AND THE FUTURE

The newest report of the United States Strategic Bombing Survey paints a gripping picture of what American air power accomplished in the Pacific. Beyond that it offers counsel of a sort not to be ignored by any American interested in the future security of the Nation.

In the course of its excellently written narrative, the survey makes several statements lending a fresh historical perspective to the Pacific war. It declares, for instance, that the Japanese never contemplated invading the United States, and it notes that had they been able to step up the tempo of their suicide-plane attacks they might have forced us to withdraw from Okinawa and revise our strategy. But these and similar points are merely incidental to the report's main thesis, which is simply that all of us must come to realize the vital importance of the fact that enemy air power, "enjoying the control of the skies over one's head, can be as disastrous to one's country as its occupation by physical invasion."

The survey does not slight the role played by surface vessels and ground forces in the Pacific. It emphasizes that team play among all elements was essential to victory and that such team play will always be needed. Nevertheless, observing that new weapons like the atomic bomb will require radical changes in navies and land armies, it holds that air power—notably our carrier planes—was the most decisive factor of all against the Japanese, and it insists that our aerial offensive with conventional explosives and incendiaries would have been enough to force them to surrender unconditionally by the end of 1945 even without Hiroshima, Russia's entry into the war, or our projected invasion, and even though they still had thousands of planes and 2,000,000 troops on the home islands.

When it speaks of air power's revolutionary decisiveness, of course—air power's ability to crush a country into complete submission without invasion—the Strategic Bombing Survey has in mind more than conventional planes. It has in mind pilotless craft, guided missiles, transoceanic rockets of supersonic speed, automatically airborne atomic weapons, and similar agents of swift and all-encompassing catastrophe. These are the things which have convinced it that the United States must act promptly in developing protection for its civilian population and economy through such measures as partial decentralization, elaborate scientific research and development, the best possible intelligence system, and the establishment of a new armed service—equal to the Army and Navy—to specialize in keeping the Nation ready for the fantastic things that would happen in a third world war.

In principle, if not in detail, the Survey's counsel is altogether sound. Until we have genuine trust and cooperation among nations our security will be no better than our preparedness. Moreover, to the extent that it will inhibit possible aggressors, a strong America, an America supremely equipped for the new air age, will be serving not only itself but all lands anxious for a lasting peace.

Christianity and Interracial Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks, I wish to include a speech made by Mr. G. Howland Shaw, former assistant Secretary of State, over the Catholic Hour.

It is an exceptionally fine speech on one of the fundamental principles of Christianity—Interracial Justice.

In his very first encyclical after his election Pope Pius XII declared:

"Those who enter the church, whatever be their origin or their speech, must know that they have equal rights as children in the house of the Lord, where the law of Christ and the peace of Christ prevail."

And again in a magnificent passage of that most magnificent of recent encyclicals, "The Mystical Body of Christ," the same Pope has said:

"Men may be separated by nationality and race, but Our Saviour poured out His blood to reconcile all men to God through the cross and to bid them all unite in one body, He has taught us not only to have love for those of a different nation and a different race, but to love even our enemies. We chant the length, the width, the height, the depth of the charity of Christ which neither diversity of race or culture, neither the wasteless tracts of ocean, nor wars, be their cause just or unjust, can ever weaken or destroy."

We read or hear such words. We admire them. We say to ourselves: Yes, that is what I believe. And then we forget them. Rather should these words make us hang our heads in shame so great is the distance between that in which we claim to believe and a state of things radically at variance with those beliefs for which we cannot escape personal responsibility. It is a convenient alibi to say that individuals guilty of acts contrary to interracial justice and charity have blundered or were tactless, but they would not have blundered; they would not have been tactless if you and I translated our Christian beliefs into practice. And it is easy too to say that these things are very unfortunate, but that there must be a long process of education before they can be changed. That puts our consciences effectively to sleep and relieves us of any compulsion for immediate action.

What are we Christians to do?

There are three important things we must do as individuals. Let us at least know just what Christianity teaches with respect to race relations. Obviously that is basic and primary. And then let us get some clear picture of what the interracial problem is in this country at the present time. There are countless excellent books, pamphlets and magazine articles on the subject and they are readily available. They can easily be supplemented by first-hand observation. But we should go further than study and observation. We should make every effort to get beyond such facts as high infant mortality, poor schooling, and worse housing and discrimination of all sorts. In the measure that such is possible we must feel with the victim of discrimination as he or she faces the conditions of living. There must be at least some real and emotional identification.

There is a final stage in this preparation, this schooling of the individual Christian. The human mind is curiously likely to function in watertight compartments and there are undoubtedly many Christians who keep their theology in one compartment and such knowledge of the interracial problem as they possess in a quite different and very tightly separated compartment. Christian teaching and the realities of that problem must be consciously compared and the incompatibility between them vividly understood. That is the conclusion at which we must individually arrive before we can so much as begin to participate in any useful program of action in the interracial field.

There are many such programs. There is the Interracial Council organized on a religious basis. Today there are Catholic interracial councils in New York, Detroit, Los Angeles, Washington, Brooklyn, and Chicago. They bring together Negro and white Catholics to know each other, to pray and to work together and to study the implications of their faith with respect to race relations. The members of the Washington council, for instance, pledge themselves—

1. To act with equal justice, courtesy, and consideration toward white and colored, Jew and Christian.

2. To condemn any discriminatory practice.

3. To fight any interior bitterness that may have resulted from past and present experiences of racial prejudice.

4. To do all in their power to obtain the acceptance of these principles by others.

To implement this pledge, to make it a reality in their lives, the members of the Washington council have prepared and use a very specific examination of conscience.

Young children are naturally tolerant and unaware of racial and national differences. Through adult influence they are warped into intolerance. They become aware of racial and national differences. They are led into the un-Christian interpretation which many adults place upon these differences. The role of the school, therefore, in correcting racial and national tensions is of paramount importance and has received wide recognition. A greater stress, however, must be placed on intercultural relations in our school systems for American and Catholic principles demand a marked emphasis on the effective teaching of interracial justice in the curricula of those schools. An example of what can be done is to be found in the Archdiocese of New York, where at the direction of Cardinal Spellman a very complete syllabus of intercultural education was prepared well over a year ago by the office of the archdiocesan superintendent of schools in collaboration with Fordham University. During the past scholastic year that syllabus has been in use in one-third of the parish schools of the archdiocese. The results have been highly satisfactory and at the opening of the school year next autumn the syllabus, revised and made more concrete as a result of teaching experience, will be in use in all of the parish elementary schools of the Archdiocese.

In the field of higher education there are also significant moves to record. Fordham University, for instance, at its school of social service has offered during the past year a course in "community organization and cultural relations" and St. John's University in Brooklyn has given its students the opportunity to enroll in a course on "Interracial problems and the principles of the encyclicals." The school of social studies founded in Chicago by Bishop Sheil has likewise made an outstanding contribution along similar lines.

Two weeks ago, under the auspices of the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and with the strong support and personal interest of the apostolic delegate, a seminar on the Negro problem was held in Washington. For 4 days a group of leaders, clerical and lay, Negro and white, discussed with utmost frankness all aspects of the problem and arrived at a series of recommendations to stimulate as well as to guide Catholic action in this field.

It is notorious that racial tension thrives upon rumors. Dealing with such rumors is, of course, a negative approach but it has its value and importance. As an example may be cited the Back of the Yards Neighborhood Council in Chicago. The Council has taken a particularly serious view of the danger of irresponsible rumors. On one occasion not so long ago a rumor to the effect that Negroes were causing disturbances on streetcars was gaining wide local credence. Three priests after careful investigation as a result of riding the streetcars satisfied themselves that the rumor was unfounded and so reported from the pulpits of their respective churches on the following Sunday.

These are samples of Christian programs in the interracial field, but there is one more aspect of the problem which must not be forgotten. Events of the past few years have shown that the time has passed when the world of color could be pushed aside and classified as inferior, colonial, or uncivilized. That world is in process of taking its rightful place in contemporary life. The process may be long, but it is already well advanced. From a Christian and a Catholic point of view it should present no difficulties, religious, or intellectual—quite the contrary.

Catholics, however, do not always realize how catholic the Catholic Church really is. They are those who are astonished when they are told that the church, besides Latin, recognizes Greek, Armenian, Syriac, Slavonic and Coptic as liturgical languages and that the rites in these languages are protected to the point of decreeing excommunication for anybody who encourages a person of an eastern rite to pass to the Latin rite. They have also perhaps failed to grasp fully the meaning of certain important acts of the present pope: His consecration for instance of 12 bishops of different races and nationalities in St. Peter's as one of the first acts of his pontificate, the creation of 32 cardinals representing 19 different nationalities, including the Chinese, and most recently the change of status of the Catholic Church in China from the missionary category to one of complete equality with the church in the United States and Europe.

When we are considering what we as Christians should do in efforts to solve the interracial problem let us never forget that we shall not be judged by the prudence we display nor by the skill with which we compromise, but by that part of our convictions which we translate into action and with which we challenge the world.

Flood Control for the Illinois River

REMARKS
OF
HON. EVAN HOWELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to address the House today with reference to the recommendations of the United States Army's Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to acquire 142,000 acres of land to create a system of flood control for the Illinois River and its principal tributaries, particularly the Sangamon River.

The taxpayers and landowners are vitally concerned because the program will affect three counties—Sangamon, Macoupin, and Christian—in the Twenty-first Illinois Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent in Congress.

The plans of the Government's engineers call for an initial cost of $12,000,000 to acquire the land, another $90,000,000 to construct a series of 15 reservoirs at strategic spots, and an annual expenditure of $4,000,000 to maintain the system once it is established. All of this money must be appropriated by Congress at some future date.

We of the Twenty-first Congressional District, individually and collectively, are not opposed to the theory of flood control, but we are unanimous in voicing opposition to the proposals as they are now written because they are not only unnecessary, but extremely inequitable and unjust.

Three of the proposed dams would be along the Sangamon River with a series of others on tributaries feeding into them. Four of these would be established in, or would directly affect, the county of Sangamon and its principal district, the city of Springfield, which is the State capital of Illinois, and where lie the hallowed remains of Abraham Lincoln.

The program as now outlined would require acquisition of 34,350 acres of Sangamon County farm land, some of which is among the most productive in the entire United States. Not only that, but the reservoirs to be created would practically make Springfield, a metropolitan area of some 89,484 persons, a virtual island in flood time. Thus, unless modified, the proposal will directly affect the property, the welfare, and the future of thousands of individuals and business concerns.

Now if this flood-control program would mean creation of a permanent chain of lakes in the Springfield area, it might be more attractive to the community and to the property owners concerned, but instead, it means creation of a series of mosquito-infested, disease-breeding swamps and marsh lands which would constitute a constant menace to public health—all subjected to the unpredictable whims of the weather, with its spring rains, summer droughts, and winter snows.

Periodic flooding and draining of the 34,350 acres of land in the Sangamon County area would depend upon the operation of a huge dam which would be constructed on the Sangamon River above Petersburg, and upon water released from smaller projected dams and levees at Oakley, Mahomet, Bando, Curran, Rochester, and Taylorville.

The development of this program not only means abandonment of farms and homes together with thousands of acres, but the relocation and reconstruction of important roads and bridges, schools, railroads, utility and power lines, sewer systems, and the curtailment of coal-mine operations.

The cost is almost inestimable, but it will run into millions. The city of Springfield will face the necessity of reconstructing a new sanitary district at an estimated cost of $800,000 because the existing district would be in the part of the backwater created by the proposed system. The city also would be compelled to build a new intercepting sewer at a cost of another $700,000. The city's sewer system, involving 17 different branches, some of which are 78 years old, would be jeopardized.

Much property in the city itself would be involved. Water would flood parts of Camp Lincoln, and much of Oak Ridge cemetery. It is predicted that 1,250 graves in the cemetery would be flooded, including those of many Civil War veterans. Water would even reach the cemetery chapel and flood to a depth of 18 inches, the floor of the receiving vault which was the first resting place of the body of Abraham Lincoln.

Also jeopardized will be the future of Lake Springfield, a beautiful lake with a surface of 4,200 acres, which would remain as the only sizable lake in Sangamon County, storing palatable water and offering healthful recreational facilities.

The proposed dam at Petersburg would be 537 feet above sea level or 17 feet higher than Lake Springfield, which could subject the lake to flooding, making it vulnerable to pollution from raw sewage, and lessening the value of the lakeside property for permanent home sites.

Most concerned of all the taxpayers and landowners are the farmers themselves. The Sangamon County Farm Bureau estimates that 107 farm families will be forced to abandon their entire holdings, and 385 other families would lose from 10 percent to 90 percent of their acreage. In many instances, they would have no acreage except those upland sections on which their homes and farm buildings are located. These people would thus be stranded with facilities but no acreage to operate.

It is a gross injustice to summarily give these fine citizens their "walking papers." Indeed, they might easily become displaced persons, because where can they go to buy new farms in this period of high prices?

Not only will consummation of this program mean the removal of thousands of acres of land from the tax rolls, with a resultant heavier burden to be assumed by other sources of tax revenues, but it will mean a serious and permanent loss in crops. A survey has shown that the farm land in the valley of four of the tributaries in the area—Spring, Lick, South Fork, and Horse Creeks—have produced satisfactory crops in 39 out of the last 40 years.

The primary and high schools in Sangamon County would be affected seriously. Ten schools would be submerged completely, and many others would be virtually isolated. It will necessitate reorganization of 61 rural school districts, affecting 1,460 pupils, who would have to resort to more devious and expensive routes to attend school. In addition, 1,200 pupils in 10 of the county's 12 high schools would be affected. Only the high-school districts at Illiopolis and Mount Auburn would not be affected.

The 61 rural school districts contain 185,870 acres, of which 33,270 are within the projected flood area. Removal of this land from the tax rolls also would mean a severe financial loss to the school system and an added burden to the taxpayers.

Also seriously affected would be township, county, and State roads and bridges. Adversely affected would be 13 county roads and 86 township roads. Unless the Army engineers change their plans, the flood-control development means that 3 county roads would have to be raised, 3 township roads would have to be relocated, and 1 county road and 16 township roads would have to be abandoned altogether. It means also that 55 township roads would be submerged when the reservoirs are in full operation and that only 9 county roads and 15 township roads in the area would be left in normal service. Sangamon County alone would be required to reconstruct 47 bridges.

Engineers estimate relocation and reconstruction of these highways and bridges will cost the taxpayers of Sangamon County at least $720,000 immediately, plus an increased maintenance cost of $70,900 a year over a 50-year period, while additional costs may reach as high as three and one-half million dollars.

Also to be considered is the gigantic job of relocating or raising important bridges on State routes and on United States Routes 36 and 66, leading to such important communities as Decatur, Lincoln, Bloomington, Peoria, and Beardstown.

The Chicago & Illinois Midland Railroad would be required to reconstruct a number of bridges and to rebuild and raise its roadbed between Taylorville and Compro. Telephone and utility circuits and cables would all have to be altered.

Wildlife conservationists contend the projected reservoirs would dry up drainage districts, destroying natural duck and game sanctuaries.

Mr. Speaker, as I asserted previously, the citizens of the Twenty-first Illinois District are not opposed to the theory of flood control as long as the program adopted is fair and equitable and provided the results obtained will justify the expense. The present plan under consideration calls for expenditure of around $100,000,000, plus an outlay of almost $4,000,000 a year for maintenance. As against this, the Army engineers estimate the yearly reduction of $2,377,270 in flood losses along the Illinois River. This seems to me to be a small return on an extremely large investment for a program which, in reality, does nothing more than transfer flood drainage from one section of the State to another and creates a greater flood-control problem than the one sought to be solved.

Consequently, officials of the State of Illinois, together with officials and citizens of a number of Illinois counties in addition to Sangamon, Macoupin, and Christian Counties, and a number of trade and business associations and organizations are advocating adoption of a compromise plan which would yield the same benefits, but at less cost and at a minimum of adjustments to the lives and properties of the people concerned.

In essence, the compromise plan would call for creation of a series of natural lakes along the Illinois River itself by converting 50,000 acres of drainage lands to public use, and rearranging and strengthening the Illinois River's levee system. Under this plan, which I sincerely hope will receive the consideration of the Government's engineers, the need for so-called upland levees and dams on tributary streams would be eliminated or minimized.

Such a program, according to Hon. Arnold P. Benson, director of the Illinois State Department of Agriculture, and Hon. Livingston Osborne, director of the State department of conservation, could save the United States Government at least $5,000,000 and the Illinois State government approximately $20,000,000 as compared to the current plan suggested by the Army engineers. Government purchase of the marginal land along the Illinois River itself would displace fewer independent farmers and would not surround any major city with disease-breeding swamps.

As the Illinois State Journal has pointed out editorially—

> By knocking out sections of the levee along the Illinois, or installing floodgates in the levees for the maintenance of constant water levels in reservoirs along the river, central Illinois could become a sportsman's paradise and an asset to the State and private economy.

In this connection, Mr. W. B. Walraven, engineer of the Springfield Sanitary District, has been selected by the State of Illinois, in conjunction with the city of Springfield and other municipal bodies, as well as various groups of agricultural and sportsmen's organizations, to present such a compromise suggestion to control floods in the Illinois River.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that in all my years of experience, first as an attorney and more lately as a Representative in Congress, I have not seen a more classic example of unanimity between the officials and citizens of the State of Illinois, the county of Sangamon, and the city of Springfield in stressing their opposition to the Government's flood-control plan and in supporting the compromise suggestion I have just outlined.

The citizens are determined to exert every legal effort to achieve this end. Supporting the taxpayers and property owners in this endeavor are the aforementioned State officials, the Honorable John W. Kapp, mayor of Springfield; Hon. J. Emil Smith, editor of the Illinois State Journal and Register; Evan Taylor, president of the Sangamon County Farm Bureau; Edwin Bay, the bureau's adviser; W. O. Withrow, county superintendent of schools; Robert B. Irwin, secretary of the Springfield Chamber of Commerce; Ray V. Tilly, county superintendent of highways; Mr. Walraven; Dr. J. A. Lindquist, city superintendent of health; the Sangamon County Board of Supervisors, the chairman of which is Mr. Carlos W. Campbell; the Illinois Agricultural Association; the Sangamon County Agricultural Administration Association; the Illinois Federation of Sportsmen's Club, Ducks Unlimited; the Izaak Walton League; and a number of civic groups.

I sincerely and wholeheartedly pledge my full support and cooperation in assisting the people of the Twenty-first Congressional District and their leaders in attaining this goal. I join with them in urging the Army Board of Engineers to reopen negotiations with a view of adopting the compromise proposal, thus eliminating the cost of millions of dollars to the citizens of the district, the State of Illinois, and the Nation as a whole—an expenditure which is unnecessary, unwise, and unjust.

Letter of Harry de Chambeau, of Bay City, Mich.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a comprehensive and enlightening letter I received from a constituent, Mr. Harry de Chambeau, of Bay City, Mich. A reading of this communication will, I believe, indicate just how clearly some of the people back home are interpreting things now taking place in this country. I commend this gentleman's opinions to the careful consideration of the Members of this House:

BAY CITY, MICH., July 13, 1946.
Hon. ROY O. WOODRUFF,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WOODRUFF: At the end of the last war many of us referred to this as "a cockeyed world." In heaven's name, what shall we call this,

I heartily approve of your vote on this so-called British loan. This is no time for the extending of loans of any kind. We don't need to expand present markets. The way prices are acting in Bay City, demand greatly exceeds supply if there is any validity to that maxim at all. To common folks like us it seems the height of folly to give money to the other fellow so that he can turn right around and bid against you for things you have to have. Not that we don't believe in helping people who are starving or suffering in any way for lack of the common necessities of life but so far as we know that doesn't apply to Great Britain. I don't think any of us are so foolish as to make loans even to our best friends when they don't possess assets which are acceptable as collateral.

Let me illustrate: I've carried life insurance in companies British-owned, not mentioning insurance I've carried in other lines, such as fire, liability, etc. If the assets of such companies were bunched I venture to state they would represent a considerable sum. Possibly our bankers might be interested in this. How about other assets they have in this country, the Argentine, Brazil, Chile, Mexico, etc.? There's a surplus of dollars down there. Why ask us to put more of them in circulation when there are more of them than we actually need right now?

As a consumer we make no sense to such remarks as "We don't need the OPA." "Prices will equalize themselves when supply equalizes demand." In the meantime what? Something I saw in the paper today. Government agrees to pay 90 and some portion of a cent for silver. I remember when I was glad to get less than 50 cents an ounce. Is that letting the law of supply and demand function as some people would lead us to believe they would have it? It seems to some of us it is time to apply brakes of some sort. Stepping on the gas all the time ofttimes leads to serious consenquences. Might it not be advisable to stop for awhile and ask ourselves that simple question: the title of a book I once read: Quo Vadis.

David Harum was a good "hoss trader." As I recall he was an expert in doping up horses so that they brought high prices even more than good ones but the buyer always got the worst of it. Caveat emptor. Our laws would not countenance such action today or would they?

"We don't need an OPA." Possibly not. Then maybe we don't need tariffs, subsidies, or this law which we passed to guarantee the seller against loss until such time as we had passed postwar period. We wouldn't need it either if an honest attempt was made to put on the market the goods which we actually possess and not throw them in the river as I've witnessed with my own eyes right here in the city of Bay City. Carloads of melons, no market, they brought 5 cents a pound at our local stores; per melon all the way from $1 to $2. As a consumer, I'd like to ask, Is that in accordance with the law of supply and demand?

I have no objection to the payment of bonuses to men and women who served in the armed forces of the United States. But so far as it affects our economy it comes in the same category as loans and gifts to foreign countries. To me your Export-Import Bank, International Bank, the maintaining of huge military forces in foreign countries, the junking of military supplies of all kinds, by equipping the military forces of other nations not only with American uniforms but with American arms so that the people of those countries cannot tell really what our foreign policy is, in fact, leads them to believe that we are in league with such powers to keep them in subjection and to exploit them for our own benefit.

What I am trying to make clear is, there is no solution to any of the problems which confront us today unless we accept the principle that self-interest must give way to public interest wherever they conflict with each other. Have I made myself clear? I'm only a workingman, not averaging $50 a week, so I hope you will pardon me if I seem somewhat vague in setting forth the ideas which are in my mind.

Buying power: There's plenty of it, too much. Why create more? One of the best cease-and-desist orders that could be issued at this time is: No more credit without acceptable collateral. Banks here lack no money as can be easily proven by examining their published statements in the Bay City Times recently. We don't want to straitjacket anything but, in heaven's name, if you waste your resources now what will you do in 10 years from now?

A man told me once, "If you will examine history you will find that boom times are the result of loans." If this is true, then the opposite must be true also, "No loans and ipso facto, there you are, in a tail spin, and old man depression is around the corner."

Yes; after the last war with many others, I thought this world truly "cock-eyed." What shall we call this one?

Yours truly,

HARRY DE CHAMBEAU.

BAY CITY, MICH.

Hon. Clarence Cannon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT THOMAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as this Congress draws to a close, I think it proper to comment on the services of one of the outstanding Members of the House. I refer to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]. No Member of the House or of the Senate has carried a heavier load and more responsibility than he. In addition to his regular duties of taking care of his own district, which he has done in such an able manner, he has had the responsibility of financing the Federal Government.

That job would try the soul of any living man, but the gentleman from Missouri, CLARENCE CANNON, has worked quietly and without fanfare, and has performed his job to the great satisfaction, not only of the membership, but of every man who has an intimate knowledge of the many complex problems involved.

We all marvel at his energy and his almost superhuman capacity for work. The people of his great district have every reason to be proud of him. He has represented them with honor and with the good common horse sense that characterizes his great State of Missouri.

Those good Missourians, and particularly those of his own district, must be proud that they have produced a man whose service to the Nation and to his own district is comparable with that of the President and of his Cabinet officers.

Reorganization of Congress

OF
HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials which appeared yesterday in the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 28, 1946]

CONGRESS REFORMS ITSELF

During the last few weeks, Congress, in an effort to clear away a great mass of complicated and important legislation in a hurry, has involved itself in dismaying tangles. The shadow of the forthcoming elections, hanging over all the Representatives and a good many Senators, has added to the appearance of confusion—to long debates for the record alternating with hasty votes, to numerous amendments, to wide divergences between the two Houses and between Congress and the administration. Nevertheless, Congress found time to get in some good work, and not the least of its achievements was to reorganize its own archaic structure.

To be sure, the reorganization bill was in part the victim of the practices it was intended to correct. The jam of legislation on the eve of adjournment forced the Senate supporters of the measure to consent to House amendments without sending them to a conference committee, and as has too often been the case in this session, the House amendments were largely unfortunate. A provision for policy committees, which would have greatly aided Congress in charting its legislative course, was eliminated. The House plan for adding to congressional incomes by increasing salaries $2,500 annually and giving another $2,500—tax-free—for expenses, had an appearance of equivocation which was lacking in the Senate proposal for a straight $5,000-a-year salary rise.

Nevertheless, the main point—the provision for an added incentive to attract good men to Congress and for the wherewithal to meet their heavy obligations—was achieved. And the bill in other respects is a good one, even if it does not go as far as many hoped. The number of standing committees, which through a long process of accretion, had increased to a point which made greater demands on individual Congressmen than could possibly be met with efficiency and which caused overlapping of functions at many vital points, has been drastically reduced. The new legislative budget plan, as sort of congressional guide to expenditures, is frankly an experiment; but it is one that seems called for by the current loose method of piling appropriation on appropriation.

In sum, the reorganization bill, long hoped for, long ensnarled in conflicts of interest within Congress, marks real progress. The absolute necessity for the utmost possible intelligence and efficiency in the National Legislature during the troubled years ahead is all too obvious. That Congress has shown so real a sense of this necessity and has gone so far to meet it, is as encouraging a sign as has appeared on Capitol Hill in many a month.

FOR A STRONGER CONGRESS

Although it did not achieve in a single step all the reforms needed, Congress has sent to the White House a reorganization bill that assures much self-improvement. One provision alone is a notable gain, the reduction in number of Senate committees from 33 to 15 and House committees from 48 to 19. This is in line with a recommendation made more than a year ago by a report to the National Planning Association, which suggested 15 regular standing committees in each branch. Another excellent change will call the appropriations and taxing committees of both Chambers together at the beginning of each year to recommend a Federal budget and set a maximum to be spent. Registry of lobbyists in the corridors of Capitol Hill, with a listing of employees and expenses, seems a sensible stipulation. Congress Members are underpaid at $10,000 a year, from the standpoint of their responsibilities, the present trend of living costs and the kind of men and women we want to attract to that office. The intcrease they have voted themselves is moderate.

Congress has long suffered from a multiplicity of committees and committee assignments. Some Senators have been on as many as 10 standing and special committees, besides having the duty to be on the floor and carrying a heavy burden of office work. Legislative action has suffered through failure to find quorums on the floor or in committee, a situation easy to seize upon as a device for delay.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, one of the authors, acknowledges that the passed bill is not perfect. But it is a beginning and a good one. Congress Members should now be able to do their job more creditably, and, having less anxiety over their personal pocketbooks, can confine their attention more fully to the essential business of making the Nation's laws.

Farm Tractors for Russian-Dominated Countries

REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the United States has set up an organization known as Civilian Production Administration to supervise production of food to the maximum. UNRRA is the international machinery for distribution of food to the hungry peoples of the world. The United States supplies about 70 percent of the wheat to UNRRA for the European theater at the same time furnishing 72 percent of the money.

We scraped the bottom of the wheat and flour bins this spring and early summer to supply food for the hungry. We were glad to stint in our own food to feed the hungry. Officials tell us we must continue to ship foods, fats, and wheat until early next summer, to prevent starvation.

The American farmer with labor shortage, and worst of all, farm machinery and tractors shortage, has done a remarkable job. Many farm tractors are in need of replacement and it looks like it will be a few years before the most urgent need can be supplied right at home.

Now, along comes order L–356, which in effect, orders the tractor industry of the United States to ship to UNRRA 14,500 tractors for use in European countries now dominated by Russia. It would be another matter if these tractors were to go to South American countries or Australia, France, Belgium, and Holland that know how to use them. The alleged purpose of UNRRA is to produce food quickly in the Russian-dominated countries with American tractors and in countries that have little or no knowledge of mechanized farming.

I have made many inquiries of people who are familiar with farming practices in these countries. To begin with, most of these farm lands are small and would not lend themselves to a quick change over to economic mechanized farming. Even by the time the tractors could be made and shipped to them, it would be too late for a crop next year.

These 14,500 tractors, if placed, in countries that are familiar with their use, would certainly be far more sensible for quick production of food.

There are practically no tractor mechanics in these Russian-dominated countries. All mechanized farming is absolutely dependent upon trained and expert servicing centers convenient to the farmer. When a tractor, combine, corn picker, or any other farm machine breaks down, it is not when it stands idle, but when it is in operation and even if for only a few days delay in getting parts, often means a serious loss in the harvested crop. Again I say, these 14,500 tractors could be of greater service to the hungry world if they were placed in countries who are familiar with their operation and who have expert mechanics to service them.

Were it not for my own personal knowledge and observations of UNRRA's administration and operations in foreign countries, I could not have believed that any American could expect a transition in one year such as from an ox or donkey power to a modern American tractor.

It is inconceivable, except that I recall a ceiling price fixer of live beef cattle for OPA testified before my Committee on Agriculture that "he never had had a single day's experience in business or farming in his life."

Poland, Czechoslavkia, Yugoslavia, and much of eastern Europe is under Russian rule. Are we furnishing tractors to UNRRA to be owned by Russia?

I say the American farmer, if given these tractors, would produce many times more food for hungry Europe than this wasteful proposal.

A farm tractor could be of no use in these Russian-dominated countries without specially built attachments and implements to be operated by the tractor. To be useful, they should be sold as a unit for many purposes.

We would have to recruit many tractor servicemen for UNRRA and, as usual, at higher rates than American rates paid by you, Mr. Taxpayer.

I hope that UNRRA will solicit the advice and counsel of the tractor industry on tractor farming in these Russian-dominated countries before pressing the issue of supplying these countries with American-made and much-needed 14,500 tractors. Who knows better than the tractor manufacturers who spend millions in efforts to sell tractors?

If these tractors are shipped, the American farmer will be at a disadvantage because a very large amount of repair parts needed in home stocks would have been, necessarily, diverted to Russian-dominated countries.

For want of a nail, a shoe was lost; for want of a shoe, a horse was lost; and for want of a spark plug or carburetor, a tractor was lost.

The United States Is Still a Land of Opportunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, statistics are not, as a rule, good reading matter, but I venture to state that a careful study of the immigration and naturalization statistics which I am including at the end of these remarks will tell an interesting story, without further explanation. These naturalization tables have been prepared by a division of the Department of Justice and show the number of foreign individuals who have become American citizens during the past 10 critical years. I was not able to find out as to the number of individuals from foreign countries who desire to come to the United States, but I am positive that they are far in excess of one million.

Aliens naturalized (certificates of naturalization issued), years ended June 30, 1936 to 1945, by countries of former allegiance

What Became of $21,000,000,000?

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, there have been several recent sessions of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries examining into the disclosures of the audit of the Maritime Commission for the period ended June 30, 1943, which has been suppressed for a long period of time and evidently first came to public notice after insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 23, 1946.

This sampling and simple audit of vouchers does not cover a transaction-by-transaction audit of the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration, but in spite of that it has uncovered that ships were certified as seagoing after they were laying in port for repairs, that false entries on the books were made at the direction of those responsible for the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration, that the Kaiser syndicate was advanced $2,000,000 and the books of the Maritime Commission showed that they paid it to Kaiser for ship construction, that thousands of dollars were paid for entertainment and ship launchings, that $250,000 was authorized for memory courses as part of ship construction, that more than $200,000,000 were paid up to November 1943 as fees for building ships where the Federal Government had paid for the land, paid for the buildings on the land, paid for the machinery on the land, paid for the labor to build the ships, paid for the material that went into the ships, paid for all administrative help concerning the building of the ships and paid for so-called executive brains up to $25,000 a person, that there is absolutely no check and accounting of property purchased by the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration except that which they make themselves, and that no independent agency or auditor of the Government has made a periodic check of $21,000,000,000 worth of property purchased by the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration as to whether the property went into ships, whether it was given away, or whether it still is in existence and with the Government.

With this as a sample of the uncoverings growing out of a voucher audit which does not authorize an airtight audit where every transaction is examined where it is made certain that the Government receives property for the money, where it is made certain what became of every item of property, where it is made certain what has become of every item of money, where it is made certain what has been destroyed or thrown away by waste and extravagance and where it has been made certain what money has been given away especially where they paid money on the basis of moral assets and not on investment, with no special investigators and undercover investigation as to fraud covering the use of Government money and especially property.

With this simple sampling to June 30, 1943, what has become of this expenditure of $21,000,000,000? The public and the taxpayers are entitled to know what became of the money, what became of the property, what became of the records, and what became of the people who assisted in the questionable transactions.

The members of the Maritime Commission were informed by the Comptroller General in 1942 that the records of Mr. Anderson were not available to check and examine the 1942 statement of the Maritime Commission, yet the members of the Maritime Commission approved this conduct and lack of records of its transactions, wished Mr. Anderson well, and kept him on the job to further complicate the expenditure of $21,000,000,000 by the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration, and only in February 1946 did Mr. Anderson leave the Maritime Commission after the Comptroller General's report of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, first came to public attention in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 23, 1946.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill whereby the Comptroller General has the full and complete right and is directed to make an airtight audit and examination as detailed in the bill so that the American people and the taxpayers of this country can definitely know what became of $21,000,000,000 spent by the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration during the period of the war.

I include the bill herewith:

A bill to authorize a special investigation, examination and complete audit of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration, by the Comptroller General

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General is authorized and directed to cause a special investigation and audit to be made (in addition to any investigation and audit heretofore made) of all accounts and transactions of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration, showing the receipt, disbursement and application of public funds, and the acquisition, receipt, and disposition of property by such agencies, beginning with respect to each agency on January 1, 1939, or the date of creation of such agency, whichever is later, and continuing to the date of enactment of this act. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the investigation and audit shall include the following:

(a) An item-by-item examination of all accounts showing receipts, disbursements and application of public funds;

(b) Any expenditure made without authority of law;

(c) Any acquisition, receipt, or disposition of property made without authority of law;

(d) Any property acquired or disposed of at a monetary loss to the United States;

(e) All contracts for services, agencies, charters, property, ships and payments and contracts for payments covering property and services over and above OPA prices and ceilings;

(f) Any waste, inefficiency, or extravagance in the expenditure of public funds;

(g) Any waste, inefficiency, or extravagance in the acquisition, receipt, or disposition of property;

(h) Any cooperation, encouragement, or assistance rendered to any person, firm, association, or corporation having a contract with the United States under the jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission or the War Shipping Administration, by either of such agencies, in tax minimization or tax avoidance by placing earnings under such contract in tax exempt funds or otherwise;

(i) Any fraud or illegal acts committed by any person connected with the Maritime Commission or the War Shipping Administration in connection with the receipt, disbursement, or application in connection with the receipt, disbursement, or application of any public funds, or the acquisition or disposition of any property;

(j) Any fraud or illegal acts committed by any person, firm, association, or corporation having a contract with the United States under the jurisdiction of the Maritime Commission or the War Shipping Administration, in connection with the receipt, disbursement, or application of any public funds or the acquisition or disposition of any property under such contract. .

SEC. 2. For the purpose of making the special investigation and audit of the Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration, the Comptroller General may use any officer or employee now under his jurisdiction and is authorized to employ and fix the compensation of such additional accountants, special investigators, attorneys, officers, experts, and employees as he deems necessary without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 3. The Comptroller General shall report to the Congress as soon as practicable the results of his investigation and audit, together with such recommendations as he deems advisable.

Do the American People Want Regimented Medical Care?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, certain groups and individuals in this country are demanding the passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell medical care bill, which legislation proposes the creation of a huge governmental agency to take care of the health of all of the people. It is a compulsory plan for medical care, since all wage earners are required to contribute to it. The same groups and individuals are also the main advocates of Government control over the business activities and pursuits of the American people.

While the proponents of the new medical care plan, including President Truman, publicly claim that this proposal is not socialized medicine, a careful reading of the bill discloses a scheme which injects the hands and control of Government bureaucracy into every home. It may be possible that some individuals need assistance and direction from Washington when it comes to a matter of health, but the rank and file of the American people, who love their freedom, are still competent to select doctors of their own choice, without being blueprinted and regimented from the Nation's Capital.

I am not a doctor, but I have spent many years in Washington observing the growth and power of bureaucracy. The disgusting thing about many Government agencies is the utter lack of responsibility, coupled with bungling, delays, and buck-passing. I am, therefore, convinced that the proposed agency to administer medical care will be just another bureau—reaching into every community and home, with the primary objective of selling a political philosophy under the guise of attending the health of the people. This customary political activity, coupled with the regimentation and planning of bureaucracy, can only be construed as an open attempt to provide the people with socialized medicine.

I asked permission to make these remarks to give the Members of the House the opportunity of reading the views of Dr. William F. Braasch, one of the outstanding medical authorities in Minnesota and the country, on the question, "Do the American people want regimented medical care?" You will find his views, which follow, worthy of your serious consideration:

DO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE WANT REGIMENTED MEDICAL CARE?

(By Dr. William F. Braasch, M. D.)

The American people are interested in proposed change in medical care largely because they desire increased availability of medical service and a method by which its cost to the individual can be lowered. Several Nation-wide polls have demonstrated that the most commonly voiced complaint made by the public concerning medical care is relative to its cost.

The ostensible objective of legislation embodied in the version of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill which is now awaiting congressional action is to correct the objectionable feature in medical care that has just been mentioned. The attitude of the medical profession is shown in a platform adopted by the American Medical Association which calls for availability of medical care of a high quality to every person in the United States. The objectives of this bill and of the American Medical Association are the same, but the methods which have been proposed to achieve these objectives are radically different. In what respects do the two plans differ?

An analysis of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill reveals that it contains two main divisions which are grouped under titles I and II. In title I are sections which deal with the following phases of medical problems: (1) increased availability of hospitalization, (2) extension of public health service, (3) medical education and research, and (4) compensation for the loss of earnings due to sickness. No one would have any objection to the main objectives of these sections of the bill, providing the methods by which these objectives were to be achieved were kept free from any political involvement and providing the expenditure incurred would come within the limitations of the Nation's economic ability. Many of the objectives are included in other bills previously introduced.

Title II is devoted largely to a proposed system of compulsory prepaid sickness insurance. This is the main objective of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill.

Let us first review the various provisions included in title II of the bill.

1. It proposes a system of compulsory sickness insurance. This means that, according to the law, in order to secure Government health benefit, millions of our citizens would have to contribute from their earnings in amounts as large as $12 per month.

2. The practice of medicine would be placed under the control of one man, the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service. He in turn would be subject to the dictates of a politically appointed Social Security Board without physicians as members. A third party, namely the Government, would be brought between the doctor and the patient and the doctor would be responsible to that third party and not to the patient.

3. The free choice of physicians, ostensibly provided by the bill, really means that the patient may freely choose only from among the physicians who will take part in the panel scheme. It has been predicted that most capable physicians would not go on the panel. The number and selection of patients to be taken care of by any one physician would be governed by the regulations and not by the patients' choice.

4. An administrative bureaucracy of tremendous proportions would be developed. It has been estimated that several million persons would be necessary to administer the system. The cost of administration alone would be enormous. Judging from experience in England, administration costs would form the largest item in the health care budget.

5. A program of medical care as outlined in title II of the bill would be enormously expensive. The wage assessment proposed would be insufficient to meet the costs. It would result in greatly increased taxes for the entire population of the United States.

6. Opportunity for political distribution of medical service would be established. Red tape and inefficiency would cause serious deterioration in the quality of medical care.

7. Initiative and incentive to progress on the part of individual doctors would be largely destroyed. The medical profession would be regimented and robbed of its self-respect.

8. The personal relationship between physician and patient would be largely eliminated. Private clinical records would become public property. The doctor would become an employee of the government.

9. The present high standards of medical care would deteriorate. Two standards would result; namely, private medical care for those who could afford it, and government care—quantity without sufficient regard for quality.

What has the medical profession to offer in solution of the problem of lowering the burden of cost and increasing the availability of medical care?

Rather than adopt revolutionary measures, such as are proposed in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, the medical profession favors more democratic plans. It believes that the best interests of public health are served by adopting voluntary plans of prepayment sickness insurance, such as those established under the supervision of many State and county medical societies. During the last 10 years an increasing number of State medical associations have pioneered in this form of sickness insurance. This movement now has spread to some 24 States and in most of the other States plans for establishment of similar programs, are being made. The American Medical Association recently placed its stamp of approval on such a solution of the problem of medical service. It has formed a federation of State plans, with a director in the headquarters of the American Medical Association, making sickness insurance available on a national basis. Sickness insurance of this type promises to be widely adopted. Means now are offered whereby medical care is made available to everyone who wants it. Under such a plan many objections which would exist with Federal controls of medical practice, as provided in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, will be eliminated.

Some of the States have adopted plans for prepayment insurance by means of private insurance companies. Although this type of insurance has been available for many years, the premium rates were so high that most families in the lower income levels did not avail themselves of this form of protection. It is only recently, because of wider coverage in large groups, that insurance companies have been able to offer insurances at such a low rate that it is more readily available.

It is not generally recognized to what extent industry has established systems of protection for employees against the cost of illness. By means of liberal insurance policies the cost of hospital, medical, and surgical care is provided for at very low rates. In a recent survey by the National Physicians' Committee it was found that more than 25,000,000 people are protected by some form of employer-employee insurance. It is possible to develop this form of insurance further, so as to offer greater coverage to a larger segment of the population.

All of these voluntary plans for sickness insurance maintain the principles which are necessary to good medical care; namely, the personal and confidential relationship between the patient and doctor, free choice of physicians, and the preservation of individual initiative and stimulation to progress on the part of the doctor.

Why should this country adopt medical plans which are alien to our previous thought and methods of living? Comparing medical care in our country with that in countries which have adopted State control or compulsory sickness insurance, shows that the standards of medical care in our country are much higher and medical service is much more satisfactory.

Why should we experiment with methods which have failed elsewhere when prepayment sickness insurance now has been available by the medical profession and when this insurance will permit the ends which are desired without lowering the present high standards of medical care?

Why should this country adopt revolutionary and visionary regimentation of a large segment of the population, which not alone would be injurious to the best interests of public health, but which would involve a cost so great that when added to other financial obligations, the economic stability of the country would be threatened?

The provisions of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill have been given careful consideration by members of the medical profession. An overwhelming majority (estimated at more than 90 percent) of those who are actually engaged in the practice of medicine have stated their opposition to compulsory sickness insurance and Federal control of medicine. Such a stand on the part of the physician cannot be ascribed to selfish motives, since under the proposed plan the income of a great many physicians would be increased. The physician's opposition to the proposed bill exists largely because he knows that the quality of medical care would deteriorate. He knows that the incentive for the best form of medical practice would no longer be based on merit or on competitive effort and progress on the part of the physician, but that the quality of medical practice would be reduced to a dead level.

Price Controls

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding of the aim and purpose of Congress in the last OPA bill which was passed not only to prevent inflation but also to bring about such decontrol as is feasible and economically possible. In this connection it seems to me it should be the policy of both the Secretary of Agriculture and the head of OPA that controls be not placed upon commodities where the prices have remained stable, particularly where the prices have remained below the ceiling price during the period when there was no OPA.

In this connection I submit for the RECORD the figures of the prices of citrus fruits which pertained during the period when there was no OPA in existence and urge their consideration in the determination of this policy. It will be noted that average prices received by producers during this period were substantially below the OPA ceiling prices. Reimposition of ceilings has not reduced prices paid by consumers but has had the effect of reducing returns to producers and widening the gap between those returns and retail prices.

John Thomas

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 28, 1946

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN THOMAS, late a Senator from the State of Idaho

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, JOHN THOMAS, with devotion and loyalty, served his Nation, State, and fellow men. Simplicity characterized his earthly career, which was nevertheless crowned with achievement. Displaying industry, perseverance, and an indomitable will power, he won success in many endeavors. Idahoans recognized his sterling worth and several times elected him to the United States Senate.

For almost four decades, JOHN THOMAS contributed materially to the upbuilding of the Gem State. As a pioneer stockman and banker, he aided vastly in the development of the livestock and agricultural industry. His genuine character and natural ability won him a host of friends, and he never failed to assist those who sought his aid.

Shortly after his arrival in Idaho Senator THOMAS took an active part in political affairs, soon becoming chairman of the Republican State central committee. Under his guidance, his party made exceptional progress and directed State affairs.

Possessing rugged individualism himself, the Senator always supported a political philosophy which would protect the rights of citizens under our free enterprise system. His fundamental faith in mankind undoubtedly was responsible for his concept of the supremacy of the individual over the power of the State. He recognized that representative government provides the safeguards under which man attains his greatest liberty and highest accomplishments.

Political honors and business success made little change in the perspective of this outstanding American. He still derived much enjoyment from fellowship with his old friends and political associates. He did not vary his habits from the early pioneer days, and he always cherished the commonplace things of life.

Senator THOMAS, as a member of the majority party in the Senate from 1927 to 1933, was an acknowledged authority on livestock and financial subjects. As a member of the finance or revenue committee, he was a tower of strength and wisdom. Although seldom making speeches, he was influential in committee and party deliberations. Being appointed for the second time to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate, he succeeded Senator Borah in 1940. His party then was in the minority, but his past service and extensive experience gave him prestige and influence.

Those intimately acquainted with Senator THOMAS were aware that the greatest inspiration in his successful career was his devoted wife. When Mrs. Thomas passed away in 1943, the Senator's subsequent actions reflected his poignant grief. He was profoundly affected by the loss of the companionship and the sympathetic understanding and guidance of the helpmate who had shared his triumphs and his sorrows. Although he still lavished affection upon his daughter and two grandchildren, he no longer displayed his former zeal.

Idahoans cherish the memory of this outstanding public servant. The life of JOHN THOMAS exemplified to the highest degree the opportunities available to every citizen in this country which he so dearly loved. May eternal peace be his just reward.

To Rebuild Guam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. GRANT
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in a recent issue of the New York Times and comments on H. R. 7044, which I recently introduced:

TO REBUILD GUAM

On July 20, 1944, the marines under General Geiger invaded Guam, the little western Pacific island we had won without bloodshed from Spain in 1898 and which the Japanese had taken from us in the early days of the war. In the process of the prelanding bombing and bombardment, and the subsequent hard fighting before the Japanese garrison was annihilated, practically every building on the island was leveled by our own bombs and shells. The principal city, Agana, was an especially beautiful island town, with many stone buildings. Hardly one stone was left upon another there.

The war ended almost a year ago. Agana still is in ruins. The plight of the Guamians is one of official neglect that can hardly be overestimated. It was not until Tuesday that the House got around to passing a bill, that had been passed by the Senate last November, setting aside $6,000,000 for rebuilding some of the structures—the public buildings—we had knocked down with bomb and shell. Other measures to repay the Chamorros partially for their loyal war service were delayed in the Navy Department for months after passage by Congress.

This congressional and Navy Department delay is only the latest entry in a long record of neglect by the United States of a fine and intelligent people who came under our flag almost by accident 48 years ago. Had it not been for the war with Japan, few Americans probably would even have recognized the name, or known in what ocean the island lay. It is hoped that happier days are ahead for the Guamians. Several bills covering Guam, Samoa, and other of our island possessions are pending. Representative GRANT of Indiana has introduced in the House a bill (H. R. 7044) which would organize Guam as a Territory, putting it under civilian instead of Navy Department rule. Another bill before the House (H. R. 3528) would grant the Guamians citizenship. As much as they would like their cities rebuilt, which the $6,000,000 will partly do, the Guamians also would welcome the change in their status which citizenship and organization as a Territory would bring them. If any people under the American flag would seem to have won the right to full citizenship, the Chamorros of Guam would seem to be near the top of the list. We have neglected them for 48 years. It is about time Congress took a good look at our colonial possessions and started doing something about them. Passage of H. R. 3528 and H. R. 7044 would be an important first step.

The Truth About the North Side Extension of the Minidoka Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, because of certain misrepresentations concerning the north side extension of the Minidoka project being circulated in my district, I am undertaking at this time to clarify the matter so that my constituents may know the truth. As there was widespread local interest, and as returning war veterans recognized that the proposed north side extension offered the most desirable project for farmsteads in Idaho, I spent an hour discussing the project with Michael W. Straus, Commissioner of Reclamation, and William Warne, Assistant Commissioner, in my office January 9, 1946. Further discussions were held later.

As the result of these conferences, the 1947 budget for the Interior Department included $100,000 for surveys and accumulation of data on the extension. The 1947 appropriation bill for that department, prepared by the committee of which I am a member, included the $100,000 with the provision that it be expended prior to July 1, 1947, to determine the extent of the irrigable area, accumulate field data for engineering designs, and locate sources of construction materials, routes of access roads and sites for centralized construction operations. Following are excerpts of hearings conducted February 25, 1946, by my appropriations subcommittee:

Mr. STRAUS. The matter of this north-side development was first called to my attention by Congressman DWORSHAK, and we had several discussions of it. * * * I was well aware of Mr. DWORSHAK'S interest in the project. As a matter of fact, Mr. DWORSHAK'S representations were all directed toward the needed development of this north-side area and were a primary cause of my making such a submission at this time.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I represented to you that there was widespread interest on the part of returning war veterans who recognized that proposed development as offering the most desirable project for farmsteads in Idaho.

Mr. STRAUS. You are certainly correct, because the mails and the telegrams proved it. * * * I want the record to show that this whole matter of the north-side extension was first very definitely, specifically, and factually called to the Bureau of Reclamation's attention by Congressman DWORSHAK, and Commissioner Warne and myself spent several hours discussing it with him, and the result of that discussion; that is, as the result of it, it was lifted from the realm of forgotten commitments into something definite.

Mr. Speaker, since completion of American Falls Reservoir 20 years ago, there has been allocated about 400,000 acre-feet of storage there for the ultimate use of the north-side extension. Therefore, the funds appropriated for this fiscal year should complete preconstruction surveys and insure construction of the project as outlined by the Bureau during 1948 and 1949.

Something for Nothing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I wish to include in the RECORD, by request, an article by Dean Russell, entitled "Something for Nothing," which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post for June 29, 1946:

SOMETHING FOR NOTHING—AN AIR FORCES VETERAN VIEWS WITH UNHAPPY SKEPTICISM THE TRENDS OF THOUGHT IN THIS COUNTRY, PARTICULARLY AMONG CERTAIN GOVERNMENT "EXPERTS" AND SOME OF HIS FELLOW EX-SERVICEMEN

(By Dean Russell)

Fifty-six years ago, a representative in my home State of Virginia proposed a bill to make pi (Π) equal an even 3.00000 instead of the awkward 3.14159+ now found in the math books. "If everybody pretended it was an even three it would work," he said. "Also it would make things easier for high-school math students."

We smile at that now because we know there are certain mathematical and natural laws that cannot be changed. We know that "something for nothing" is a false philosophy. Or de we? Some of my fellow graduate students in a great eastern university do not.

Recently they gave serious consideration to a Government housing expert who said to us, "The United States Government should guarantee adequate housing at low rental to every family in the Nation." The students applauded.

When I asked the Government expert where the money was coming from he said, "Now please do not pull that old balanced-budget gag on me." The journalism students laughed at my defeat.

Thoroughly pleased with his victory, the Government housing expert continued his funeral service for private industry.

"Capitalists do not know the meaning of hard work," he said. "How could those scions of the rich understand the problems of the workingman? The Government should give the workers a bigger share."

While the students applauded his offer of "something for nothing," I thought of the life story of the only capitalist I really know—my brother. At least I think he is a capitalist, since he creates jobs and pays wages. But when I am tempted to hate him and what he represents another picture comes to mind.

I remember stacking dirty dishes in a tray and shoving them through a machine. At the other end stood my brother—that capitalistic monster. Only he did not look dangerous then. He just looked tired and dirty. You see, he had to wash dishes 3 hours a day to eat.

At the same time he was going to school. While other students went skiing for the week end, he—the damned capitalist—worked all Saturday for $3. Every 6 weeks he walked over to the local hospital and sold a pint of his blood. Most of the money went for the rent on our basement apartment. The rest he saved.

So now he has that small business he dreamed about. He is his own boss, and I believe he has earned that privilege.

Yet our imported speaker, and a lot of other articulate people, now call my brother's kind a menace to society. They say private industry is a failure and should be taken over by the Government. They would abolish the dynamo of American greatness and destroy the dreams of future Edisons, Fords, and Carnegies. But the bitterest pill of all is hearing an intelligent class of young Americans agreeing with that un-American attitude.

Those fellow students of mine are future reporters, editors, and publishers. And they say the Government's job is to build houses. They fail to realize the inherent danger in that philosophy. Already the Government says who is to live in its houses. The next logical step might be to tell the tenants how they must live in them.

While my fellow students continued cheering for free Government housing and jeering at free individual enterprise, another Government expert stepped to the rostrum.

He was a specialist in the field of education. And he said, "The Government should guarantee a free college education to every student who wants one."

Again my fellow students applauded. "A free college education is the answer to all our problems," they echoed.

I suggested the possibility of the Government's choosing the courses to be studied if it supplies the money. In fact, the Government already forbids certain courses under the GI bill of rights. For instance, my interest lies in business journalism. Obviously, I would be in a better position for a job as a financial reporter if I had a knowledge of both business and journalism. With that in mind, I completed half of the 2-year graduate course in business administration at Harvard. Then I entered a graduate school of journalism and completed half of its standard 1-year course. Before I could finish either school, my draft board called me.

After 4 years and 4 months in uniform, I returned to school. I was informed that the American people had decided to help any veteran who wanted to complete his education. I asked the New York regional office of the Veterans' Administration to approve my educational plan of a year and a half in college. They refused.

Naturally, I asked why. They said my plan of a half year at one school and a full year at another school was forbidden in the GI bill of rights. The fact that I had completed half of both courses at my own expense had no effect on the Veterans' Administration.

Then I read Public Law 346 myself. It states that the veteran can attend "any institution of his own choice and any field or branch of knowledge which the institution finds him qualified to pursue." In fact, one sentence in the bill says that nothing in the act will be interpreted to mean that a veteran cannot change schools or courses, provided he has the approval of the Administrator.

I showed that sentence to an administrator in the New York office. He said, "That's just it. You don't have my approval."

And that was final. After more than 4 years in the Army, I was approved for exactly a half year in school, and no more.

Seemingly, there is no recourse. I wrote letters and waited in line, with the usual result. I found it impossible to reason with bureaucracy. I discovered that my taxes help pay the salary of a public servant who refused to see me. I saw proof that a little power is a dangerous thing.

Fortunately, I can go ahead with my original study plan, if I am willing to return to dishwashing and furnace stoking to do it. That is my problem, and I will work it out. But suppose, as so many now advocate, the Government owned and operated all the schools? Then I would have no choice. Also, there might be no free press and private industry to train for.

"Why should the Government give money to a stupid critic like you?" my listeners said, and walked away.

I am glad I live in a country where free men and women can listen or walk away, as they see fit.

After hearing those Government experts advocate the end of individualism, I wondered if the individuals themselves agreed with that theory. My reporting assignments gave me ample opportunity to find the answer, and it was mostly frightening.

As an example, one of my assignments was unemployment compensation. I found a line of about 30 men waiting to file claims against the Government.

"What's so good about a country where you can't get a job?" one man asked me.

I told him there were "men wanted" signs in seven windows within one block of us.

"Sucker jobs," he replied. "Why should I work 40 hours a week for $26 when the Government will pay me $20 not to work?" I had no answer. Then he added, "The Government should guarantee a man enough money to raise his family in comfort."

When I suggested that he might be forced to work at a job he did not like if he had a Government guaranty, he said, "I would quit first. Nobody is going to make me keep a job I don't like."

I am glad I live in a country where a man can quit a job and look for another if he feels like it. But suppose the Government controlled all the jobs?

Another time I was assigned to write a story on veterans. They, too, wanted more bureaucracy. Most of those interviewed seemed to think the world owed them a living just because they once wore a uniform. Men who had never owned a house were demanding that the Government get them one, and get it now. Youths who had once worked for $18 were now demanding $50. And some of them were threatening violence if the Government did not give it to them.

A good many veterans in school also had that same "something-for-nothing" attitude. One married veteran said to me, "It is not fair for the Government to give the same amount of money to a married man with no children as it gives me with a wife and three children. I should get more."

"It's your own fault you have so many kids," another answered.

"I get less than either of you just because I am not married," complained a third.

I thought of how Mussolini once bellowed to 30,000 massed Italian women, "Give me more bambinos and I will give you more money."

They answered, "We will."

When I mentioned that fact to a student friend of mine, he said, "Well what's wrong with that? Do you think little children should be allowed to go hungry and uneducated just because their parents can't support them? The Government should give a bonus to parents with large families."

Since my friend appeared sincere in his belief, I decided to use a parable to point out the possible cost of letting the Government in on our personal problems. "Do you like chewing gum?" I asked. He did.

"I hate the stuff," I said. "And if I had the power, I would destroy all the gum factories. I would pass a law making the chewing of gum a capital offense. I would burn all books mentioning chewing gum."

"Take it easy, old man," he said.

"Wait," I replied. "I am not finished. I would have the Army out searching for gum chewers. Then I would form my own secret police to watch the Army. I would even have 'thought police' to prevent people from thinking about gum."

My friend was now thoroughly alarmed. I felt I had got my point across. What I would do to gum another man might do to religion and races, and political beliefs if he had the power.

"You must be drunk," he said, "Now if you were talking about religion or races or political beliefs, I would agree with you. But chewing gum! Why, that is silly!"

I am glad I live in a country where any man can discuss any other man's religion or politics, but where no man has the power to destroy them. And no man will ever have that power as long as the Government is dependent upon us for its existence, and not the other way around.

Then my friend challenged me. "Since you keep saying it is dangerous to give the Government too much power, just how do you propose solving our problems?"

"Did you ever hear of the Golden Rule?" I asked.

"Isn't it a bit dated?" he said.

Yes; I guess it is a bit dated for these times. Our philosophy seems to be "let others do it for us."

"Did you ever hear of the human equation?" I continued.

"What's that?"

"The human equation is simply human nature that has defied both law and reason since man was created. It is people being born with varying degree of brain power and different personalities. It allows us to sigh at the death of a million Chinese and cry at the death of a pet dog. It causes us to believe that skin color and intelligence have a definite relationship. It makes misers out of some people and philanthropists out of others. It goes among the poor and finds an Abraham Lincoln, a Booker T. Washington, an Enrico Caruso. It laughs at both kings and paupers. In short, it insures against any two persons thinking alike on all subjects. And you and I are extreme examples of it."

"Aren't you just avoiding the issue with a lot of beautiful words?" my friend asked.

"What issue?"

"Redistribution of wealth and giving everyone an equal opportunity by force of Government," he replied.

Back from two years in Europe, where people could hardly spit without the Government's approval, I hear young Americans my own age repeating the same words over and over again: "force," "more government," and "gimme." It scares me.

There is a safer and better answer. It is found in this typical American story: In my small town, there once lived a kid with no parents. His neighbors were interested in making this a better world. They proved it by feeding that kid as best they could. It was finally decided, logically enough, that he would be better off in an orphanage. There he was taught that "something for nothing," is a false philosophy. I know because I was that kid.

On my eighteenth birthday, I was given a new suit, five dollars and a handshake. The superintendent said, "Son, we have done the best we could. Now it is up to you. The world is yours if you wish to pay the price."

I did not think him corny then, and I still do not. Since that day, hundreds of people have personally helped me along the way without forcing me to adopt their religion or politics or prejudices. And there are ten people near me I can help tomorrow if only I will. That is the very essence of democracy.

It cost me over four years of Army regimentation to help preserve that American concept of freedom. I was willing to pay that price to insure freedom from permanent regimentation. Now I find people screaming for more regimentation through more Government. Those people tell me I can keep my freedom even under strict Government control. Again I am being promised "something for nothing," and I know it is impossible.

America Needs an Integrated Sea-Air Transportation Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, American steamship lines are being denied permission by the Civil Aeronautics Board to operate airplanes as an adjunct to their present steamship routes.

The only ones benefiting from this denial are the foreign air lines which are licensed by our own CAB. American shipping, if only for logic's sake, should at least be given an equal operating chance with foreign shipping. The Canadian, British, France, Dutch, and Australian interests have already begun their integrated air-water service. Some of the foreign services which contemplate such dual service are nationalized and subsidized. American overseas shipping does not ask for any subsidy; it merely asks the rightful cooperation from its Government to meet this foreign competition without any financial aid from the Government. Yet, we have the anomalous situation where one governmental bureau by inaction discourages a healthy and natural growth in American overseas shipping.

American shipping lines are fully experienced to take over such air-water service. They know foreign banking, foreign trade regulations; they operated the first public air line service in Central America; they pioneered the first airline service to the west coast of South America.

Such integrated air-water service assures the United States of both a healthy merchant marine and a large transocean air service indispensable to our national security.

This sea-air combination for American shipping is a natural partnership, a most necessary development, if the United States is to take its rightful place on the seas and in the air.

There can be no doubt that the advantages will accrue to the public as well as in the purchase of tickets, in the arrangement of documents, in the simplification of multiple details attendant upon travel and shipping.

Since foreign shipping lines are allowed to operate a sea-air service to the United States, there exists no reason why American shipping lines should be forbidden to operate sea-air service.

I believe the existing pertinent statutes clearly indicate the congressional intent to authorize such service. However, since the CAB has taken it upon itself to question such intent, I have had, some time back, introduced into the House H. R. 5687, a bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended, with respect to air transportation by marine transportation and shipping companies.

I shall reintroduce this bill in the next session of Congress, in an endeavor to rectify the injustice now being done to American shipping.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials:

[From the Washington Post of July 26, 1946]

STREAMLINE BILL PASSES HOUSE, 229 TO 61—PROVIDES SALARY BOOST OF $2,500 AND PENSION PLAN, SLASHES COMMITTEES

The House last night smashed tradition to approve a congressional face-lifting bill streamlining committees, modernizing outmoded procedure, and, incidentally, raising its own pay.

The Monroney-Dirksen bill, a slightly diluted version of the Senate's La Follette measure, passed the House almost intact after nearly 8 hours of debate. The vote was 229 to 61.

The bill now goes to conference with the Senate, which recently adopted nearly all of a joint modernizing committee's recommendations.

MONRONEY LEADS FIGHT

Representative A. S. (MIKE) MONRONEY, Democrat, from Oklahoma, who initiated the House reform move nearly 2 years ago, led the fight to take the House out of a "gay nineties" setting.

Backstopping him across the aisle was Representative EVERETT DIRKSEN, Republican, of Illinois, who pioneered with him in the move.

Only twice did the House break through the MONRONEY-DIRKSEN defense to seriously amend the bill.

1. Instead of the $5,000 flat pay increase, previously accepted by the Senate, and recommended by the authors, the House demanded and got $2,500 salary raise plus another $2,500 in tax-free expense money. That adds up to a lower tax bracket and more money they can keep.

BARS "STENOGRAPHIC POOL"

2. The House would have none of a proposed "stenographic pool" on which short-of-help Members could draw for typists. Members tried instead for additional clerk hire, but got licked.

In addition to the salary increase "sweetening" for the bill's less popular reforms, the House swallowed whole, and unchanged, congressional retirement provisions. To be eligible for retirement pay, members would be required to deposit 6 percent of their basic salary, to have served at least 6 years in Congress, and have attained the age of 62.

What MONRONEY and DIRKSEN were fighting for, however, was drastic reformation of the "crazy-quilt" pattern of 48 overlapping House committees. They got it. The House stripped the number of committees down to 19 major groups reshuffled along functional lines.

The test came on a move by Representative JOHN E. LYLE (Democrat, Texas) to block merger of the Postoffice Committee with the related civil-service group.

The House turned back the test motion 92 to 48, after MONRONEY made it the acid test of whether the House was willing to modernize.

"If you adopt this amendment we will be right back in a hopeless legislative morass," MONRONEY told the House. He said Congress could not do its job with a "jerry-built" committee structure.

Reforms approved by the House constituted about 80 percent of those recommended by the joint reorganization group. Leadership changes, before the bill reached the floor, removed several key provisions previously approved by the Senate—among them proposed minority and majority policies committees, a joint legislative-executive council to strengthen liaison, and an $8,000 administrative assistant for each member.

Leaders also had removed from the bill enforcement provisions for a proposed legislative budget, but the House approved the budget machinery itself. This will require the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, the Senate Finance Committee, and the House Ways and Means Committee to meet at the start of each year and recommend the maximum amount to be appropriated for the year ahead. Before incurring a deficit, Congress would be called on to raise the public debt.

FIGHT BUDGET SECTION

House appropriations committeemen, led by Representative JOHN TABER (Republican, New York), led a fight on the budget section, but they were turned back 101 to 27.

Other approved reforms would—

1. Require lobbyists to register their names and employers and keep a record of expenses.

2. Do away with all congressional action on minor claims, pension, and local bills. (An exception is the District, still subject to House-Senate District Committee jurisdiction.)

Representative CLARENCE BROWN (Republican, Ohio) led the drive which upset MONRONEY's proposed flat House pay increase of from $10,000 to $15,000. BROWN proposed that House Members retain instead the $2,500 expense money they are now allowed, free of taxes. To this would be added an increase in salary of from $10,000 to $12,500. The House roared approval of BROWN's proposal by a voice vote.

The House rejected by a voice vote an amendment by Representative JUDD (Republican, Minnesota) to provide a $6,800-a-year assistant. It also turned down by a 116-to-32 standing vote an amendment by Representative POAGE (Democrat, Texas) for a $5,000-a-year additional clerk.

The House decision on the measure as a whole was by a voice vote.

Earlier the supporters of the measure had won a series of test votes.

Clearly in control, they beat back by large majorities several attempts to rewrite a section which would cut the number of standing House committees from 48 to 19.

Among amendments defeated yesterday were these:

By Representative BIEMILLER (Democrat, Wisconsin) to abolish the Committee on Un-American Activities. Rejected by a 127-to-25 standing vote.

By Representative PITTENGER (Republican, Minnesota) to prevent absorption of the Claims Committee by other groups. Rejected by voice vote.

[From the Baltimore Sun of July 27, 1946]

TRUMAN GETS CONGRESSIONAL REFORM BILL—REORGANIZATION OF PROCEDURE, PAY BOOST, PENSIONS ARE INCLUDED

WASHINGTON, July 26.—A raise in pay for the Nation's lawmakers and sweeping changes in their methods of working became virtually assured tonight as a congressional reorganization bill was sent to President Truman.

The bill, on which the Senate completed action this afternoon, would raise pay of Senators and House Members from $10,000 a year to $12,500 plus a $2,500 tax-free expense allowance.

The Senate had originally voted for a straight $5,000 salary increase, but accepted the House plan for a $2,500 raise plus the allowance. The latter plan will net the legislators some $840 more than the original Senate proposal, because of the tax-free feature.

TRUMAN EXPECTED TO SIGN

Mr. Truman is expected to sign the bill since he has suggested that Congress Members had a raise coming to them.

The measure also makes the legislators eligible for pensions by allowing them to make contributions to the Federal retirement system.

It reduces the number of Senate committees from 33 to 15, House committees from 48 to 19. Each Chamber would have a single Committee on Armed Forces, instead of separate military and naval committees.

Lobbyists would have to register their names, employers, and expenses, so Congress could keep a better check on them.

TO DECIDE ON BUDGET

Another major change calls for the appropriations and taxing committees of both Chambers to get together at the beginning of each year to recommend a Federal Budget, specifying the maximum amount that should be spent.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, Progressive, Wisconsin, one of the bill's authors, said passage was "a great step forward in making Congress more efficient and more responsive to the will of the people."

"I would like to emphasize," he said, "that this doesn't mean a legislative millennium. It is only a beginning on which we will have to improve constantly as we go along."

LEGISLATORS MUST BE EFFICIENT

LA FOLLETTE said that in a world-wide conflict between ideologies "if democracy is to survive the legislative arm of our Government, which is the policy-making branch, must be made ever more efficient."

The revamping measure increases the advisory staffs of the congressional committees, allowing them to retain specialists at salaries ranging from $5,000 to $8,000.

Most of the reorganization plans are to become effective next January 2, when the Eightieth Congress convenes. This includes the higher salary and expense account provisions. House Members currently get the $2,500 tax-free expense allowance, having voted it for themselves earlier this year, though Senators had until now declined to go along on this idea.

CONGRESS VACATION DATES

The legislation fixes the annual vacation for Congress from August 1 to January 1, though it could vote to stay in session longer and the President could call it back during the vacation period to meet emergencies.

Before the Senate gave its final approval to the plan, Senator HAWKES, Republican, New Jersey, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, asked if the lobbyist-control provision would apply to major organizations which ordinarily take sides on important bills.

LA FOLLETTE replied that the provision applied equally to all groups.

FOR A STRONGER CONGRESS

Although it did not achieve in a single step all the reforms needed, Congress has sent to the White House a reorganization bill that assures much self-improvement. One provision alone is a notable gain, the reduction in number of Senate committee from 33 to 15 and House committees from 48 to 19. This is in line with a recommendation made more than a year ago by a report to the National Planning Association, which suggested 15 regular standing committees in each branch. Another excellent change will call the appropriations and taxing committees of both Chambers together at the beginning of each year to recommend a Federal Budget and set a maximum to be spent. Registry of lobbyists in the corridors of Capitol Hill, with a listing of employers and expenses, seems a sensible stipulation. Congress Members are underpaid at $10,000 a year, from the standpoint of their responsibilities, the present trend of living costs, and the kind of men and women we want to attract to that office. The increase they have voted themselves is moderate.

Congress has long suffered from a multiplicity of committees and committee assignments. Some Senators have been on as many as 10 standing and special committees, besides having the duty to be on the floor and carrying a heavy burden of office work. Legislative action has suffered through failure to find quorums on the floor or in committee, a situation easy to seize upon as a device for delay.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, one of the authors, acknowledges that the passed bill is not perfect. But it is a beginning and a good one. Congress Members should now be able to do their job more creditably, and, having less anxiety over their personal pocketbooks, can confine their attention more fully to the essential business of making the Nation's laws.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 26, 1946]

REFORM IN THE HOUSE

The La Follette-Monroney congressional reform bill, as it passed the House yesterday, carries the reorganization of Congress about as far forward as politically possible in a first attempt.

Only one major deletion—the provision for a director of Congress personnel—was made by the Senate when it passed the bill with the surprisingly large margin of 49 to 16 on June 10.

The provisions for majority and minority policy committees and for a joint legislative-executive council were knocked out of the bill preparatory to its introduction on the House floor, in order to make it acceptable to leaders of both parties. So was the provision for an $8,000-a-year executive assistant for every Member. These deletions, however, do not affect the main purpose of the bill, which is to make the cumbersome, creaking machinery of Congress more workable.

The heart of the bill is the reduction in the number of committees. The Senate voted to reduce its 33 committees to 15. The compromise bill submitted to the House reduces the 48 House committees to 19. To whittle the unwieldly congeries of 81 congressional committees down to 34 is a worth-while accomplishment.

The reorganization makes Congress better able to go about the further business of completing its own modernization.

HOUSE PASSES BILL TO RAISE CONGRESS PAY—VOTES $12,500 SALARY AND ELIGIBILITY FOR PENSION—COMMITTEES ARE CUT

WASHINGTON, July 25.—The House passed, 229 to 61, a bill to boost salaries of Congressmen, make them eligible for pensions and overhaul the machinery by which they work.

The tradition-shattering measure, among other things, slashes the number of House committees from 48 to 19 and of Senate committees from 33 to 15.

The Senate passed similar legislation June 11. The two versions will be sent to a Senate-House conference committee for adjustment of differences.

The Senate measure would increase the yearly pay of Members from $10,000 to $15,000, but the House voted to limit the raise to $12,500 annually.

Under the House version, however, a $2,500 yearly, tax-free expense fund for Members would be retained. Under the Senate's bill, this allowance would be abolished.

The Senate measure also provided for an $8,000-a-year administrative assistant for each legislator, but the House refused to accept this proposal.

The House rejected by a voice vote an amendment by Representative WALTER H. JUDD, Republican, of Minnesota, to provide a $6,800-a-year assistant. It also turned down by a 116-to-32 standing vote an amendment by Representative W. R. POAGE, Democrat, of Texas, for a $5,000-a-year additional clerk.

Among other amendments defeated today were these:

By Representative ANDREW BIEMILLER, Democrat, of Wisconsin, to abolish the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Rejected by a 127-to-25 rtanding vote.

By Representative JOHN E. LYLE, Democrat, of Texas, to prevent consolidation of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee into the Civil Service and Public Works Committees. Rejected by a 92-to-46 standing vote.

By Representative WILLIAM A. PITTENGER, Republican, of Minnesota, to prevent absorption of the Claims Committee by other groups. Rejected by voice vote.

Written into the measure by a voice vote was a provision by Representative CHRISTIAN A. HERTER, Republican, of Massachusetts, requiring committees to hold special sessions to hear members testify on bills they introduce.

The Herter proposal later was stricken from the bill, however, after a personal appeal from Speaker SAM RAYBURN, Democrat, of Texas, for such action.

The pension section of the bill provides that Members are eligible for civil-service benefits after 6 years' service, if they make contributions to the retirement fund.

Another controversial proposal was one to require the Senate and House Appropriations Committees, the Senate Finance Committee, and the House Ways and Means Committee to meet at the start of each Congress and recommend the maximum amount to be appropriated for the year ahead.

House Appropriations Committee members fought this section on grounds it would set up a new group to determine fiscal policy.

A motion by Representative JOHN TABER, Republican, of New York, to strike it from the bill was rejected by a 101-to-27 standing vote, however.

Among the changes in procedure under the bill are these:

1. Provision is made to do away with all congressional action on minor claims, pension, and local bills. Instead, when the Federal Government is involved, various departments or agencies would handle the matter.

2. Congress would adjourn annually from at least August 1 to January 1 to give Members more time to learn the desires of their constituents.

3. Lobbyists would be required to register their names and employers and keep a record of expenses.

The Senate measure contained a provision for establishment of majority and minority policy committees in each Chamber, but the House did not include this section.

HOUSE VOTES $12,500 PAY AND EXPENSES OF $2,500

(By C. P. Trussell)

WASHINGTON, July 25.—The House passed tonight its own congressional reorganization bill, a measure designed to modernize the legislative branch so it might meet more effectively the impacts of the present-day load—and in doing it rejected a pay increase for each Member from $10,000 a year to $15,000, such as the Senate recently approved.

Instead, the House voted, by voice, that the salary rise be to $12,500 a year, but added to this an expense account of $2,500 a year, payable in monthly installments, which would not have to be accounted for to anyone.

"Let's do it the honest way," shouted Representative CLARENCE J. BROWN, Republican, of Ohio, sponsor of the change.

Many figured that the arrangement would mean more than $15,000 salary as the Brown amendment specified that the $2,500 expense account would not be subject to income taxation.

Just before taking the passage vote, the House concurred with the Senate in approving a plan under which Members of Congress could qualify for entry into the Federal retirement and pension system.

The final passage vote was 229 to 61.

The House measure now goes to conference for the adjustment of numerous differences between its program and that of the Senate.

It was predicted freely that these differences would be ironed out and that the first efforts of Congress since 1921 to reorganize its physical set-up and operational procedures would be sent to the White House for President Truman's signature before adjournment.

The changes would become effective with the Eightieth Congress, which convenes in January.

Bowing to tradition which has caused Congress for generations to preserve and add to its standing committees, the House agreed to have the number of standing committees reduced from 48 to 19.

While some Members protested that the seniority system would suffer, they were quieted somewhat by assurances that the manning and heading of the consolidated committees would be handled entirely by the new Congress, with no Senate or House rules changed.

The Senate agreed to cutting the number of its standing committees from 32 to 15.

Besides consolidating physical machinery and streamlining procedures in the interest of better concentrated and more efficient operation, both the House and Senate bills set out to strengthen controls on expenditures so as to put the National Budget into balance and hold it there.

This would be sought by holding appropriations in line with or below revenue receipts. Before beginning to appropriate there would be adopted a legislative budget which would have to be followed throughout each year.

While Senate and House plans differ as to detail, they both would prescribe for meetings at the beginning of each congressional session of members of appropriation committees in both houses with those of the House Ways and Means Committee and Senate Finance Committees, the tax drafting bodies to lay out the legislative budget.

By February 15 or March 1 (the dates differ in the bills) there would be reports to Congress on estimated over-all Federal receipts and expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year.

If estimated outlay exceeded estimated receipts, Congress would be required to increase the debt limit before it could appropriate beyond income.

This program was fought bitterly by most of the House Appropriations Committee, who contended that it lacked realism and would not work. The House voted 101 to 27 to give it a trial.

FACES HAIL OF AMENDMENTS

Throughout the afternoon and into the evening the 98-page bill containing the reorganization program went under a hail of proposed amendments.

For the most part, the measure rode to final passage in much the same form it was taken to the floor under the joint sponsorship of Representative A. S. MONRONEY, Democrat, of Oklahoma, and Representative EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, Republican, of Illinois.

These were top House men on the Special Joint Committee on Reorganization, under the chairmanship of Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Progressive, of Wisconsin, which worked out the program after months of study of congressional weaknesses in the light of today's impacts on the legislative branch.

United States Zone's Civil Rule Gains, Bellamy Finds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the ninth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

Alongside the military occupation of Germany by the four victorious powers there has been created in our zone, at least, a parallel set-up of civil governments which I should like to describe more fully.

So far as we knew, the American zone of occupation, whose population is 18,000,000, is far ahead of the zones occupied by our allies in attempting to restore civil government to the Germans themselves. The Russians act as if they never want to. The French have not declared themselves, and the British have not got around to it yet.

The American zone of occupation has been divided into three parts, each called a land. They are Land Bavaria, Land Wurtemberg-Baden, and Land Greater Hesse. The latter two are new political subdivisions of Germany.

The marriage of Wurtemberg and Baden is something new, brought about by the necessity of dividing Germany into four parts, and the Baden people are not so sure they like the Wurtembergers and vice versa. Greater Hesse was frankly the composite of a number of portions of Germany, each of which belonged to a different division, but the Hesse experiment seems to be working out more smoothly, if anything, than the Wurtemberg-Baden one, so far as the reception by the Germans themselves is concerned.

Each of the three divisions of our zone has a minister president and a cabinet of its own, all composed of carefully screened non-Nazis, but most of them, as I have said, are old and tired. One has to respect them for the hopeless fight they made against the Nazis, but their powers to govern do not seem to be very impressive.

COUNCIL IS COORDINATOR

Over the three subdivisions is the Laenderrat, the council of the lands, which meets at Stuttgart under the direction and control of United States authorities. It coordinates all matters of German administration affecting more than one land in the United States zone. It is designed to fill the need resulting from the lack of a central administration and to restore German responsibility and self-government. The burgomeister of Bremen, the United States Seaport Enclave, sits with the ministers-president of Bavaria, Wurtemberg-Baden and Greater Hesse, but takes part only when the interests of his area are concerned.

The Laenderrat has set up seven committees which process all matters which finally go before the body itself for settlement. That is, these committees deal with evacuation and resettlement, food and agriculture, transportation, economics, industry, and export and import.

The military arm of the United States in our zone of occupation has been ably assisted in setting up the new civil governments in Germany by a group of remarkable political experts who came mostly from the colleges of the United States.

Dr. James K. Pollock, senior representative of the deputy military government who sits with the Laenderrat in Stuttgart, is an example. Dr. Pollock was professor of political science and chairman of the division of social sciences at the University of Michigan, having taught previously at Harvard, Ohio State, and Stanford.

STUDIED NAZI PERIOD

He made a major part of his work the study of Germany since 1933.

Another man who turned out to be exceedingly valuable as a political adviser to the military government was Dr. Walter Dorn, formerly of Ohio State University and later of Columbia, where he was professor of modern European history. He had studied deeply the Prussian bureaucracy and written a book about it. He had spent many years in Germany prior to the war and speaks German very well. He is a man of infinite tact and understanding and has been retained by Gen. Lucius D. Clay as a special political adviser in which capacity he travels over the whole German military occupied zone, reporting back to the deputy administration what he has seen.

I found a persistent demand on the part of all the high command in Germany, headed by none other than Gen. Joseph T. McNarney himself and General Clay, for the return to Germany of Col. W. W. Dawson, of the Western Reserve Law School, who has been in Germany a year along with Pollock, Dorn, and some of the other special political advisers, working out the set-up of civil government.

Colonel Dawson's work is highly praised by the high command, and General Clay particularly begged me to ask President Leutner, of Western Reserve University, to request the trustees to extend Colonel Dawson's leave of absence 1 year so that he might return to Germany and complete his work. (I am glad to say that the university was most cooperative in this matter and that Colonel Dawson has already returned to his important uncompleted work in Germany.)

Men of the caliber of Pollock, Dorn, and Dawson, who are willing to serve in the thankless job of reconstituting of German civil government, are hard to find.

In addition to political advisers, America has furnished the Army in Germany with equally able financial and economic advisers, and the Army has avidly accepted their services.

America has reason to be proud of the speed with which representatives of this young western republic have adapted themselves to the intricate European politics. It has been surely due to the wise advice of such counselors as the above-named three that this has been possible.

One who is used to the simple tides and currents of American politics and knows the pressure groups in a body like the American Congress or the State legislature in Columbus, or the city council in Cleveland, has little comprehension of the infinitely more complicated task which confronts one who would walk with certain tread the maze of European politics, where some of the prejudices are 2,000 years old, and where, by the overlay of one pressure atop another, a final result is produced so disconcerting as to inspire the novice to wash his hands of it all and go back to Emporia, Kans., or Chillicothe, Ohio.

But this is exactly what I have been trying to say, and have said in so many ways, that we cannot afford to do, unless we sell America short in the effort to work out a better world for everyone. We have to stick to the hard and difficult task. We have got to keep our noses to the grindstone. No longer can we be the young knight in shining armor, who, having slain the dragon, sheathes his sword and goes home to his wife and children. Somebody has to stay around and dipose of the body.

Why I Voted Against OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1946

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I have been against continuance of the OPA since the European phase of the war ended more than 15 months ago. It is doubtful if OPA ever did any good commensurate with its cost and the definite harm that we know that it has done to the American economy.

The OPA is not simply a poorly administered agency—it is a vicious law that is against both common sense and logic.

It is not only a bureaucratic plaything—it is a device for sharing the wealth.

It does not simply leave the way open for a little Government favoritism—its very existence encourages corruption and deceives the people of the Nation.

Its principal virtues, as extolled by its friends, are really its most dangerous vices. It has put out of business thousands of small manufacturers and merchants.

The OPA has encouraged shiftlessness, created widespread, almost universal disregard for Federal laws; brought black markets into being, impoverished elderly men and women who owned real estate and were dependent upon their income from such real property, shifted the burden of economic livelihood from the backs of those most able to pay to the backs of those least able to pay, changed America's traditional business practices and created a huge, self-perpetuating bureaucratic lobby in Washington and in every big city of the Nation.

The OPA, most of all, is nothing in the world but a propaganda device to prove to the people that something is true that is not true—namely, that this administration has succeeded in holding the cost of living although allowing widespread graft, exorbitant wage demands, and continued, unremitting deficit financing.

The longer we keep OPA, the longer it will be before millions of automobiles, washing machines, ironers, milking machines, and every conceivable type of device needed on the farms, in the factories, and in the homes of America are available in quantity. This is true because by its very existence the OPA stymies business, places an artificial factor in between the regular law of supply and demand which operates between millions of buyers and sellers at every stage of the accumulation, production, and distribution of supplies, machines, and implements.

One of the most pernicious byproducts of OPA—and part and parcel of the OPA program—is the so-called "consumer" subsidy program, which has done more to delude housewives and women shoppers generally than any other single factor in American economic life. By using money from the Federal Treasury to pay a part of our butter bill, or bread bill or clothing bill or some other essential, the administration has convinced millions of people that the price of these commodities has been held down. When OPA was lifted briefly recently and the subsidy ended, the prices of these commodities naturally went up a few cents to make up for the subsidy. Millions of Americans looked at the new prices and then began to cry about the apparent increased cost. Yet, if they would but stop and think, they would understand that by paying the amount of the previous subsidy direct, they actually were saving money. Under the subsidy program, these same Americans have to pay part of their grocery or clothing bill by paying additional taxes. If the subsidy program could be discontinued permanently, then the amount of taxes they would have to pay in the future would be lowered proportionately, other things being equal.

Personally, I would rather pay my groceryman than to have to pay part of my grocery bill on my tax bill. When subsidies are employed by the Government the cost of the subsidy is not the only cost. In addition to paying the actual subsidy, bureaucrats have to be paid to compute the subsidy, to issue the subsidy checks, to check on the bureaucrats who issue the checks, and other charges accrue. All of this is expensive—and it is added to the tax bill.

Perhaps the most pernicious part of OPA has drawn the least attention from Americans, although when the same program was put forward by Huey Long under the term, "Share the wealth," he was labeled as a demagogue. I refer to the so-called rent-control features of OPA. There is no doubt but that the people deserved and had a right to some protection from a small minority of greedy and avaricious and unscrupulous landlords who would have taken advantage of the war-created housing scarcity to reap a fortune. But this need did not and does not excuse the manner in which OPA has administered its rent control.

There is a widespread feeling in this country that the landlord is always rich, greedy, and avaricious, while the laborer is always poor, needy, and simple-minded. Yet, let us take the case of an old woman whom I know. When her husband died, he left her an income of $50 from insurance and three houses. Each of the houses rented for $30 a month in 1940. On that $90 she took in, she made approximately $20 a month profit.

The man who lived in house No. 1 was making $100 in 1940. He has lived there since that time, but during the war he made upward of $400 a month and today is making $350 or thereabouts. Yet, the OPA has held the line on his rent. The elderly woman still gets only $30 a month for her house, although the cost of maintaining it has gone up at least 100 percent.

Virtually the same situation is true in the other two houses she owns. It is also true in hundreds of thousands of other cases.

Now, I ask in all fairness, why should she be penalized in favor of the able workman who could have paid more rent and should have paid more rent in view of the rising cost of living to her. He spent the money he saved on rent in the beer parlor, so we have the amazing instance of the Government itself cooperating with certain of its citizens in what amounts to a case of taking money away from a needy elderly woman and giving it to the manufacturers of beer and the retailers of beer.

This has not happened just once, but tens of thousands of times through the vicious and unfair manner in which OPA has administered a law obviously designed to protect renters against a few unscrupulous landlords who would have, if not prevented, raised rents sky high.

The OPA not only has encouraged absurd economic thinking, and "share the wealth," it has actually made criminals of hundreds of thousands of otherwise honest businessmen. Everybody concedes—at least, everyone whom I know—that it was impossible for a grocer, a druggist, or any other type of businessman to stay in business from 1941 through 1945 without violating one of the OPA rules or regulations either intentionally or unintentionally. As a result, as businessmen came to see that they could not possibly obey the law and stay in business, we witnessed widespread contempt for the law, and, in some communities, wholesale disregard of the law. The businessmen in some lines banded together, and all of them deliberately violated the OPA on the theory that the agency could not possibly arrest every one of them, or it would draw too much public notice to its unfair regulations and practices. The theory proved to be correct.

Now, the OPA is back in existence, and there are those persons who are heaving a sigh of relief, although if they considered all the implications they undoubtedly would agree with me and with other Congressmen who want to see OPA thrown out the window.

We are going to have to get rid of OPA sometime—why not get rid of it immediately and get started on the road to peace, production, and prosperity? We will never get anywhere—as individuals or as a Nation—by deluding ourselves.

Minimum Wage Legislation

REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has told us he has endeavored to have the Rules Committee report a rule on the proposed amendments to the wage-and-hour bill but has been unsuccessful. I want to commend the gentleman for his efforts which I know have been sincere and diligent.

But the Rules Committee has not budged. For that reason I have placed discharge petition No. 34 on the Speaker's desk in an effort to get the bill raising the minimum wage to 65 cents an hour on the floor for action. To date, 141 Members have signed the petition.

There is no more important piece of legislation before us. Millions of Americans are still working for 40 cents an hour. They hardly can be considered as good customers. Their deplorable economic position should not only arouse our humanitarian instincts, it should also be recognized as a drag on our economy. Their plight needs remedying now—not 10 years from now.

I hope additional Members will sign the discharge petition so we can act on this much needed legislation before the session adjourns.

Communist Infiltration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial appearing in the July 25 issue of the Suburban List, a weekly newspaper published in Essex Junction, Vt.

I submit this editorial for the attention of the Members as further evidence of the Communist infiltration in this country, which has been spoken of here in this House and to which Attorney General Tom Clark referred in his speech before the Chicago Bar Association.

This is what is happening in my own State of Vermont:

[From the Suburban List, Essex Junction, Vt., of July 25, 1946]

MORE ABOUT PROFESSOR NUQUIST AND COMMUNISM

A tempest was stirred up in a teapot when this paper merely made the statement that a Communist meeting in Barre had endorsed Prof. Andrew Nuquist for Representative in Congress. The professor was not charged as being a Communist although some readers put that implication on it. But it seems that this endorsement was made before Professor Nuquist filed his name for a petition to get his name on the ballot. That is an old trick and is often used in order to force a candidate into a political campaign. After that endorsement, the parlor pinks and fellow travelers rushed to sign the petition.

There is, though, no evidence that Professor Nuquist has repudiated the endorsement he has received from the Communists. Therefore, it must be that he places some value on that endorsement. Anyway, he was willing to go along under such conditions and it appears that he cannot help himself.

Some labor organizations have endorsed Professor Nuquist for Representative. It is very evident that they know what to expect of him or else they would not have done so.

Some organizations, connected with the University of Vermont, have also endorsed Professor Nuquist and, by the same line of reasoning, those organizations probably know what they can expect from Professor Nuquist in favoring or opposing certain legislation.

No organization or no group of people will endorse any candidate, particularly for a legislative office, unless they are pretty well satisfied that the candidate is in sympathy with the principles they favor.

There was nothing wrong or startling about the Communists and their meeting in Barre in endorsing Professor Nuquist. Several other organizations have done that same thing. But it must be clear that such organizations as have endorsed Professor Nuquist know pretty well what they may expect of him.

And let this paper make it clear that no one has charged that Professor Nuquist is a Communist. There is, though, a question if his past record will show that he is truly a member of the Republican Party.

American Free Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, recently Chester Bowles stated that he had always believed that price and rent controls were only part of a whole system of controls. He said he was in favor of Government control over wages, over loans to business and the supply of bank credit. He was in favor of higher income taxes, and he developed a plan to pay veterans terminal leave with a kind of Government script. But this was not all. He advocated the effective use of all and other powers which can be "useful," especially fiscal and monetary powers. His whole thesis was that controls would establish economic stabilization.

I do not think that America wants economic stabilization. There cannot be progress that way. If we had followed that course after the last war, where would we have gone? We would have stagnated. There would not have been increased production; the incentive for inventors to produce would not have been provided, and we would not have had an increase in the number of jobs.

Yes, it is men like Mr. Bowles who want to stabilize things in order that they can place their political controls into operation. They want to transfer the power of our economy from the private citizen to Government. This is not what our boys fought for. The very basis of Hitler's philosophy was just what Bowles contends for—placing in the hands of the executive the power to control. Yes, the control of credit and the issuance of directives or executive-made law, are the essential powers for maintenance of a governmentally controlled society. That is all communism is.

Mr. President, yesterday I delivered an address over a coast-to-coast network of the American Broadcasting Co., on the subject of OPA. I ask that this address, entitled "The Fight for Freedom From OPA Goes On," be reproduced in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Americans, I am happy to speak this afternoon about the most important topic on America's domestic scene today—the OPA—a topic affecting each of us, a topic affecting every housewife, veteran, grocer, salesman, auto dealer, farmer, lumber merchant, and all the rest of us. It affects the housing, the foods, the refrigerators and radios and washing machines, which we have been waiting to buy.

I am going to speak to you about freedom, my fellow Americans. And about the prices that mama and papa pay for milk and butter and meat and other things.

SIGNIFICANCE OF FEAR

And, yes, about fear—fear which is the great enemy of freedom, fear bred by OPA. Yes, the fear bred by bureaucracy to make mamma and papa afraid that they will be inadequate if they are free to buy as they please or sell as they please without OPA.

This matter of fear is tremendously important. Fear is a weapon of OPA's collectivists to make us afraid of freedom and of a free economy. It is their weapon to cause distrust among Americans, to cause class hatreds, to cause frictions between farmers and city folks.

But, friends, with confidence, now let us approach this problem. Let us review the past and draw up a program for the future.

THE RESTORATION OF OPA

Now, you recall that on June 30, OPA died, because the President vetoed the compromise extension bill.

For the next 4 weeks, America was free at long last from OPA's chains—free from its snoopers, free from its gestapo. America was emancipated from OPA's wild collectivist planners who hate free enterprise and want State socialism.

Businessmen, who had been persecuted by OPA, who had been brow-beaten by it, cowed by it, who had written and spoken to their Congressmen with terror of OPA in their hearts, could once again hold their heads high. Businessmen could go into all-out production, and they did just that.

Then, on July 24, the Senate, following the House's action, restored OPA. The Senate had been pressured by the administration, pressured by the 34,000 OPA bureaucrats who wanted to retain their jobs, pressured by Communists and pinks and pressured too, by some misguided folks who had unfortunately swallowed OPA's fear propaganda.

WHY I VOTED AGAINST OPA

I voted against the restoration of OPA. I voted against it, because I believe in these points:

1. I believe in mamma and papa. I believe that mamma is wiser than Chester Bowles and papa is wiser than Paul Porter. Mamma can control prices by herself, by refusing to patronize gougers and chiselers.

2. I believe in the soundness of the American people. I know that they are not racketeers or suckers. They lived 165 years without OPA.

3. I believe that with the war over, OPA has no more justification for existence.

4. That rent controls—equitable for the property owner as well as for the tenant—could be handled by the States.

5. Another reason for my opposing OPA is that I know it has fostered black markets, fostered crime, fostered evasion of tax payments by some Americans. Yet our people are, by and large, honest, law-abiding, patient, if only Government would let them alone.

6. I know that OPA has stifled production. Unless the producer can make a profit, there will be reduced production. Without adequate production, prices will remain high. Production in a free economy is the answer to inflation, not price controls.

7. I believe that the American free enterprise system and the natural laws of supply and demand are entitled to a further testing period without OPA controls.

RESULTS DURING EMANCIPATION PERIOD

But, fellow Americans, just what did happen during the free period of emancipation period from OPA controls, the period between June 30, when OPA died, and July 25, when the President signed the OPA bill?

I'll tell you what happened. The American free enterprise system proved itself. It proved adequate. Production soared.

To be sure, some prices rose. Many prices had to rise because they had been set at an arbitrarily low level—with producers denied a profit. Other prices rose by just the amount represented by the loss of the Government subsidy—the subsidy you would otherwise have paid in taxes.

Let's cite some instances. Under OPA butter, was selling, for example, in Chicago when you could get it, at 67 cents a pound the last week in June. The price on the black market was 95 cents and more. But on July 23, without OPA, the price on butter had risen only 6 cents, to 73 cents. And the taxpayers were saving the 14 cents per pound Government subsidy which had been paid under OPA.

Milk, with OPA controls, cost 18 cents in Chicago in June. In July without OPA milk was selling for 20½ cents per quart in Chicago on the average. In other words, the milk price had risen only slightly above the amount of Government subsidy of 1½ cents.

Meat was practically unobtainable under OPA. Forty-six cents per pound for sirloin steak was a purely fictional OPA price, because you just couldn't get it. On the black market you might have been able to get meat at $1.25 per pound. But on July 23 in New York without OPA you could buy sirloin steak at 63 cents per pound. That's the answer to OPA's fear propaganda—its poisonous propaganda. Remember under OPA 80 percent of the meat went into black markets.

THE FARMERS' PROBLEM

I have spoken of farm prices. Do not believe OPA's misleading propaganda that would make you think that the farmers are gougers or chiselers, my friends. They are definitely not. I know farmers. Farmers, for all their hard labor, have been earning on the average a mere 50 cents per hour. Think how that compares with city labor's pay.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S ERRORS

I have spoken of misleading propaganda. Much as I regret to say it, the President has been the leading agent in fostering such propaganda. His message to the Congress on Thursday when he signed the OPA bill was full of fear-provoking poison. (Yes; even though his predecessor had once said, "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself.")

The President's message was of defeatism, of negativism, of distrust of our free economy. I use my words advisedly, my fellow Americans.

The President said that the free period of June 30 to July 25 gave us "a frightening foretaste" of what would happen without OPA. I say it was the President's remark which was frightening because it was so wrong. I have already shown how prices of our basic commodities achieved natural levels without OPA and with a saving of subsidies to the United States Treasury.

The President, using carefully "loaded figures" said that there had been a 24-percent rise in basic commodity prices during the emancipation period. But I have shown that the price of milk, for example, went up a mere 2½ cents in Chicago. That is, it rose around 10 percent, and that 10 percent simply represented a penny more than the loss of subsidy.

The President used the threat of recalling Congress if prices rose. Well, I say, that if Congress is recalled, it might well surprise him by killing this OPA Frankenstein altogether except for rent controls. I say that because I believe that in the next few months the terrible consequences of the restoration of the OPA stranglehold will become evident. A bitter reaction among industry and agriculture and commerce and an awakened consumer class is in the making against the restoration of OPA chains.

The President asked that we reduce Government expenses and adopt a rigorous tax program. May I ask: Who but his own administration has been responsible for deficit spending for the last 13 years? Let the President apply his own words by demobilizing bureaucracy, and recommending the balancing of the Budget.

PROGRAM FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

But where do all of us go from here?

What should be the program of the American people for the future? Here are some points in a program for America:

1. Let mama and papa and all of the American public maintain undiminished their faith in the free enterprise system. Let them not lose heart because OPA has won a temporary battle.

2. Let the American public continue to buy Government bonds, continue its payments on insurance, continue its careful buying and saving.

3. Let the American people vote in the primaries and go to the polls in November to vote out the collectivists from office and to vote in men who have faith in mama and papa, men who would restore our free way of life and end Government regimentation.

4. Let the American people urge that the white-collar class, which has been squeezed by the lack of production and rising prices—let them urge that this white-collar class get decent living wages and returns.

This is my message to the American people.

MESSAGE TO OPA

But there is also a message to OPA and it is this: The American people demand that all items be decontrolled as soon as they fulfill the requirements of the OPA law, that is, whenever supply exceeds or is in approximate balance with demand. The American people demand that all price adjustments on such items on which controls are temporarily maintained, shall be made immediately and without the intolerable delays of the past. The debate in Congress apparently has brought some light to Mr. Porter because on Saturday he issued a directive decontrolling certain commodities. We have heard nothing, however, about demobilizing the OPA's big force and cutting the overhead.

The OPA bureaucrats have a chance to erase their miserable record of brow-beating business, of snooping, of Gestapo tactics. Let them take this opportunity to fulfill the law in letter and spirit as Congress intended.

MESSAGE TO COLLECTIVISTS

But to the collectivists, to the superplanners, to the Communists, and the "pinks" who are behind the move to maintain OPA permanently, I, personally, vow my eternal opposition. I pledge that I will fight them. And I believe that the overwhelming proportion of 140,000,000 other Americans will fight them in order to prevent alien state socialism from permanently strangling us.

CONCLUSIONS

We Americans are not afraid. We believe that at an early date the system of free enterprise will be restored.

We believe that the "only thing we have to fear is fear itself."

We know in our hearts and in our inmost being the truth of the words of St. Paul that God hath indeed "given not the spirit of fear but of power and of love and of sound mind."

German Food Meager—No Better Ration in Sight, Says Bellamy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the eighth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

The German agricultural problem is complicated by the lack of fertilizer. During the war years all the chemical plants in operation were making munitions of war and no fertilizers were manufactured.

When you remember that some of the fields in our zone in Germany have been tilled for 2,000 years and nearly all of them for 1,000 and that the soil is thin at best, it becomes evident that no crop yield worthy of the name will be enjoyed unless there is ample use of fertilizer.

Every scrap of manure is used, but this has had to be supplemented for many years by the generous use of artificial fertilizer. Nitrates can be manufactured in Germany and were before the war in a large amount. But phosphate had to be imported.

It has been impossible to import phosphates, which come to Germany mostly from north Africa. There is no money to pay for them in the first place and the French, who control most of them, are not inclined to be very generous when it comes to feeding German fields.

Agriculture in Germany is primitive compared to our standards. In many miles of automobile travel through the smiling Bavarian, Wurtemberg, Baden, and Hesse landscapes one fails to see a single tractor. The work is done mostly by oxen or an occasional bony horse. Time seems to be what the German peasant has the most of and the oxen are fast enough for him.

In the break-up of Germany into four parts the bread basket of Germany went to Russia and it is believed that the Russians have more food for their German wards than do the other three powers.

Britain, herself a food-importing country, is very short of cereals, and therefore, the ration in her part of Germany is very low. The French ration is probably worse, according to best accounts, but that is probably because the French do not care a whit what happens to Germany, as long as it is bad.

The Americans, who not only have food but have kind hearts, are doing the best by their German population of any of the four occupying powers, unless it be Russia, concerning which, as I have said, nobody knows. But the Russians, although having food, are not inclined to be over-generous with their beaten enemies. So I think it is safe to say that the Americans have done the best job on food, but it is none too good.

At one of the many American headquarters we visited in Germany we were served for lunch a German ration for one entire day. It was pretty terrible—soybeans, black bread, a smattering of some kind of fat which looked like dirty lard, and some ersatz coffee or tea. This was, mind you, for a whole day, 1,255 calories. It is about as much as the average American eats for lunch, only far less palatable.

GERMAN FARMER FARES WELL

It must be remembered that the German farmer does better for himself than the German city dweller because he is able to mooch some occasional green stuff or other food for himself, despite the stringent regulations which provide the amount of food he may keep back for himself and his family, and the amount he must sell to the state at a price set by the authorities. Nevertheless, in spite of these regulations, it is believed that there is a lot of cheating by German farmers.

While in Berlin it was the good fortune of our party to run into former President Hoover, who was then engaged on his food investigating tour. We spent 2 hours talking the situation over with him and agreed that whether we loved the Germans or not, and most said they did not, we had to feed them at least subsistence rations, or run the chance of a tremendous upgrowth in communism. In other words, it was not because we loved them but for our own good and the peace of the world that we should have to do it.

We all agreed with Hoover's diagnosis of the situation, made public in his speech from Cairo.

A discussion of the German food question would not be complete without mentioning beer, which has been a staple food as well as a stimulant for the Germans during the centuries. Now there is no beer for the German civilian population, except a bootleg brand they make themselves. The grains going into beer can be better used directly as food.

BREWERIES IN RUINS

This lack has made a tremendous difference in the German's ease in life and belief in the future, because Germany's social life, her song and her bon camaraderie was all built around the institution of beer. In Munich the famous Lowenbrau breweries are in ruin. In Nuermberg the famous Tucherbrau was manufactured, but according to my information, its entire product was taken by the Americans for the use of American soldiers and officers. I had some of it and it was not up to the old prewar Nuermberg Tucher, by any means.

In wine culture there is still some activity along the Rhine. We went to a wine-testing ceremony at Rudesheim, but it seemed a rather hollow rite, because most of the wines were not available for popular consumption. A great ceremony, nevertheless, it was conducted by a pedantic old German with a walrus mustache. He lectured us learnedly and sentimentally about each one of the 18 wines tested that night. After the eighth or ninth they all tasted the same to me, and that in spite of the fact that one got only a small portion of each one.

Dear Henry—Here Is Why I Could Not Vote for the British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I am inserting in the RECORD at this point the copy of a letter when I recently sent to Mr. Henry J. Schmitt, editor and publisher of the Aberdeen American-News, one of the leading daily newspapers published in South Dakota.

Mr. Schmitt is an able and talented editor who served his country creditably in uniform during the war. He is a conscientious and dispassionate student of national and international affairs. Shortly after my vote against the British loan, the American-News carried an editorial questioning the wisdom of my vote and expressing the disappointment of its editor that I had not been included among those voting in the affirmative. With characteristic regard for the precepts of fair play and tolerance, however, Henry Schmitt dropped me a note suggesting that I write an open letter to the American-News setting forth for its readers my reasons for voting in the negative.

The following letter is the open letter which I sent to the Aberdeen American-News in response to Henry Schmitt's appreciated invitation. Because it encompasses in comparative short space my basic reasons for voting against the British loan. I am including in here in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the thought that others besides those reading the Aberdeen daily newspaper might be interested in my position on this rather complicated issue.

DEAR HENRY—HERE IS WHY I COULD NOT VOTE FOR THE BRITISH LOAN

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 23, 1946.

MR. HENRY J. SCHMITT,
Editor and Publisher,
Aberdeen American-News,
Aberdeen, S. Dak.

DEAR HENRY: It was thoughtful and courteous of you to send me a copy of your recent editorial criticizing my vote against the British loan and extending an invitation to write my version of the proposal so that the readers of the American-News could have both sides of the argument. That surely is a fair suggestion and I am happy to comply with your invitation although ordinarily I try to avoid debating with a newspaper since it keeps coming out each day and, at best, I am limited to a one-pitch, hit-or-miss turn at the plate.

During the debate on this issue, I delivered a full-dress speech analyzing what I believed to be the advantages and disadvantages of the British loan. I am enclosing a copy of that speech with this letter. The speech is rather long since it encompasses many weeks of careful study and discussion of the British loan and our foreign policy but I shall be glad to send a copy to any readers of the American-News who will drop me a card here in Washington requesting one.

Your editorial was, of course, right in suggesting that it might have been a popular and strategic move for me to make had I voted yes on the British loan since the Sioux Falls Argus-Leader, the American-News, the Mitchell Republic, and most of the other daily papers and several of our important weeklies were supporting it. A vote for the British loan might have been an easy and popular vote for me to make, Henry, but I could not bring myself to seek pouplarity with $3,750,000,000 of the people's money for the reasons set forth in the following paragraphs:

The financial arguments for the loan just didn't stand up in the congressional debates and I am afraid they won't be justified by our future experience. It is noteworthy that America's two outstanding public counsellors on Government finance—Barney Baruch, financial adviser to three Presidents, and Jesse Jones, former RFC Administrator—both advised Congress that the financial arguments for the loan proposal were fallacious. Both of these good Democrats and great Americans also warned against its effect upon our Federal debt structure and the dangers of inflation. Even Chairman BRENT SPENCE of the House Banking and Currency Committee told Congress frankly in his speech supporting the loan, "I do not recommend this as a financial investment."

Consequently, in deciding whether to vote to make a loan or gift (nobody can be sure which it will turn out to be) of $3,750,000,000 to Britain at a net interest rate of 1.83 percent and under preferential terms denied all other nations, I had to look beyond the financial arguments. The fact that this loan amounts to $28 for every man, woman, and child in the United States demonstrates that it is big business. In fact, if the loan is not repaid, Aberdeen's pro rata share of the added debt to be assumed amounts to $476,420; Webster's share of this investment abroad is $60,844; Britton's share is $42,000. If the loan is not repaid, the amount of this loan to be absorbed by Ipswich is $28,056; by Mobridge $84,224. These potential costs were figured by the Library of Congress on a per capita basis. In the long run, South Dakotans may directly and indirectly have to pay more than a per capita share of our national debt, however, because the standard of living in our State is far above the average in the United States since people in the slums, Negroes in the South, and mass laborers with large families pay very little tax to the Federal Government.

HOW ABOUT ISOLATIONIST ARGUMENT?

Now let us look at the other than financial arguments since South Dakotans have a substantial financial stake in knowing what we are buying for this money if the loan is not repaid.

Your editorial states my negative vote may be assumed to mean isolationism and conservatism; that it might indicate that I was playing ball with the economic royalists. Well, Henry, every economic royalist from Wall Street and of the big international banking crowd in New York City and elsewhere (excepting Barney Baruch) was for this loan. The lobby in Washington was high powered and intriguing. It may not quite be true as one writer put it that this loan was launched on a sea of cocktails but, for better or for worse, the economic royalists were openly, aggressively, and persuasively for this loan. I voted against it. So, at least, I should not be accused of playing ball with the economic royalists. If so, at any rate, I was batting on the other side!

Neither do I consider a negative vote on the British loan an indication of isolationism. In fact, my basic reason for voting against this loan was that it, in itself, in my opinion, launches America on the road to a new form of isolationism which may well lead us to another war if continued, and which I believe is certain to earn us an eventual harvest of ill will, envy, and embitterness abroad.

Here is how I am afraid the British loan will prove out to be a costly and dangerous adventure in a new type of isolationism whereby America sends its wealth abroad in the form of divisive dollars to divide the world into rival camps to some of which we refuse to loan money; to others of which we make loans on a strictly commercial basis at realistic rates of interest, and to still others of which we send give-away money at less interest than we ourselves must pay to get the money and on terms which, in themselves, invite nonpayment.

In my mind, in due time, this policy means that all but the most-favored nation with the easiest terms and the best deal will begin evidencing resentment at the discriminatory treatment Uncle Sam directed against them. This is borne out by what the late Lord Keynes said in Parliament while urging his British colleagues to accept the loan proposal. Keynes said, in comparing the British terms with those received by the French, "An amount equal to 34 percent of their loan will have been paid by France during the 6 years before we have begun to pay anything at all." This undoubtedly sounded good to the British—but how must it sound to the French who have also fought with us for freedom in two cruel wars? This is what I mean, Henry, by divisive dollars, since American dollars which are easy for some nations to get and repay while being difficult for other nations to get and repay are likely to purchase more of strife and bitterness than they are of peace and good will. Once again, we are likely to become Uncle Shylock abroad and Uncle Sap at home.

WILL PREFERENTIAL LOANS MAKE FRIENDS OF FOES?

Another unfortunate implication I see in the British loan as it was defended and promoted by its supporters is that these divisive dollars are apt to make more difficult the all-important task of bettering our relations with Russia. From the Speaker of the House on down during the congressional debates, the loan was described as a device for bolstering England against communism and against Russia. I could not make myself believe that a loan granted to bolster any country against another will make for world peace. For 10 months, I have been urging America to develop a positive, firm, and friendly policy toward Russia and I have repeatedly recommended a meeting between the Big Two to work out a formula whereby America and Russia can live together peacefully in one world. Too much war talk and too many recriminations can too easily lead to actual war. Now is the time to try constructive acts of peace. Before this is done, our two outstanding nations must through bilateral conferences between our top leaders create areas of understanding and define points of difference so that we can know soon and definitely what is required to avoid war with Russia.

For the United States to make a preferential gift-loan to any country at this time "to bolster it against Russia," in my judgment, sets back our chance for peace and gives new impetus to the forces moving us toward war. If peace is to be permanent, America and Russia must both help preserve it.

Far from being "isolationist" in my position on this loan, Henry, I argued on the floor of Congress for the establishment of a pattern of foreign loans which would give similar terms, similar interest rates, and stipulate similar concessions to all foreign borrowers to whom we deemed it desirable to make loans. I submit in simple candor that this is much more of an "international" approach to the problem of foreign loans than the piecemeal, patchwork, treat-each-nation-differently policy that we inaugurated with the British loan. I offered an amendment the day of the vote to put the British loan on the same basis as other loans to other countries so that we might reinforce rather than weaken the United Nations Organization. I voted for United States participation in the United Nations because I believe in international cooperation in settling international problems; I sincerely fear that the manner in which the British loan was made is a step back away from such an international concept. My amendment was defeated—our "divisive dollars" were authorized to go abroad to help some, to defy others, and to discriminate against still others—so I voted "No" on the final roll call.

I hope my fears are wrong for all our sakes. Since we must all share the costs of this loan if it is unpaid in full or in part, I hope we can all share in dividends which will prove beneficial. While hoping I am wrong in my concern, I could not in good conscience refrain from calling attention to a feature of this loan which my reasoning tells me will do more to divide the world than it will to unite it. In all events, my vote was certainly not one based on isolationist reasoning but one aimed at averting the authorization of a pick-and-choose program of world financing which, whether it succeeds or not, is scarcely in keeping with our United Nations commitments or the concepts of those who believe this to be one world.

I sincerely appreciate your fairness and courtesy, Henry, in permitting me thus to put before the readers of the Aberdeen News my thoughts on this perplexing and important problem.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Cordially yours,

KARL E. MUNDT,
Member of Congress.

Army To Do Job if United States Lets It, Bellamy Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the tenth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

ARMY TO DO JOB IF UNITED STATES LETS IT, BELLAMY SAYS

Let us now consider the whole state of the Army with reference to its tasks in Europe and also in protecting American interests throughout the world.

Although one would be a fool, after 3 weeks' study, to try to speak with authority on this subject, I should like to give my impressions.

Before anyone can reach the right conclusions about the Army, he has to know something which is not given us to know at present; namely, what the mission of the Army in Germany is to be. Until higher authorities than generals in the field define this all-important question, the best we can do is to make a guess.

We have given our sacred word to the other nations of the world that we will contribute our full part in guaranteeing a durable peace, and if we are not going to do exactly that, we ought to pull out our Army now and let the chips fall where they may.

Personally, I think this would be a horrible thing to do. In the first place, it would not be to our own interest, because our withdrawal from Europe would leave no power there able to withstand the crushing demands of Russia for more and more territory, for a larger and larger sphere of influence, and ultimately for the hegemony of Europe. And the withdrawal of the American Army would establish us as poltroons and slackers before the whole world.

This great country of ours can develop, under the goad of war, the most tremendous military power of any nation on earth. We have proved this twice within 25 years. But conversely, we have the shortest memory of any great nation on earth. As soon as the shooting is over we are prone to believe the war is over, too.

The British know better than that. They have seen wars come and go and have stayed by, both during the war and peace. They are used to maintaining armies of occupation in all the four corners of the earth. We seem to get bored with it. There comes all too soon a point where, as the result of minor vexations and irritations, we say: "To the devil with it, we are going home."

But there is no safe haven from atom bombs or even from rocket bombs. There is no secure asylum left in the world for a man who is not willing to fight for his asylum.

Although I am not at liberty to mention the detailed disposition of our troops in Europe, I can and will say that I believe we have spread our army too thin for safety, possibly not too thin for governance of a docile, beaten enemy, but too thin in case of any international involvement.

I am not an alarmist about Russia. I think the Russians have very bad manners, internationally speaking, but I do not think they want war now, and I do not think the United States wants war.

But is it not fair to say that Marxian Socialism is an evangelistic religion that must expand or die? In this respect it is like Islam. The leaders of the Soviet Republics have preached to their followers so many years that their society would not be safe in a capitalistic world, that there is nothing they can do except win over as many as possible of the other countries of the world to communism. This is written in the book, and no amount of official statements to the effect that the Third Internationale has been abolished can alter the underlying factors. Sooner or later, the irrepressible conflict between the two great ideologies of the world, democracy and communism, will have to reach an equilibrium. Let us pray that the weapons used will be those of argument and demonstration rather than cannon and atom bombs.

NEITHER WANTS WAR NOW

But if I am certain of an ultimate test of strength between the two great branches of economic and political thinking in the world, I am equally certain that neither of the chief champions wants trouble now. Russia desperately needs time to rebuild her shattered industrial plant and bring up the living conditions in the Soviet Republics. America has her hands full with domestic problems, and if she is to fulfill her obligation to the world she has plenty to do in that field, too.

In fact, a war between the Russians and the Americans would be the most prolonged and bloody conflict in history, because neither could get at the other without a tremendous expenditure for maintaining lines of communication before either side could hope to strike a decisive blow. In the meantime, however, such a war might be prolonged by air power and atom bombs, with a frightful loss of life.

But if anyone thinks he could conquer Russia, which is sprawled all over two continents, with atom bombs, he ought to have his head examined. Try bombing Siberia in your mind some time and see how many bombs it would take. There are only three or four large cities in all of Russia, and they could be easily eliminated from the face of the earth without materially affecting the military power of the Soviet Republics.

I am convinced that there is no immediate danger of war with Russia, provided we are firm and not provocative. This nicely balanced attitude we have not realized up to date. But I am forced to say this also, that if Marshal Stalin were inimically disposed toward America he could not have hoped, in his wildest dream, that that would have happened to our armed might which has happened since VE-day.

The peak strength of the Army, including the Air Force, was 8,291,336 on May 31, 1945. From VE-day (May 12, 1945) through May 14, 1946, a total of 6,589,000 was demobilized. From VJ-day (Sept. 2, 1945) through May 14, 1946, a total of 6,589,000 was demobilized. From May 12, 1945, through December 31, 1945, a total of 4,746,000 was demobilized. From January 1, 1946, through May 14, 1946, a total of 2,435,000 was demobilized. The present strength with new recruits and all, is about 2,000,000.

The peak strength of the Army Air Force alone was 2,411,294 on March 31, 1945. On VE-day it was 2,329,534. On VJ-day it was 2,253,182. On January 1, 1946, it was 888,769. The present strength, as of April 1, is 500,472.

The peak strength of the Navy was 3,400,908 on VJ-day. From VJ-day to May 12, 1946, a total of 2,331,214 was demobilized. The present strength is 1,373,334.

The peak strength of the marines was 485,000 in September 1945. Since VJ-day 337,383 have been demobilized. The present strength as of May 3, is 195,509.

The strength of the Coast Guard on May 1, 1945, was 172,724. On April 27, 1946, it had been cut to 54,124.

Furthermore, the present outlook is that on July 1, 1946, the Army will be down to 1,550,000; the Navy to 558,000, and the marines to 108,000, and that on July 1, 1947, the Army will have been cut to 1,070,000; the Navy still at 558,000, and the marines at 108,000.

SPREAD OUT TOO THIN

If you remember these figures and get out the map of the world and spot the points which we have to garrison, you will see what I mean when I say the Army is spread out too thin.

Furthermore, owing to the clamor of mom and pop, Sister Sue, and Sweetheart Mary to get Johnny home, the morale of the men abroad was for a time quite badly shot. This was not entirely their fault, because they, like their fellow Americans at home, did not have any proper idea as to what America was getting into in this war and what we inevitably would have to commit ourselves to in the after-war period.

But when you consider the plight of an officer commanding an important American post in Germany, the business is not less than tragic. Not only have his enlisted men been depleted in numbers, but he has lost his most seasoned combat troops, and they have been replaced by youngsters who have had only a few months' basic training.

The result of the demobilization on the officer personnel has been even more devastating, because, say what you will about the great and decisive contribution of GI Joe in winning the war, it has been the officer corps which has done the thinking and planning for GI Joe. You could not have a victory without both. And it does take longer to train an officer than a private. Furthermore, the officer capable of taking executive responsibility is harder to find than a good private.

In America we make an idol out of GI Joe, and properly so, and after a war it becomes open season to take pot shots at generals, but this, after all, is a very short-sighted policy. What was the contribution of Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, expressed in terms of GI Joes? Was it 1,000, 1,000,000, or what was it? At any rate, it was a very disproportionate figure.

We trained thousands of men for American military government, and then let nearly all of them go home.

The commanding officer of an American outpost in Germany such as I have just referred to, has been at his wit's end the last 6 months, because of changes in his officer personnel. He never knew from day to day whether his executive officer would be with him or on the way home. He had to break in new assistants constantly, and the new assistants were generally not as good as the men who had quit.

We stand at the parting of the ways in this matter right now. Unless the selective service law is extended in adequate form for another year, I think we might as well give up and admit that we are licked and come home; because without it we shall not be able to maintain an army even of the inadequate size recommended by President Truman.

I wish you could all see that Army of ours in Germany. Despite the excessive rate of demobilization, you would be proud of it. You would be proud of the competence of the enlisted men and you would be proud of the generals.

You would not believe it possible for first lieutenants and captains, youngsters like your boy or mine, who started out oftentimes as enlisted men and worked up, to do the job they are doing in running German communities and often German counties.

POISE AND JUDGMENT

You would not believe that they could possibly show so much poise, judgment, and executive ability with so little experience. You expect this sort of thing from a general, but when you find it in a first lieutenant or captain then you know the man must be an American, because those things don't happen in a similar degree in other armies.

No; I shall not join the ranks of those gunning for the officer personnel in the United States Army. There have been some ineffective officers undoubtedly and some unduly harsh officers, but on the whole they measure up to constitute about the finest group of Americans I know anywhere. They are loyal, devoted, and true. If the Americans at home had half the gumption, half the courage, half the guts, half the know-how, it would be a better country.

And while we are talking about the Army, let's consider the behavior of GI Joe in Europe.

I firmly believe that Joe is all right. He got a little out of hand at the end of the war, as did the troops of every nation in Europe. He drank a little too much, ran around a little too much with the wrong kind of girls, but Joe had been trained for several years in the fine art of killing, and one doesn't reconcile red-blooded young men so indoctrinated to an endless succession of evenings punctuated by marshmallow roasts.

I cannot imagine what has motivated some writers and publishers to traduce the American Army as they have done.

DEADLIER THAN ENEMIES

Truly I have read articles in America which were far more deadly in their effect on our Army than anything the Germans had done since the surrender.

By selecting individual cases of drunkenness and playing them up with photographs, these writers have created a false view of the situation.

Joe is not drunk every night. He does not desire to be drunk every night. That and women are not his sole end and aim. Joe was told that he could come home as soon as the shooting was over, and that was our mistake. We have got to go through with that now and bring home the Joes who were told that, but the new Joes, those we shall get by reenlistment and, one hopes, by the extension to the draft, will go to Europe knowing very well that the shooting war is over and that they are there for the specific job of guaranteeing the peace.

I wandered around a dozen German cities at night, as well as being in Austria, Italy, and England, without seeing any evidence whatever of wholesale drunkenness or immorality.

When I pick up the printed page and read some of the articles I referred to, I wonder where these writers have been living in Europe. Because certainly they did not see what I saw. I do not see what on earth would be their motive in tarring the whole Army with such a stick.

Being somewhat old-fashioned in my ideas about armies, I incline to think that our command in Germany and elsewhere in the world, made a mistake in allowing mass protests by enlisted men against demobilization programs, etc. I know very well that America is a democracy, but an army is not a democracy.

RUSSIANS LEARNED LESSON

The Russians found that out. They started out the war with the generals fraternizing with the common soldier, and slapping him on the back. As they got deeper into the war, however, they found this did not work, and when the war ended the Russian Army was the strictest army in the world. When a Russian general marched down the line of his troops, he was a sight to see, according to all those who witnessed it. His person was almost sacred as that of an Oriental despot. Fraternization was out.

In my own short experience in the army in the First World War, I discovered that by and large, the soldiers who got into trouble with their officers were the poor soldiers, the loafers, the insubordinate, and the cowardly. Generally speaking, good soldiers do not get into trouble with their officers.

In other words, I think that the command of the armies was too soft for a period after the war. The Stars and Stripes, for example, carried squawks from soldiers which in any other war would inevitably have led to guardhouse sentences or courts martial. But the policy this time was to encourage this sort of thing, and insubordination grows by what it feeds on.

Lest anyone think that what I am advocating is an infringement on freedom of the press, may I hasten to add that I don't think that an army paper has anything to do with the freedom of the press, and it should not have. It is an organ of the army. The free press is a press that exists outside the orbit of the Army, and can safely be trusted to guard against undue hardship visited on enlisted men or undue arrogance assumed by the officer class. If this be heresy, make the most of it.

FOR ARMY—TREMENDOUSLY

I am tremendously in favor of our Army. I want it to be the largest and best organized Army in the world and to stay that way until, in God's good time, we reach a much better, more settled state of affairs on this troubled planet.

You cannot spend much time in Germany without being impressed with the intense study which has been made of the German problem by our occupying forces.

We were invited to sit with Gen. Lucius D. Clay's cabinet at its weekly staff conference at Berlin.

The general took the chair at the head of the table, and around him were 25 or 30 (I did not count them) staff members, all specialists in one line or another of the occupying force. They ranged in rank from captain to major general. One by one they made their weekly reports. These reports covered every phase of military occupancy, such as denazification, prisoners of war, displaced persons, public health, transportation, food, trade, industry, and communications. This is by no means a complete list.

When the last man had reported one felt that the ground has been thoroughly covered and that General Clay knew exactly what was going on in Germany as of that day. One felt, too, that every member of the staff had an admirable grasp of the phases of the problem which had been assigned to him. And mind you, most of these men had been in combat divisions in Germany only a year ago.

The adaptability of the American to new problems is truly amazing. I think this elasticity of mind is one of the greatest qualities the American people possess and testifies to their youth and vigor and the long life and usefulness ahead of them in composing the differences of the world, if they will but decide to do so.

The CIO-PAC Opposition to the American Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the CIO has taken the attitude that they should rule in the labor world and that they should run American agriculture and American business as well. Why do I say this? Because, my colleagues, this CIO outfit has appeared before committee after committee of the House of Representatives presenting false testimony in its effort to obtain cheap food. They want the farmer to produce food at 10 to 20 cents an hour, but are ever eager to take and exact more for themselves.

I shall give you a couple of examples of the many that could be presented. Just take a look at page 1171 of the June 21, 1943, hearings before the Small Businessmen's Committee. Mr. H. S. Haddock, of the CIO, was presenting his testimony. Question:

There is a difference in food value of the two—

Meaning oleo and butter—

is there not?

Answer, Mr. Haddock:

Yes; oleomargarine has a greater food value than butter today. There is a very decided difference.

Of course, everyone knows that this is not a statement of fact, but the CIO'ers are not satisfied in only bearing false witness against butter, one of the great farm products of the Nation, but let me quote you what the same CIO spokesman had to say the same day about the price of butter and oleo at the same hearings. What is this CIO attitude? On page 1172 of the hearings what do we find? Question:

What is butter selling for?

Answer by Mr. Haddock, of the CIO:

Fifty cents, I believe.

Question:

With the roll-back, it would be less than that—2 cents a pound less?

Answer by the would-be famous CIO dairy expert and economist, Mr. H. C. Haddock:

It should be rolled back to 25 cents.

Just think of it! This CIO representative wanted to put a 25-cent-per-pound price on good butter. Can you imagine any fair-minded person making such a suggestion? Later on one will find also on the same page 1172 of the hearing this same would-be dairy and economic authority stating the following:

In 1939, with feed at the level, a farmer at 25 cents per pound for butter, if he utilized all of his milk products, should make 12 cents per pound.

These are sure silly statements, but they do indicate the attitude of this outfit?

Donald Montgomery, consumer counsel of CIO Auto Workers, testified on November 3, 1943, before the House Agriculture Committee, and stated, on page 186 of the hearings:

These taxes are only one manifestation of that power, but they provide an important keystone to the whole structure. They give governmental sanction and national plausibility to all the other outrages committed by the butter trade against the general welfare.

Do the CIO promoters want oleo so they can organize the workers in the oleo plants and so these promoters can live off them?

I am mighty tired of seeing this outfit trying to run the whole economy of our country. If they want to do something constructive for agriculture they should get to work in the farm-machinery plants and produce the millions of dollars' worth of farm machinery needed on the farms of America. Leading agricultural States like Nebraska know that we cannot feed ourselves and the world without the machinery to accomplish the task. The CIO-PAC approach on the dairy business is very similar to all their approaches to questions of public interest. Is it any surprise that the CIO-PAC outfit is being labeled the CIOleo group of the Nation?

THE CIO IN THE OPA

Few people, my colleagues, realize that the OPA has had a labor CIO panel sitting beside Chester Bowles and telling him when and if any price advances in agricultural products could or should be made. Do you think the farmers and businessmen of the country realized that these CIO would-be economists were that close to the throne? Possibly their attitudes and conclusions have been and are as silly and worthless and as far from the facts and the truth as the expressions of Mr. Haddock and Mr. Montgomery in regard to the dairy business. How would the CIO like to have some farmers or businessmen pass on all labor increases? It is not surprising that confusion prevails in these administration agencies. Is it any wonder that President Truman is making the mistakes he is making? He seems to still be clearing things through the wrong channels.

Declines Continue in Grain Markets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the following article is from the Sunday, July 28, 1946, edition of the New York Times:

DECLINES CONTINUE IN GRAIN MARKETS—CORN AND BARLEY LOWEST OF THE SEASON—PRICES OF CASH WHEAT ADVANCE

CHICAGO, July 27.—Prices of corn and feed barley for future delivery continued today on the downgrade on the Board of Trade, the latter losing 2½ to 3 cents a bushel net, while corn lost 2½ to 3¼ cents. All deliveries of barley made new seasonal low marks, while January corn equaled the old low. Oats were unsettled and finished 1 cent higher to ⅛ cent lower than yesterday, the former on August. At the clost oats were 13¼ to 15¾ cents below the ceiling in effect on June 30; corn was off 8½ to 9¼ cents, and feed barley, 22 to 22½ cents.

Inasmuch as the Government, through CCC, can influence the market price of grain by purchases or by discontinuing set-asides on grain and processed food products, and since the Government has purchased butter at 44 cents per pound from the British, and since the 1946 crop prospects are high at the moment, and since exports through UNRRA and lend-lease are gradually dwindling, do you not think the American people have something more worth while to think about and act on than whether or not the American farmer has been receiving 31 or 41 cents per hour labor return for producing the food and fiber of the Nation? When John Bull takes over completely as administrator of the world OPA, we will then know what it all adds up to.

Since the rural people purchase 40 percent of the manufactured products of the Nation, too many buyers' strikes may throw many workmen out of their jobs.

Talmadge and "Best People" Set the Stage for Murder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Talmadge and 'Best People' Set the Stage for Murder," from the Philadelphia Record of July 29, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALMADGE AND "BEST PEOPLE" SET THE STAGE FOR MURDER

The doctrine of white supremacy with which ranting, wildeyed Eugene Talmadge talked himself into the Governorship of Georgia was demonstrated last week.

It was demonstrated with the shotgun.

The Talmadge creed of intolerance was proved when a lynch mob mowed down in cold blood two young Negro men—one a veteran—and their wives.

That was Talmadge white supremacy. And it was obscene murder.

There's no essential difference from the Hitler brutalities. Hitler "proved" Aryan supremacy with terrorism and murder, too.

The blood of these victims is on the head of grass-roots Fuehrer Talmadge, and on some of the "best people" who cynically backed him with their wealth for selfish, reactionary ends.

It is no coincidence that such a crime was committed hard on the heels of Talmadge's success in the Democratic primary.

Lynchings have steadily declined in the South in the last decade. There has been nothing so dreadful as this since 1918 when six Negroes were lynched, also in Georgia.

Last year there was only one lynching, and there was some doubt even about that.

Talmadge's whole sinister campaign was based on the "Negro menace." Like BILBO in Mississippi, he created an atmosphere of violence, inflamed the minds of the criminals, bigots, and dolts who make up lynch mobs.

To the warped mind, Talmadge's primary success, equivalent to election, confirmed the rightness of violence.

The mob that snuffed out four lives near Monroe last Thursday was out to lynch for lynching's sake. While they did not speak for the people of Georgia, they were proclaiming in their evil voices that Georgia was turning back, that the fine administration of progressive Governor Ellis Arnall was a passing phenomenon.

Even to a gross fanatic, there was no cause for the mass murder in the offense of one of the Negro men. He had stabbed a white man. But the wound was slight and the crime itself was not considered serious. Georgia officials released him on small bail.

To that mob any victim would have served.

Talmadge was not only the candidate of the ignorant, prejudice-ridden "crackers." He had the backing of some utilities, manufacturers, and banks which saw danger to vested interests in a continuation of Arnall's liberal policies.

They must have known the "wild man from Sugar Creek" for what he is—a Fascist peril. Yet they poured from $500,000 to $750,000 into the campaign, it is reported.

Talmadge and these "best people" were not in the lonely swamp at dusk when four human beings were murdered.

But they gave the mob its motive.

Terrorism has been revived in Georgia. A measure of its revival is the assertion now from the chief of the State Investigating Bureau that "under conditions now in Georgia we cannot cope with mob violence."

The chief is an officer of Arnall's progressive administration. Obviously, he wants to cope with it.

If Georgia cannot deal with lynch murder, then the Federal Government must. This is not only Georgia's problem. It's the Nation's problem—and the Nation's shame.

Let the Congress, now poised for vacation, push through a Federal anti-lynching bill, before more lives are taken.

Increase in Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Reuther, Too," from the Washington Post of this morning, relating to increase in production.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REUTHER, TOO

Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers, has followed the lead of President Green of the A. F. of L. in stressing the importance of stepping up production. Not content with generalizations about the benefits to labor of an economy of abundance, Mr. Reuther suggests that the heads of the automobile industry and the top officers of the union should discuss ways and means of getting the industry into maximum production.

In our opinion a conference of that kind would be extremely helpful. It would serve to advertise the often-forgotten fact that a prosperous industry working at full capacity can provide more work at better wages than one handicapped by the high costs of inefficiency. Furthermore, it would afford opportunity for a frank exchange of views that might bring to light many unsuspected obstacles—technological, organizational, and human—that interfere with all-out production.

Silver

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Will There Be Another Holy Crusade for Silver," by Hon. Sinclair Weeks, chairman of the Silver Users Association, and former United States Senator from Massachusetts. I feel that there will be another holy crusade for silver.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of July 25, 1946]

WILL THERE BE ANOTHER HOLY CRUSADE FOR SILVER?

(By Sinclair Weeks, chairman, Silver Users Association, formerly United States Senator from Massachusetts)

(Asserting stage has been well set for hoisting cost of silver for industries, Mr. Weeks points out that, because United States uses five-sixths of world production, an ideal situation prevails for renewal of silver-bloc crusade for $1.29-an-ounce silver. Sees further hoarding by foreign producers expecting to get this higher price and more strangulation of manufacturers. Holds silver is vital industrial commodity and should have a free market determined by supply and demand.)

Another attempt to give a fictitious and so-call monetary price to one of the most important—even critical—industrial metals finally was beaten in the closing days of the congressional session. After a 10-month battle—most of it characterized by filibustering tactics in Senate committee, "behind the scenes" and unnoted by the public—the perennial Senate silver-bloc crusade for $1.29-an-ounce silver was defeated again, and the Treasury price on newly mined domestic silver will only be raised to 90.5 cents, another 30 percent on top of the 100 percent forced through in 1939. Also, the many and varied—and "starved"—silver-using industries will be able to make purchases at that price from the Treasury's stock of 225,000,000 ounces of "free" silver now held in West Point vaults.

Thus the silver famine, caused by silver-bloc agitation, rather than by actual, current shortage in the amount of metal above ground and ready to market, finally was ended, and many millions of ounces of bullion, held abroad and awaiting the outcome of the silver bloc's fight, are now coming into the country.

It seems clear, however, that the threat to a stable market at a fair price—and one upon which industries can base their calculations on production costs—has been lifted only temporarily.

Retreating only because public opinion forced it, Senator PATRICK MCCARRAN insisted on the floor of the Senate on July 12, that the new price only in "a slight measure, indeed, meets the cost of production;" and, on the following day, he asserted that the compromise did not bring about "justice and fair play and equity" and added that ultimately he hoped to see the producers get "what the law of 150 years has promised them, namely, $1.29." So, I am afraid there will be a resumption of the "holy crusade" for a monetary price of all silver, however used.

The stage was well set for the latest attempt at hoisting high the cost of the white metal to many industries.

NEW USES FOR SILVER

During the war there had been expanded industrial demand for silver, because of new uses and expansion of existing applications. Meanwhile production declined, both domestic and foreign, to about 45 percent of the prewar rate. Although this "critical material" was carefully allocated, there was not enough of it. Legislation, the Green Act, was passed—but only after prolonged silver bloc obstruction—permitting industrial purchases from idle and unneeded Treasury stocks. This legislation, once extended, expired on December 31, last.

It was estimated that our industries this year would have need for 125,000,000 ounces of silver. The estimate on domestic production was not over 30,000,000 ounces; or, less than one-quarter of our needs. World production of 1946—90 percent of it in the Western Hemisphere—had been estimated at 150,000,000 ounces. Thus we would need five-sixths of the world production.

This created an ideal set-up for a renewal of the $1.29-an-ounce crusade by western Senators. Their agitation, in turn, made the shortage-of-supply crisis more acute because, of the 150,000,000 ounces held abroad—by governments, for sale when that would be most profitable; and by private holders, for speculative gains—none would come into the open market so long as there was a prospect of $1.29-an-ounce silver, a price 72 percent above the existing OPA ceiling, 71 cents, and three and one-half times the prewar quotation of 35 cents.

In these circumstances, the only available source of supply for industry was the Treasury's idle stock pile. Fearing approaching shut-downs, silver-using industries began seeking renewal of permission-to-purchase legislation in October, last. Early this year the House twice voted authorization, their their action including passage of a bill jointly sponsored—a notable and unusual procedure—by Majority Leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK and Minority Leader JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr. Half a year of obstruction in the Senate followed.

CONDITION OF SILVER-USING INDUSTRIES

Silver-using industries always try to carry adequate reserves. Under war conditions this became more difficult. There were some stocks on hand from the last of the purchases from the Treasury under the expiring Green Act. But, the strangulation of supply caused by the silver bloc's price agitation can be readily illustrated. Silver users were getting 15 percent of their needs in January; 10 percent in February; less than 5 percent in April and May. Their reserve stock rapidly disappeared. Production was cut back radically; employment dropped. In some instances—as in the case of electrical contact points—deliveries stopped completely.

Here again, as often previously, westerners were having considerable success in "spreading indifference" by contending that the silver crisis affected only, relatively, a small handful of manufacturers of luxury products—jewelry and silverware—and, these located chiefly in New England. But, on this occasion they pushed too far their "famine tactics"—trying to create an artificial cause for higher prices.

SILVER A VITAL ESSENTIAL COMMODITY

Gradually it became apparent that the "only-luxury-industries" line of persuasion was not doing as well as usual. The famine had become so acute that too many industries—and employees of these industries—came to be aware of their stake in this created famine condition, and there were many and varied demands for a solution of the silver crisis—for a quicker solution.

Public, press, and legislators alike were awakened by such facts as these:

Relatively few of the many postwar brides would be able to obtain the most coveted item in their hope chests, silver service. Shipment of furniture for the new homes of the Nation was threatened by lack of silver for mirror manufacture. Our newspapers and magazines would be pictureless—and soon—unless there was quick solution of the silver nitrate shortage.

Independent photoengraving concerns—makers of plates for the Nation's biggest advertisers—and the union of their employees, wired President Truman and many others in Washington about the acuteness of their situation. They also obtained a ruling from the Treasury that there was no law on the statute books preventing the processing of silver dollars into the light-sensitive emulsions needed in their trade.

Similarly, it was discovered that the production of new motion pictures might soon be jeopardized because leading photographic manufacturers had, in June, variously, but 2 to 8 weeks supplies of silver nitrate.

The chief radiologist of the Mayo Clinic, at Rochester, Minn., pointed out that American lives might be endangered by the shortage of this chemical, vital to the production of X-ray film, of which hospitals, clinics, and doctors, and dentists' offices use nearly 100,000,000 square feet annually.

A leading manufacturer of electrical contact points declared that if the automotive industry were operating at full capacity, delivery of cars, trucks, and farm machinery would be halted within 3 weeks because of the exhaustion of these little silver-tipped devices. The rapidly expanding home-appliances industries would be similarly affected; and, finally, shortage of points replacements would affect the operation and control of all the motor-powered assembly lines of the country.

Silver is a necessary critical material without which it is impossible to manufacture many other things all of us want, and it is vital to many other industrial operations, including food processing.

But, enough of the truth about silver had reached Washington, and from so many directly concerned sources, that even Senator McCARRAN no longer could hold out against the pressure to end delay and take decisive action. As noted, even he has retreated from the $1.29-or-bust position for the time being.

One of the most encouraging phases of this awakening on silver was the hundreds of newspaper editorials printed. And, the number of writers who, correctly, wrote about silver as an industrial commodity, a vital necessity of our lives and our industry; and who demanded an end to the confusion, arising out of the attempt by westerners to clothe it in sanctity as a precious monetary metal.

As somebody once said on the Senate floor:

"Silver has all the attributes of money except value."

What the many and varied silver-using industries need, of course, is a free commodity market in this useful metal. Let its price be determined by supply and demand, as is the price of any other commodity, and not by law.

I hope that some of the recent education on this subject sticks in the minds of our legislators and the public, so that it will not be necessary to fight this battle of silver over and over again during the years ahead.

Veterans Point Out Bunglings of War Assets Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am just in receipt of the following letter from a veteran of World Wars I and II, an active businessman in Tulsa, Okla., which shows the bunglings of War Assets Administration in the disposal of surplus property.

Several months ago I predicted that the handling and mismanagement by this Bureau of the sale of war assets and surplus property would eventually be recognized as post-war scandal No. 1. I am receiving letters every few days from veterans and others pointing out the bunglings and apparent graft that has run rampant in this country in connection with the acquisition and disposal of assets connected with our recent war, at the tremendous expense of the taxpayers of this country. My veteran constituent says in his letter to me of July 24, 1946:

Re War Assets Administration.

Dear Mr. SCHWABE: The writer has been in business here in Tulsa in the builders' hardware and building-specialty business for 24 years. I have served both in World War I and II, overseas both times, as an officer of the Corps of Engineers.

Here in Tulsa and elsewhere there have been held sales of surplus materials by the War Assets Administration.

I have, since my return from the Army in 1944, made several attempts to procure Government surplus as a veteran. At each turn I have been stymied. Last week, I attempted to get clearance to go to Oklahoma City (Tinker Field) for a sale of surplus material and requested a veteran's certificate to attend this sale now in progress. I was given Form SWPC-66 dated 6-29-45 to fill out. This I did.

I was then informed that under War Assets Administration order General Procedure No. 1, March 27, 1946, section 5, paragraph 10, that I could only be certified as a veteran once and once only and that I had to show on the back of this application just what I wanted to buy and that this is all I could buy and further that I could never again ask for certification as a veteran and hence could go to no other sales. Of course, I could from imagination list everything I might be interested in in the future but that is not a reasonable demand on the part of the Government or anyone else.

I have planned for over 20 years and particularly for the past 6 or 8 years to establish a manufacturing business here in Tulsa, manufacturing such building products as we have been selling for these 24 years.

We run a volume of up to quarter of a million a year and have sold and furnished metal windows and doors in large volume during all these 24 years. A large portion of Tulsa's buildings have our windows, doors, and hardware.

We are prepared to invest from $25,000 up to possibly $50,000 in plant and equipment without any assistance from any source and this by means of loans might be expanded to a very important manufacturing business here in Tulsa.

We have the experience and have a very fine bunch of men to handle such a business.

We have delayed our plans because of the war and the absence of two of our keymen in the Army in Europe. Three of our present management group served as Army officers and we lost one, a lieutenant colonel of engineers.

Thus, we have the experience, the capital, the know-how, but we are given the brush-off by the War Assets Administration. It is not reasonable to expect anyone to lay out all his plans and list all his requirements before he starts. This is a very expensive undertaking without knowing just what is available and where you can get it and when.

Many of the things we could make may be made with various types of machines. Metal windows may be made on a break, on rollers, extruded, and by punch press and cut-off operations. In fact, several or all of these operations may be involved. Doors and door frames and hardware items are the same way. Some parts are made one way, some another.

The machines and tools available will shape the type and course of manufacturing. Maybe I could use an 8-foot power break, a 10-foot would be better and a 12-foot still better. The size, cost, capacity, type, and so forth, of machine would determine what you could make and how you could make it.

There is a small opportunity to study what the Government has for sale. There are volumes of mimeographed lists of bolts, nuts, glass, trucks, ditching equipment, but on the vital machines I need I have never seen a list, although I have asked for them.

I have seen these machines in the plants. I have seen them after they were moved to such concerns as to Bethlehem Steel Co., or to school systems as virtual gifts. Yet, I cannot seem to locate them.

This sort of an operation involves dies, tools, welding equipment, and thousands of items varying with the type of thing you intend to make.

Obviously it is impractical to make up lists without knowing what can be had. Even our specification might miss the mark just enough to throw us out. Suppose we listed a 10'-0" power break and there were no tens but there were twelves. Then, what of the tools, dies, etc. There are such things. Why can't we look over what the Government has and decide what we want.

Why can't we go to these sales, certified properly as veterans, and get the feel and learn what is available and at what price? If one goes in to buy a suit, he probably will buy shirts, ties, shoes, etc., but no one asks the customer to list all his requirements before he can see any goods and then be told that if it is not on his list he cannot buy it and that after he leaves, it is his last chance. He cannot come back as Administration Order No. 1 says.

This single-certification idea is unjust. I do not read into the administrative order quoted above all that is claimed by local WAA subofficials.

The whole plan seems to be to let the veteran in once and once only—to let him buy a truck or a piece of equipment of some kind and then have done with him for good. Just a gesture to rid the WAA of veterans in the easiest possible way for the WAA and to blazes with the veteran.

How can I go about getting a plant or equipment under such rules? How is the Government to allow the veteran to use his priority practically?

How come an Administrator can write such rules when the intent of the Congress and the people of the United States is to give the veterans preference in getting new businesses under way?

How come a General George or any individual or group can write or approve the writing of such an arbitrary order as Administrative Order No. 1 cited above?

No doubt it is all too big for me to get anything done about it. No doubt you will find it difficult but it does seem there is a more just way of treating the veteran and a more satisfactory way of getting at and distributing Government surplus.

Under the present plan, far too much of it will end up in the junk dealers' and speculators' hands.

Right now I'd like to buy some shelving, desks, machines, tools, materials. Later or even soon I would be interested in an entire plant or the tools and equipment to set one up.

Why should I not be certified as a veteran as many times as there are sales in which I may be interested and for whatever I can buy?

What do you suggest, Mr. SCHWABE? The sale at Oklahoma City is for July 24 to August 6.

Hope in the Rising Generation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT W. HAWKES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article published in the London Times on July 14 entitled "Hope in the Rising Generation," by G. M. Young. Mr. Young is a wise and able statesman and author. He pins his faith in the maturing youth of Great Britain and of the other nations of the civilized world.

There is much good for thought in this article, I recommend its reading to all Members of Congress.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOPE IN THE RISING GENERATION

(By G. M. Young)

So those county colleges on which I had set my hopes are to be postponed. I feel like the old lady who believed that faith could remove mountains. Being a cautious soul she decided to begin with the apple tree outside her bedroom window. At night she prayed. In the morning it was still there. "I knew it would be," she said. I see I have been trying to believe that the Minister of Education would begin by doing what most imperatively and urgently needs to be done. But—I knew he wouldn't.

So, deprived of hope, I must look for consolation elsewhere; and I find it most readily when I compare things as they were in the years following the First War, and the time in which we are living. In many ways it is a most uncomfortable time, with few gleams of light coming through the murky air. But one of them is bright enough to keep my spirits from drooping altogether; and in these days it is a duty to impart whatever source of cheerfulness one has discovered in oneself.

OUR HANDS ARE CLEAN

It seems to me, then, that in the late, or Second War, we kept our moral strength as we certainly did not in the First, when, if we went in with clean hands, we came out not much caring whether they were clean or dirty. But in 1939—thanks very largely to Neville Chamberlain—we had scraped our conscience to the bone, if consciences have bones. There was nothing in us to fester, nothing to turn sour. And so we ended, tired, poor, shaken, everything that makes for discomfort on the one hand; but on the other—well, simple ideas go best in simple words, and it seems to me that we came out good. I sometimes think the difference between the two is rather like the difference, at least as I imagine it, between the Peloponnesian War with the moral catastrophe that attended it, and the Persian War, when Greeks could stand up among their desecrated shrines and plundered cities and say: "We have done it—and it was worth doing." And how many of us could honestly say we felt like that in 1920?

But if I am right, then this must be a wonderful time to be starting in. And that may be the reason of the good reports that from all sides keep coming to me, of the intellectual virtues and moral accomplishments of the rising generation; disciplined, they say, but still receptive; schooled by war and not spoiled by peace. That, I confess, is how they mostly strike me, but then I can select my own company, and so I rely much more on the judgment of those who have to take them and teach them and employ them just as they come.

ADVICE TO THE YOUNG

Suppose what their pastors and masters tell me is as true as it is certainly pleasant to believe, to what objects should we, who have seen so much more of the world and its mischief, particularly direct these younger and clearer eyes? I have a horror of what, I think, is known in the philanthropic business as helping chaps, and I would rather the chaps went wrong in a hundred of their own ways than went right in one because it was mine. Still one does know a thing or two, I fancy; and if a man is convinced of anything, he is under a certain obligation to pass it on.

A hundred years ago I should have said: "The particular mischief of our time is that we don't know one another well enough, and we may find ourselves splitting just when we most need to hold together. So go to Lancashire like Coningsby, go to Jacob's Island, or to one of those Dorset villages which are not exactly the gems of our countryside and see how your fellow countrymen live and what they think about it all." They went.

Fifty years ago it would have been: "We are dropping behind, and the intoxications of Empire cannot make up for ignorance, old rule-of-thumb, and a rather puffy self-satisfaction. See what you can make of that." They did.

THE COUNTY COLLEGES

And today? Something like this, I think: "The political responsibility of our people is perilously far ahead of their political culture; and yet never was their responsibility greater. They don't know what to believe or disbelieve, and so they believe and disbelieve at random. Their idea of truth is not what is rightly deduced from tried observation but what somebody who seems to know delivers most agreeably—until the next man calls it wishful thinking and then they believe him. Now, that is a dangerous lead for the common intelligence, charged with unlimited power, to be working on. See if you can lift it." Will they?

The war seems to have reared a stock of young men and women who know how to manage their minds, and that is what we most need in an age of material confusion and mental bewilderment. The next thing is to use it properly, and that means providing for the follow-on. That is why the postponement of the county colleges saddens me. I had always thought of them as a field of radiation, through which the example of the generation matured in war should work on the generation maturing for peace. But they seem to be left hanging loose as before, just at the time when that example might be acting with most potency. Of all educational agencies the attraction of the admired type is the most effectual; and here we have one of the finest types our race has ever bred. How are we to set it working on the years that come next in order? If I belonged to them I think I should say, "I don't mind Miss Wilkinson selling her birthright for equality of opportunity and a glass of milk at 11. But she ought not to sell mine."

Six Articles on America's Monetary System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the House have given me unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a series of six articles analyzing the monetary system of our country and pointing out the needs for its constructive improvement. These articles were written for the Workers Education Bureau of the American Federation of Labor, whose director is Mr. John D. Connors, and I am gratified to say quite widely reprinted throughout the country. I am also pleased to specifically mention the fact that the third in this series of articles, that entitled "Money and How It Works," was reprinted in the August issue of the Washington News Digest, which is edited and published by our former colleague, John J. O'Connor.

MONEY AND HOW IT WORKS

(By Hon. JERRY VOORHIS for the Workers Education Bureau of America, January 15, 1946)

I. WHAT IS MONEY?

President John Adams wrote to Thomas Jefferson and said: "All the perplexities, confusion, and distress in America arise, not from defects in their constitution or confederation, not from want of honor and virtue, so much as from downright ignorance of the nature of coin, credit, and circulation."

That statement is still true today. We don't know, most of us, where our money comes from, who manufactures it, or why it changes in purchasing power from time to time.

What we do know is that we have to have money in order to live. We know that if there is too much money in circulation in proportion to the production of things to buy with it, prices will go up; and that if there isn't enough money in circulation goods will not be sold and people will lose their jobs.

But we don't understand just why these things happen. It is time, however, that we found out because, if we did the right things with money, there is no reason we could not keep both production and consumption at a high level through the years, have jobs for all needing and wanting them, and thus prove to the whole world that freedom and democracy are the ideal system.

First of all, then, what are the purposes of money?

In the earliest days of civilization before there were governments or banks the only kind of money that anyone would accept consisted of things that were in themselves valuable—like hides or furs or metals. Money wasn't very important then anyway, because most people were farmers or hunters and each family got its own living directly from nature. There wasn't much need for trading or exchange. In fact most people could get along without using money at all.

But today exactly the opposite is true. We live in a world of machinery and hardly a single person produces even a fraction of the things he and his family must have to live on. Each person works to help produce a certain special commodity, gets paid for his work in money, and then exchanges the money for the goods he wants, which have, in turn, been produced by others. So it is plain to be seen that money is the bridge between producers and consumers. It is the indispensable link that ties the economic system together and enables us to have specialized production and division of labor. Without it our modern civilization would break down and we would all have to try desperately to find some way to produce for ourselves all the things needed to sustain life. In such an effort, obviously, only a fraction of us could succeed.

We use money also to store up purchasing power to use later on. If we had no money, we'd try to save the actual food and goods for our old age, and, of course, that would be impossible.

The value of all goods, services, and property is measured in money, even though the money itself would be valueless without the guaranty of our Government to accept it in payment of debts due the Government. Money is the most important single factor in our economic system, and yet we let people who have a selfish interest in keeping us in ignorance tell us the subject is very mysterious and too hard for the everyday citizen to understand. This simply isn't true.

The first thing to have clearly in mind is where our money comes from and how it gets into circulation. The Government does not create the money we use in the United States. The private banks create it, and—with very minor exceptions—we cannot under our present money system get a single dollar of the very lifeblood of our economic system into circulation unless somebody, either a private individual or a corporation or the Government, goes into debt to a bank.

This is the basic fault in our present system: Our supply of money is tied to our debt so stoutly that whenever we need more money we have to take on a larger debt burden at the same time. This is wrong, both morally and economically. The main purpose of this series of articles will be to prove that statement and to show how we can constructively change the system into one that can free us from oppressive debt instead of pushing us deeper and deeper into it.

MONEY AND HOW IT WORKS

(By Hon. JERRY VOORHIS for the Workers Education Bureau of America, February 15, 1946)

II. WHERE MONEY COMES FROM

The only times in modern American history when jobs have been plentiful have been times when the debt of the people was increasing. From 1922 to 1929 total debt, public and private, increased from $124,000,000,000 to $174,000,000,000 and in these years the value of our production rose from $73,000,000,000 to $110,000,000,000. But from 1929 to 1932 the total debt fell from $174,000,000,000 to $157,000,000,000, and millions of people lost their jobs as the value of national production dropped from $110,000,000,000 to only $58,000,000,000 in 1932.

Another example is in 1937. Total debt had been increasing slowly under the forced draft of governmental borrowing and spending. But in 1937 an attempt was made to balance the budget and in a period of a few months total debt went down about $1,500,000,000. But this apparently small decline in the debt caused production to fall off from $113,000,000,000 in 1937 to only $89,000,000,000 in 1938 and the Government took to borrowing and spending again on a much larger scale. With the coming of the war we began to go into debt as never before in all human history. And, for the simple reason that there was an almost unlimited demand for goods backed by enough money to pay for them, America's production increased to more than double the previous all-time high and so many jobs were created that there were not enough workers to fill them all.

Now what does all this mean? Does it mean that it is a good thing to have everybody, including the Government, going deeper and deeper into debt all the time? Most certainly it does not. But it does mean that until we change the money system it will be impossible for us to have either full production or full employment unless either private agencies or the Government does go deeper and deeper into debt. This is a very serious situation in a country that already has a national debt of $300,000,000,000.

How does it come about? The Constitution of the United States says:

"Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof." But Congress doesn't do that and that is the root cause of our own trouble.

At present the following agencies coin the money of this Nation: (1) the United States Treasury when it issues silver certificates in exchange for silver bought from producers; (2) the United States Mint when it coins the small change, the pennies, nickels, dimes, quarters, half dollars, and dollars out of metal; (3) the Federal Reserve System when it issues Federal Reserve notes or extends Federal Reserve credit to the Government or member banks of the Federal Reserve System; and (4) our 15,000 commercial banks; whenever they create checkbook money in the process of making loans. So it is not the Congress which coins the money of this Nation but four different agencies, of which the two important ones are the privately owned Federal Reserve System and the privately owned 15,000 commercial banks.

Of all the various sorts of money only the silver certificates and the small change (the total of which is only a drop in the bucket compared to other kinds of money) come into circulation without a debt being attached to them. For only silver certificates and small change are created by an agency of the Government. All the rest of our money—at least 98 percent of it, including Federal Reserve notes, Federal Reserve bank credit, and commercial bank demand deposits—comes into use by the people only when some one borrows from a bank and the bank creates on its books a demand deposit ("checkbook money") equal to the amount the person wants to borrow. This is why we are in a vicious circle wherein we cannot have high production and employment unless our debts increase at the same time and in at least the same relative amount.

The next article in this series will explain exactly how private banks create, on the basis of some one's debt to them, every dollar (with absolutely unimportant exceptions) that we use in the United States to pay for war, to prevent depression, to transact our business.

MONEY AND HOW IT WORKS

(By Hon. JERRY VOORHIS for the Workers Education Bureau of America, March 15, 1946)

III. HOW BANKS CREATE MONEY

Not the United States Government, but privately owned banks create the money of America today. Most of that money consists of demand deposits subject to check in the banks More than 90 percent of all our business is done by check—less than 10 percent by cash.

Private banks create money when they make loans. They create the money with which to make the loans—even when the loan is made to the United Staes Government itself. The reason the banks are able to do this is that under our present laws and Federal Reserve regulations banks are allowed to have $5 of depositors' claims outstanding against them or, in other words, $5 of demand deposits for every $1 of actual cash which the bank has in reserve. So for every $1,000,000 of capital, surplus, undivided profits, and cash deposits which the bank has it can create on its books and loan to borrowers an additional $4,000,000 of demand deposits which are actually nothing more than bankers' promises to pay if they can. These bankers' promises are, of course, backed up to a considerable extend by the Government's guaranty of deposits.

When John Doe buys a war bond or a Victory bond he pays the Treasury of the United States for it with some of the money which he has earned and saved for that purpose. But there is another kind of so-called Government borrowing which is not really borrowing at all. It was described by Chairman Marriner S. Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board in testifying before the House Banking and Currency Committee. Here is what he said:

"In purchasing offerings of Government bonds, the banking system as a whole creates new money, or bank deposits. When the banks buy a billion dollars of Government bonds as they are offered—and you have to consider the banking system as a whole, as a unit—the banks credit the deposit account of the Treasury with a billion dollars. They debit their Government bond account a billion dollars, or they actually create, by a bookkeeping entry, a billion dollars."

This is the process by which banks create money. They do almost the same thing when they create demand deposits in loaning to farmers on mortgages on their farms or to home owners on mortgages on their homes. The bank simply writes in a passbook the figures $10,000 under the farmer's name, gives the farmer a checkbook and tells him it has loaned him $10,000. What happens is that the bank creates and loans at the same moment to the farmer a $10,000 checking account, or $10,000 of "checkbook" money, or the bank's promise to pay $10,000 in cash if the farmer asks for it, which he seldom does. This $10,000 is new money which didn't exist before the bank made the loan. It is secured by the mortgage on the farmer's land. But when the banks write figures on their books and use them to buy Government bonds, then what they are actually doing is using a part of the credit of the American people themselves, loaning it back to the people's government, and collecting interest from the people on their own credit. It is true the banks credit the Government with the newly-created demand deposit with which they buy the bonds. But this bankers' promise to pay has nothing in the world behind it except the Government bonds themselves and those bonds, as everyone knows, derive their entire value from the fact that the credit of the Government of the United States, based on the industry and tax-paying ability of the people, is security for their repayment. This process whereby we permit private banks to perform the essentially governmental function of creating money and then lending it at interest to the Nation corresponds to what would happen if a man went to a farmer and said:

"Mister, I want to buy your farm. I have no money, but if you just give me title to your farm, then I will have something on which to establish a line of credit and I will let you draw checks against that line of credit up to the sale price of the farm. Of course, it will be my farm after you give it to me and so I will have to charge you interest on this credit I let you use. I realize this is a bit complicated but all matters connected with money are complicated and you should not try to understand it."

If we substitute the Government for the farmer, the banks for the man who makes the proposition and Government bonds for the farm, we have the situation with regard to how banks create money, how they take over a power given to Congress by the Constitution and then charge the whole Nation interest on its own credit. This and future generations must pay the bank interest on bonds they have "bought" by this strange procedure.

Before World War II, that is, in September of 1941, the amount of our national debt which had been acquired by the banks in this manner was about $22,000,000,000. Today it is approaching $100,000,000,000. This is debt-that-ought-not-to-be-debt. It ought to be national credit instead. No free people should permit any agency to create money in their country except the national government itself. And if this rule had been observed and our Constitution followed, if our Government had created this $100,000,000,000 in the first place instead of permitting the banks to do it, the American people would be $100,000,000,000 less in debt today than they actually are. One hundred billion dollars is a lot of money.

MONEY AND HOW IT WORKS

(By Hon. JERRY VOORHIS for the Workers Education Bureau of America, April 15, 1946)

IV. WHAT NEEDS TO BE DONE?

It wouldn't be quite so serious for the banks of America to create the country's money if only this peculiar sort of synthetic money remained in existence once it had been created. But it doesn't. The banking system has equal power to destroy our medium of exchange.

Between 1929 and 1933 $8,000,000,000 of America's money was destroyed. This was done simply by the banks calling in outstanding loans for repayment and refusing to renew them. At the same time, of course, very few new loans were being made. So the depression deepened over the land and in early 1933 hundreds of the banks of the country were finding it more and more impossible to pay their depositors the money that the depositors were asking for. The money just wasn't in the banks. So the banks had to be closed. America was depending on bank-created "checkbook" money for the supply of her medium of exchange. The supply had failed.

On the other hand, many people believe we haven't had any great inflation during the war period. But they are wrong. The fact is we have had an inflation of more than $70,000,000,000 of brand-new money during the war. But not a penny of it has been created by the Government of the United States.

Why have these things happened? They have been directly due to our unscientific monetary system; to the fact that "money in the bank" is not money in the bank, but only the promise of the bank to pay a depositor when, as, and if it can. It is all entirely legal, because our law says that banks need have on hand or "in reserve" only $1 of real money for every $5 of bank-created "promise to pay" money which they owe to depositors. This is called the fractional reserve system of banking.

Under this system, the banks, following their natural self-interest, always tend to create too much money whenever a boom is in progress and then to destroy it just as fast or faster at the very time—a time of threatening deflation and depression—when the Nation desperately needs more money in circulation.

The present system works just backward.

And as long as the Congress of the Nation fails to exercise its constitutional right and duty to "coin money and regulate the value thereof," the only recourse our Nation has in time of need is to increase the national debt by selling interest-bearing Government bonds to banks for demand deposits (promises to pay) created by the banks for the express purpose of buying the bonds.

This is the real explanation of why the national debt increased as much as it did during the years of the depression.

What needs to be done?

The banks of the Nation should be divided into two departments. One would be a savings and loan department. It would accept savings deposits from the people and lend them to or invest them in business enterprises. The other would be a demand-deposit department where people could, for the payment of a small service charge, put their money for safekeeping and draw checks against it. Every dollar people believe they have on deposit in a demand deposit should actually be there—held in trust for them. In other words, there should be 100-percent reserves for all demand deposits.

Under this plan no bank could possibly fail. There could never be another "run" on a bank. No bank could create too much money in boom times, nor could it destroy billions of dollars of vitally needed money in time of depression.

The money of America should be created under an explicit law of Congress by an agency of Congress and in just the right amount to match the increase in the Nation's production—no more, no less. Any new money required under such a system should be deposited in the United States Treasury like any other Treasury income, where it would take the place of funds that would otherwise have to be raised by taxation. This would reduce the tax burden on the people. The new money would get into circulation as the Government paid its bills.

With such a system in effect our Nation need never again suffer the devastating effects of either inflation or deflation. Both would be against the law.

Money and How It Works

(By Hon. Jerry Voorhis for the Workers Education Bureau of America, May 15, 1946)

V. How a scientific money system would work

All history proves that in a free economy the supply of money must increase at least as fast as production of goods and services increases or we get a collapse of the market, depression, and unemployment. Therefore, as long as private banks continue to exercise the privilege of creating the money of this great Nation it will be equally true that the amount of our debt must increase at least as rapidly as production increases or business will fail, farms will be foreclosed, and millions will lose their jobs.

But we cannot go on increasing our debt indefinitey. The interest burden is already so heavy that it will take great national effort to meet it. And should we suffer an economic depression the debt we now have simply could not be carried, let alone reduced.

Furthermore, what the people of America want is not only security but also liberty. They want economic liberty. They don't want to have the Government making all the decisions and telling everyone what he must or must not do.

The only way we can have both freedom and security is to end the twin dangers of inflation and deflation, and thus remove the major cause of depressions and unemployment. This is why a scientific money system is so important.

How would such a system work? It would base our money on the need for money, not on debt. And the need for money is directly dependent on the amount of goods we are capable of producing. Therefore, what we need is a carefully written law creating as an agency of Congress a United States monetary authority which would have one job and only one. That job would be to control the money supply of the United States and to keep it always in balance with our power to produce. The monetary authority would have to watch the levels of prices very carefully and the indexes of our productive capacity. It would have the power to create the money of the United States. But only in accordance with certain very definite principles. It must not permit the general level of prices to go up or down more than a certain number of points. And it must, above all, never permit an increase in power to produce wealth to be wasted because of an insufficiency of purchasing power among the people to buy the goods that would be produced if this capacity to produce were used.

Each year the monetary authority would create to the credit of the United States Treasury enough, and no more than enough, new national credit or money to match the increase in capacity to produce. The new money created must bear the same ratio to the money previously in circulation as the increase in productive capacity does to previous productive capacity. The new money would be credited to the Treasury and would enter circulation as the Government paid its bills. It would be revenue without the necessity of either levying taxes or borrowing. Thus the market for goods in general could never again fail in America. We should not, of course, know whether or not a certain company would be able to sell all it wanted to produce of a certain specific thing. But we should know that the demand for goods generally would be kept always in reasonable balance with the supply.

This is the master key to a world of both freedom and security. Whenever the general over-all supply of goods threatens to exceed the purchasing power of the people, the right measure is always to increase the people's purchasing power (or demand) and the wrong one is to reduce the supply.

Free the Nation and its people from this bondage to debt, cut the knot that ties our supply of money to the national debt, and for the first time our country will be free from inflation and deflation and in a position to insure continuously expanding production, employment, and national well-being. In the final article the first concrete step toward that goal will be outlined.

Money and How It Works

(By Hon. Jerry Voorhis for the Workers Education Bureau of America, June 15, 1946)

VI. Who owns the Federal Reserve System?

When the Federal Reserve Act was passed in 1913, a lot of people believed that the 12 central Federal Reserve banks created by that act were going to be Government institutions. But they were not then made so and never have been. Every penny of stock in the Federal Reserve banks belongs to the private member banks of the Federal Reserve System. In the words of the late Senator Glass, of Virginia, who, as author of the Federal Reserve Act, certainly should have known, "the Government does not own one dime of proprietary interest in the Federal Reserve banks."

The first essential step in the building of a scientific monetary system in America is for Congress to purchase from the member banks all the capital stock of the central Federal Reserve banks and make them Government institutions. This would cost us about $154,000,000.

Thomas Jefferson once said, "If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issue of their currency, first by inflation and then by deflation, the banks and corporations that grow up around them will deprive the people of their property until their children wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered."

Today over 99 percent of all the business of the 12 central Federal Reserve banks consists of creating money and using it to buy interest-bearing bonds and notes of the United States Government. They are the central banks of issue of the United States. No central bank of issue ever should belong to anyone except the whole people of the Nation. The people of England have just completed making the Bank of England a government institution. It is high time the American people did likewise with the central Federal Reserve banks.

In a paper entitled "The Nature of the Federal Reserve Banks," written by Mr. E. A. Goldenweiser, chief of the research division of the Federal Reserve Board, we find this statement:

"The Reserve bank derives the funds available for its loans and investments from powers conferred upon it by Congress. The capital it has is prescribed by Congress and constitutes a small part of the funds at its disposal. The other sources of the funds of the Reserve bank are its power to issue notes and to accept and create deposits."

Note the words "create deposits." It is with these created deposits that bonds of the United States are bought.

The Federal Reserve banks have capital stock of only $154,000,000. But today they own over $22,000,000,000 of Government bonds, notes, and bills. The American people must sometime pay out of taxes that amount of money plus interest on it to these banks. And yet the Federal Reserve banks bought these Government bonds and notes with what is called Reserve bank credit, which is nothing more nor less than the credit of the United States. It is figures written on the bank books, which cost the banks nothing to create, but which the Government itself guarantees and stands behind with all its resources. If the Federal Reserve banks had belonged to the Government our Nation would be $22,000,000,000 less in debt than it is today. For then whenever Reserve bank credit was created it would have been credited to the account of the American people instead of being debited against the people and credited to private banks.

According to the terms of the Federal Reserve Act, "Federal Reserve notes, to be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of making advances to Federal Reserve banks through the Federal Reserve agents as hereinafter set forth and for no other purposes, are hereby authorized." In other words, Federal Reserve notes can be "made available" to member banks of the system for their use, but not to the United States Government unless it pays interest upon them. Should the Treasury of the United States seek to borrow any such money (which is the principal currency of our country today) it would have to borrow it at interest from a private banking institution. Nevertheless, every Federal Reserve note bears upon its face these words: "Redeemable in lawful money at the United States Treasury or at any Federal Reserve bank." The only thing that lawful money would possibly be is money issued by the United States Government. Therefore, it is perfectly clear that the Government of the United States must stand behind and, if called upon, redeem every dollar of Federal Reserve notes which is issued.

By spending the $154,000,000 to purchase the capital stock of the central Federal Reserve banks from the private member banks Congress would do the following things for the American people:

First. Acquire an accumulated surplus of over $200,000,000.

Second. Reduce the public debt by some $22,000,000,000, the amount of United States bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, Treasury bills, and guaranteed securities held by the central banks on August 29, 1945, and bought with Reserve bank credit, which, as has been explained, is the credit of the United States and the people thereof.

Third. Restore to Congress its constitutional duty and right to issue the Nation's money and regulate its value. The Federal Reserve banks are now the bank of issue of America. As such they should be—they should always have been—an agency of Congress and the property of the American people.

Fourth. Place our Nation in the position of being able to solve the problem of interest-bearing public debt.

Fifth. The purchase by Congress of the 12 central banks would mean that the Nation could earn its way out of debt. When the Federal Reserve Board purchased—as it normally does—outstanding Government bonds from member banks in order to expand the volume of money and credit in circulation, in line with increasing production, those bonds would belong to an agency of the Government. They would in effect have been retired without the necessity of any tax revenues being used to do so. Interest upon such bonds would, of course, be saved. Hence by increasing their production the people of the Nation would be able to earn their way out of debt.

The Federal Reserve banks are to all intents and purposes the bank of issue of the United States; they put Federal Reserve notes, our principal currency, into circulation. They have been given gold certificates which give them a lien on over $17,000,000,000 of the gold in Fort Knox. They create money at will in the form of Federal Reserve credit and thus obligate all the resources of all the people to make that credit good. They execute the open-market policy of the Board, which determines largely the price of Government securities as well as the volume of money in circulation. But the Government and people of the United States own not one penny of stock in the Federal Reserve banks. These belong, lock, stock, and barrel, to the commercial banks which are members of the System.

The Federal Reserve banks should become the property of the American people and they should be operated as one central bank of issue under a specific mandate passed by the Congress. Their sole purpose should be to serve the general welfare of all the American people, their agriculture, commerce, and industry by providing at all times a dollar of steady, stable, and constant buying power.

Oklahoma State Highway Commission Protests Subsidies to Federal Flood-Control Projects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am just in receipt of the following resolution adopted by the Oklahoma State Highway Commission on June 24, 1946, signed by the chairman and two members of the commission and attested by its secretary with seal affixed, which I think should be brought to the attention of Congress:

At a regular meeting of the Oklahoma State Highway Commission held in the capitol office building in Oklahoma City on June 24, 1946, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the Mississippi Valley Conference of State Highway Departments at its thirty-seventh annual meeting in Chicago in March of 1946 passed the following resolution:

"Whereas in recent years the United States Army engineers have adopted a policy of placing upon the States the financial burden of relocating highways and structures in connection with their conservancy and waterway projects, and since such expenditures by the States are actually subsidies to Federal flood control and foreign to highway purposes: Now be it

"Resolved, That this conference protests this policy and respectfully requests the Congress to correct the inequity of this practice: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Highway Commission of the State of Oklahoma, That the aforesaid resolution is hereby approved and adopted; and, be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be furnished to the United States Army Engineers' Office and to all members of Oklahoma's congressional delegation."

Roosevelt's Grandpappy's Old Mill Put United States Into Rum Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York World-Telegram of July 27, 1946:

ROOSEVELT'S GRANDPAPPY'S OLD MILL PUT UNITED STATES INTO THE RUM BUSINESS—FAMILY HEIRLOOM HELPED TO SOLVE DEPRESSION PROBLEM—IDLE SUGAR REFINERY IN VIRGIN ISLANDS MADE PWA PROJECT

WASHINGTON, July 27.—The best story about Under Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman concerns rum. Mr. Chapman isn't much of a drinking man, but he's responsible for putting the Government into the manufacture of Government House rum. It happened like this:

Back in the early days of the New Deal, Mr. Chapman was Assistant Secretary of the Interior. He had been given his choice of a number of jobs in Government. He picked Interior because it had a lot of minority-group problems in which he had always been interested—Indians, Puerto Riquenos, Chamorros, Filipinos, Virgin Islanders.

IDLE REFINERY

Among the ragtag and bobtail problems of the Virgin Islands, there was an old sugar refinery that wasn't working. This was in the depths of the depression, and the administration was frantic trying to find work for people.

Mr. Chapman also served on the board which passed on Public Works Administration projects. PWA was under Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes.

At every meeting of the PWA projects board, Mr. Chapman would bring up the problem of the Virgin Islands abandoned refinery. He wanted to modernize it so it could be made productive and provide jobs for the near-destitute Virgin Islanders. Nobody else cared.

One day Mr. Chapman was invited to a luncheon at Washington's Mayflower Hotel. As he went there from a PWA projects board meeting, he carried the sugar-mill file with him. Coming out of the dining room he fell in step beside Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who was also at the luncheon.

"What's that you're carrying?" Mrs. Roosevelt wanted to know.

Mr. Chapman explained it was just some old PWA papers about a project nobody was interested in. Mrs. Roosevelt was immediately interested. By the time they reached the sidewalk Mr. Chapman had a customer and an invitation to dinner at the White House.

After dinner, Mr. Chapman brought out his file. He showed a photo of the old mill and started to talk.

"That looks like three-layer brick," interrupted the President. Mr. Chapman didn't know whether it was or not. "Do you know who built that mill?" asked the President. Mr. Chapman hadn't the slightest idea. He went on explaining his project, but he didn't think the President, running through the photos, was half listening.

Finally the President said, "Oscar, my grandfather built that old refinery! But look! You can't get anywhere making sugar for today's market. What you've got to do is make rum. Put a distillery beside that old sugar mill and convert the sugar into rum. Then sell the rum."

Mr. Chapman was floored. "How much do you think it would cost to put up a distillery there?" the President asked. Mr. Chapman hadn't the faintest notion, but he made a wild guess of $100,000.

"Better make it $300,000," said the President. "Put in a request for that and I think it will go through."

FOR IT NOW

Next morning at 9 a phone rang on the desk of Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes. Mr. Ickes was wanted at the White House. Shortly after 10 a. m. there was a meeting of the PWA projects board. What projects were there before the board this morning, Mr. Ickes wanted to know eagerly.

Mr. Chapman spoke up. He had a project to build a distillery next to the old sugar refinery in the Virgin Islands. He wanted to make rum. It would cost about $300,000. And soon.

Mr. Ickes cleared his throat and said, brightly, "I think I'm for that this morning."

That's how the Government got into the rum business.

Problems Confronting the Paris Peace Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, this morning's issues of the Philadelphia Record and of other newspapers carry an interesting column by Drew Pearson, who is now on his way to the Paris Peace Conference. One of the matters which he cites, and which I very well remember, of course, is my effort, since long before Pearl Harbor, to obtain cooperation and information between the two policy-making partners in United States foreign policy—the Senate and the State Department. As yet, this objective has not been completely attained, but I shall certainly continue my efforts along that line.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Pearson's column be reproduced in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of July 29, 1946]

WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND—SPECTER OF ANOTHER WAR HOVERS OVER PARIS PARLEY

(By Drew Pearson)

EN ROUTE TO PARIS, July 28.—Tomorrow in the Palace of Luxemburg begins the conference on which so many mothers set their hearts, for which so many mothers' sons gave their lives—the conference to win the peace.

Some 13,000,000 men in the American armed forces alone fought four long years—with the hope that it might be the last time human beings would have to go through the terrible ordeal of war.

Tomorrow in Paris comes the climax of their dreams, and already disillusionment has begun to set in. Already the dreams are tinged with nightmare—the specter of another war.

DELAY BREEDS DISSENSION

Here are some of the distressing facts this conference has to face in trying to chart the peace of the world:

1. Historians criticised Woodrow Wilson because he was slow in negotiating peace. But he got started 2 months after the armistice and finished 6 months later, a total of 8 months after the war. In contrast, it is now almost 1 year after the armistice with Japan and 15 months after the armistice with Germany, yet the final peace conference is only getting started.

2. The longer peace is delayed, the more the Allies fall out; the more the other nations forget their gratitude. So the longer the delay, the harder it is to negotiate a permanent peace.

3. Russia has deliberately endeavored to postpone the peace. This conference could have been held long ago if the Soviet had not said No.

Moscow's delay tactics were by no means accidental. They were carefully planned, and with three motives behind them:

A. The longer peace was delayed the more time Russia got to nail down its hold on the Balkan satellites—Hungary, Austria. Anti-Russian factions had to be stamped out; pro-Russian factions trained to carry on. That could not be done overnight.

B. The more uncertainty and unrest occurred in the non-Soviet-occupied countries—France, Belgium, the Netherlands—the greater the likely growth of communism. Unrest breeds communism, and the spread of communism is one great aim of Moscow.

C. Finally, Moscow did not want the Red armies converging back to Russia. There wasn't food to feed them, and their quick return risked economic, even political, turnovers. So they were left to live off foreign countries; and as long as no peace treaty was signed, armies of occupation were justified.

Thus, ever since VJ-day, Russia has been the greatest obstacle to early peace.

In this peace conference, however, not everything is black or white. There is some gray shading in between

UNITED STATES GUILTY, TOO

And in real fact, American diplomacy during the early stages of this greatest of all diplomatic endeavors, was just as guilty of sabotaging the peace as the Russians—perhaps more so. I say more so, because we pride ourselves on being more advanced, more alert, more idealistic.

Yet actually, our diplomats were just as woefully unprepared for peace as the Army and Navy were for war at Pearl Harbor. When it should have been ready for the most important peace offensive in the history of the world, the State Department was caught completely napping.

Congress has spent several months of intensive study to ascertain who was responsible for Pearl Harbor; yet no one has lifted a finger to probe the equally important disaster of our unpreparedness for peace.

If Senators probed the files of the State Department, however, or even their own files, significant facts would come to light. Senator WILEY (Wisconsin), for instance, has in his files a letter from then Secretary of State Hull, dated October 21, 1942, declining to give his views on world cooperation. The real fact was that Hull had not even begun to think about the vital task of winning the main objective of the war—world peace—and he could not answer WILEY's letter.

State Department files will also reveal interesting insight into the most important factor before the present Paris conference—the presence of little nations.

Their attendance is one of the most important victories achieved by Jimmie Byrnes. He had to use all his persuasive charm plus threats to pin down Russia's Molotov on a full-fledged peace conference with the little nations present.

HULL DROPS F. D. R. PLAN

Yet back in 1943, State Department files will show that Roosevelt and Churchill had O. K.'d a comprehensive plan for world peace worked out by the then Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles calling for the participation of smaller nations. They have most to lose by war, most to win by peace, argued Welles, and usually are to be found backing the United States.

F. D. R. and Churchill backed Welles up but later, when Cordell Hull took his famous trip to Moscow, the Welles plan was drastically amended. The little nations were dropped. Perhaps this was because of Hull's antipathy for anything authored by Sumner Welles. Perhaps it was Russian aversion—even then—to the smaller nations.

But at that time, we had the diplomatic whip hand over Russia as we never have had since. Russia needed us more than we needed her. We were in a position to bargain. Mr. Hull, however, surrendered this important point.

Later, the White House issued a public statement aimed at bringing the smaller nations back into the picture. But it was too late. Not until today, as all the Allies sit down at the conference table, have we been able to retrieve the ground lost by that vital mistake.

Knowing he could not bar the smaller nations indefinitely, Molotov has demanded that all essential problems be ironed out by the Big Four in advance. The big question at Paris, therefore, is whether the small nations will now merely sign on the dotted line, or whether fighters like Australian Minister Evatt will stand up and throw parts of the proposed treaty back in Molotov's teeth. The betting is that a lot of words will be thrown but no teeth knocked out.

Cars for Amputees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the motive behind providing cars for amputees is not sympathy. While that is a good motive, still it is from a practical standpoint that cars for amputees are being advocated.

The very best artificial limb is poor in comparison to the natural limb. There is no substitute for that. While the best type of limb might provide a fair degree of mobility, it will not answer all purposes. A man with such a device cannot accommodate himself to a crowd, walking in a strong wind is hazardous for him and walking is extra dangerous and difficult on rough terrain and on slippery sidewalks. Today when one is required to travel some distances to work, it is nigh impossible for a man who uses an artifical limb to negotiate any distance except under great hazards. So cars for amputees are practical in order to assure greater mobility and to aid in approaching the mobility of natural limbs. It is no bonus or gift—it is merely an adjunct to an artifical device.

OPA Worse Than Before

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, there are many who believe that the present OPA law is much worse for industry and the people than the bill which the President vetoed just before OPA expired last month. Certainly it is true that it leaves our country and our citizens more in doubt as to what may or may not happen. There is nothing upon which producers and operators in business can depend. The present law throws the door wide open to reprisals and unjust discriminations on the part of the bureaus. It is truly a face-saving measure. The people had a little over 3 weeks of freedom from bureaucratic domination, and prices were rapidly leveling down to normal and production gave every promise of taking care of the needs of our people. But bureaucracy demanded another strangle hold upon our citizens.

I quote the following editorial from the Tulsa (Okla.) Daily World of July 26, 1946:

WORSE THAN BEFORE

There is a general conviction that the OPA compromise bill finally dragged through both Houses of Congress and sent to the President means retrogression rather than improvement. It is commonly regarded as a face-saving gesture. The administration did not dare let controls go off entirely and there was tremendous pressure from all sides. The bill now set up is certainly no better and it may be worse than the one the President vetoed. By that veto he practically threw the whole situation open. There was nothing in the second bill to please him any better than the first.

The actual harm in the new bill is not so much that it reimposes a limited number of controls but that it seeks to end a promising experiment with the old law of supply and demand. The confusion which came from the lapse of OPA on June 30 was beginning to fade and there was some leveling off of prices. A great deal of food came out of hiding and got on the market. It was expected that, with the exception of rents, there would be no necessity for further controls but a lot of people wanted controls and the noisier elements in politics won most of their points.

There comes strongly to the fore the fact that the people are resentful; they do not like controls. They got a little taste of nonregimentation when OPA lapsed. Despite the disagreeable capitalization of the lapse by some predators, the public liked the change. The new bill is, therefore, unpopular; it not only means renewed controls but a certain bafflement; the people had sampled the old brand of liberty and liked it.

The administration rather had its way with Congress, but what about the people? Would prices have risen without the controls, or does the reimposition of controls mean scarcity rather than saving? Fundamentally, the conflict is between regimentation and free markets. That concept is complicated by many factors. But, upon the whole, the country appears to have slipped backward in the adoption of an obvious compromise, a patent face saver.

International Freedom of the Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am glad, under leave to extend, to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the views of an outstanding newspaper man, Mr. Frank E. Gannett, of Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Gannett has been doing a most timely and effective service for our republic in this time of domestic confusion and international chaos. The words of wisdom of Mr. Gannett should not fall upon deaf ears in this hour of peril. We have a republic to save and it is such men as Frank E. Gannett who is crusading for the preservation of the fundamental principles of personal liberty, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, free enterprise, and free education whose advice should be heeded. I am glad to make his address a matter of public record:

I have been asked to speak on international freedom of the press. I want to say emphatically that in my opinion whether we shall have another war or shall have peace, largely depends on whether or not we are to have freedom of the press throughout the world. What then could be more important than that we discuss the situation that confronts us? Let us learn a lesson from the experience of the world.

Only a few weeks ago I returned from an intensive study of conditions in Germany, Austria, and Italy. I also visited Paris and London. This tour made a profound impression on me. I wish everyone in America could see what I saw and could hear what I heard in the countries once ruled by dictators.

Few here have any idea of the devastation that war brought to the defeated countries. Ruins are everywhere. Only three German cities for example, escaped some large degree of destruction. Some of the most heavily bombed cities were 95-percent destroyed. It will take years to clear the rubble in the center of Berlin. Where once was a great, teeming city, there remains for many square miles hardly a sign of life. So it is with large sections of other cities I visited.

Germany before the war was a nation of 60,000,000 people, nearly half the population of the United States. In peacetimes, it was a prosperous country and the people enjoyed life. Today there is only dire want, barely enough food to ward off starvation, just enough to dispel disease, misery, and despair.

In Germany the visitor sees only older people and the very young. The middle-aged class has been wiped out. Eight millions of younger Germans died on battlefields or are in prison camps. Wherever I went I was constantly reminded of the terrific punishment and great loss of life and property that Hitler had inflicted on his people.

You wonder how that man, a corporal in the First World War, and a man of very moderate ability, could do so much to bring about such horrible consequences as Germany has suffered. The answer is that he did it all with propaganda. He built the greatest machine ever devised for deceiving and misleading an entire nation.

I was in Germany a short time before this World War broke out. I saw this amazing organization at work. The first thing Hitler did when he rose to power was to seize the radio stations, then all the newspapers. He later took complete charge of the movies and through his Gestapo he saw to it that information of any sort from the outside world, harmful to his schemes, was kept from the public. Censors scanned all letters and all newspapers entering Germany and when anything contrary to the Nazi program appeared, the letters were destroyed and the papers seized. A death penalty was imposed on any one who tuned his radio in to a broadcast from outside Germany.

In the meantime, a vigorous program was set in motion to mold the minds of all under Nazi domination. Textbooks were rewritten. Beginning with the kindergarten, the children were taught that only through nazism could the people prosper, insure employment, supply their needs and reach a high standard of living.

When we in our kindergarten books might say "One apple plus one apple equals two apples," the Hitler book that I saw, read, "One Nazi plus one Nazi equals two Nazis." I saw one of the prewar propaganda films. It was cleverly prepared and did much to make those who saw it believe that Hitler was to be the savior of the world.

Every newspaper published in Germany was under government control. They directly or indirectly, subtly and cleverly led the readers to believe in the totalitarian state and in the theory that an all-powerful government should control every phase of their lives.

In the meantime too, intense hatreds were built up on falsehood and deception. The German people were made to believe that Britain, France, and Russia were determined to destroy them and that they must prepare to fight for their very existence. The Nazis carefully concealed the real ambition of Hitler and his gangsters to rule the world by conquest through military might.

This method of influencing the mind of the German people was carried out with amazing perfection and care. The world has never seen anything quite like the job that was so thoroughly done. As a result, when the hour arrived for Hitler to strike, he had behind him a powerful, deeply prejudiced, almost fanatical united nation, fully prepared and equipped for conquest of all those he intended to dominate.

I am sure that if, when Hitler first came to power, there had been retained in Germany a free press, freedom of speech, and freedom peaceably to assemble, this tyrant never could have carried out his dastardly plans. Had the German people known the truth, Germany would have been spared the fate that befell her, and the rest of the world, against which he waged his war of aggression, would not have suffered the loss of many millions of lives and untold billions of dollars' worth of property. That war, the most costly in all history, has been ended, but no one won the war. Everyone who participates in a war loses.

Of course much the same conditions prevailing in Germany prevailed in Japan. There, too, the people were misled and deceived by propaganda. The Jap plotters followed precisely the German technique and did an astounding job in influencing the minds of the public. The Japanese people were told that the white race was a menace to them and to the whole world and that white people must be driven from the Orient or they themselves would be exterminated. The Japs, too, were convinced that they were fighting for existence and that they had to win their war of aggression or suffer starvation and death.

In Japan also there was no freedom of the press or freedom of speech and these hapless people were as grossly ignorant as anyone could be about the facts involved. What happened to Japan was as tragic as what happened to Germany.

Again I say that had there been freedom of the press in Japan and the Japanese people had understood that we were not intending to attack them, there would have been no war with Japan.

Let me make it clear that freedom of the press is not a special right for the benefit of anyone who may acquire a printing press and issue from it some form of the printed word. Printers and publishers must comply with libel laws and not injure anyone unjustly. Freedom of the press means, of course, that anyone in any sort of a publication can present the facts and express his opinions. But more important, freedom of the press means "the right of the people to know," the right to have the facts and the truth without Government hindrance or restriction of any kind. Nothing could be more pertinent than the old advice, "Ye shall know the truth and it shall make you free." When the people have the "right to know" and are able to know because of a free press, then they cannot be deceived and misled as were the Germans, the Italians, and the Japanese.

Suppression of freedom of the press in this country began in the days of the First World War under the guise of war emergency. To a great extent this was achieved through cooperation on the part of newspapers, but the powers in Washington then learned what could be done in suppressing or coloring the news. Control of news through Government departments became control of publicity, and eventually control of propaganda.

It is true that wartime fetters were removed quickly but the public was not soon to forgt the evils of propaganda. The very word became a synonym for lying invention. So deep was the revulsion that even in this last war the propagandists did not dare resort to the horror stories which were used in the First World War.

Before the peace was signed at Versailles an attempt was made to win a declaration for world-wide freedom of the press. Kent Cooper, general manager of the Associated Press, went before the conference to urge that such a provision be written into the treaty. The world was not ready for the move any more than it is today when it is being urged with even more vigor and by many more voices.

Mr. Cooper has pleaded that barriers against news be torn down everywhere, that correspondents from all nations be free to roam and to report the truth as they see it. In this he has had an ally in President Hugh Baillie of the United Press, another great world-wide news agency.

They have been joined by the American Society of Newspaper Editors, an organization comprising leading newspaper men from all over this country. The society will urge that the forthcoming peace conference adopt a provision for tearing down news barriers wherever they have been raised. It has sent a committee around the world to talk with editors of other countries, to explain to them the need of a free flow of information, to urge their support before the conference.

Why do these men devote themselves to such a project? They seek a free flow of information because they know the great benefit it would work for all the world.

They have seen the system in operation in our country through the years. They realize that it is the unknown, the mysterious, that is feared. Turn on the light and fear, suspicion and hatred will vanish.

True our freedom is abused sometimes. Facts have been twisted and there have been misrepresentations. But never has all the press of the country been guilty of such breaches of faith.

Always the truth comes out. Always the people are informed and in the end they act. The people can be trusted to make the final decision in any situation. They can act because they are informed by a press that struggles always toward the truth. They are not misled forever by some charlatan who can direct the newspapers.

American editors are acting from patriotic motives when they urge world freedom of the press. Their aim can be realized only if our American delegates, with the aid of Great Britain, take a firm stand. We must insist that we have international freedom of the press so that we may know what is going on in other countries, so that other countries may have truthful and complete reports of what happens here.

When that is achieved the clouds of distrust and suspicion will roll away. The self-seeking, misguided zealots and demagogs will be unable to poison the minds of one people against another.

Today more than ever before we need international freedom of the press. The right to know must be given to the world if we are to avoid another war.

I have just referred to my experience in the occupied countries of Europe. Next to the critical food situation, the topics everywhere over there are war and Russia. Exactly what Hitler did in Germany with the German people is now being repeated in Russia behind the iron curtain. The Russian people hear only what the Soviet Government wants them to hear and everything that conflicts with the plans and purposes of the Government is suppressed.

Today it is very difficult to get much information out of Russia. Some American newspapers have staff correspondents in Moscow, but they must be careful not to offend the Russian Government. It takes some 6 months or so of red tape and investigation to get permission to send a staff man into Russia and the restrictions that prevail make any correspondent's report unsatisfactory and of little real value. Their dispatches do not reveal the inside thinking of the small group who control the Soviet Government. We have little light on their plans for the future.

Here is another example: American magazines contain attractive pictures of model kitchens, automobiles, beautiful homes, washing machines, and other wonderful devices and conveniences that we here in America enjoy but which are unknown to most of the people in the rest of the world. The Soviet Government has been telling the Russians that their standard of living is improving and that they have much for which to be thankful. For this reason they do not permit our magazines to be circulated in Russia. They don't want the Russian people to know how much better conditions are here in America and how much higher is our standard of living.

During the war many of our soldiers came in contact with Russian soldiers. They got along very well with each other until some officer intervened. There are many traits in the Russian individual that make him likable. Russian soldiers learned from our men much about America that they had not known before. They were amazed by all that they heard about our great country. These men returning home have given the Soviet Government considerable concern by their disclosures of what they found out.

One reliable report has it that the Soviet Government is so disturbed by this infiltration of ideas about America that it is taking steps to prevent the spread of discontent that might ultimately lead to a revolution. It is said that the Russian troops now under arms are constantly moved about to lessen the chance for development of a revolt.

Of course the Russian press is controlled as carefully as was the Nazi press and there is no light in the newspapers on any international question. On all subjects the public is given only the view that Stalin's government wants them to accept.

Russian officials do not understand freedom of the press as we know it in this country. They believe it is a right that belongs only to government and that it would be utterly wrong to allow any newspaper to print anything the government had not sanctioned.

In Russia there are at present only about 50,000 radios and probably most of them will not pick up international programs. Therefore, we can't reach the Russian people by radio from outside.

The Russian movies I saw in Moscow in 1934 were as vicious propaganda as could be devised. Today, the movies are being used to win the strongest possible support for the government.

Recently it was reported that the newest Russian film produced by the Government aims to make the people believe that Russians alone defeated Japan. Other war films extol the military might of the Russians and claim the lion's share of the credit for defeating the Germans.

How can the Soviets forget what we did for them during during the war? By last July we had shipped to our Communist ally about 10,000 fighter planes, 4,000 bombers, 400,000 trucks, 7,500 tanks. All of this matériel the Soviets still have and control. We also gave to Russia $2,500,000,000 worth of machinery and food products valued at more than $1,500,000,000

In addition, the Navy turned over to Russia a large number of warships, and trained crews to operate them. The American people privately raised more than $60,000,000 through Russian War Relief and the American Red Cross installed equipment for a dozen model hospitals in the devastated areas.

Don't think for a minute, however, that these facts have been given to the Russian people. They are, instead, entirely ignorant of them.

That we are entirely out of touch with Russia is shown by the fact that today there are only 260 American officials and nonofficials in that great country which spreads across more than an eighth of the habitable surface of the globe. By way of contrast, more than 2,000 Russians carry official Soviet passports in the United States.

The Russian reserve and suspicion of us is astounding. No Russian dares to visit the American Embassy in Moscow unless he is fully authorized to do so by the Soviet authorities. Furthermore, no Soviet citizens dare call on any American who may be in Russia unless such a visit is officially approved.

From our viewpoint surely there is no reason why the doors of Russia shouldn't swing open to us. We ourselves have nothing to hide, nothing that can't be explained. We welcome visits by Russians and they go about in this country as they please. We wish more would come. We simply can't understand why the reverse is not true and why the Russians are unwilling to have us know about conditions behind the iron curtain.

How can this attitude of Russia be explained? The answer is in the erroneous theory of Soviet leaders that all wars are due to the capitalistic system. They contend that the only way to eliminate war is to have the whole world under the communistic form of government. Then there would be no one else to fight.

This means, of course, as has been charged by leaders like Winston Churchill and many others, that Russia aims at world domination. Every move made by the Soviets since the war confirms this belief. Already with the consent of Britain and the United States they have taken over countries that adjoin Russia on the west, such as Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania on the Baltic, a large part of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Rumania. They say they need to dominate these countries to insure security—a ridiculous idea—for none of these countries, nor anyone else in Europe, is in position to attack great and powerful Russia.

Communism for America is unthinkable. If Russia ever tries to impose communism upon us, we will of course resist to the last ditch. Communism would mean the surrender of all of our freedoms and liberties. It means domination by the state, control of our lives and the elimination of all individual rights. It would mean the end of our free-enterprise system, private ownership of farms and homes. It would mean that we would be as helpless as the kulak in Russia.

Of course, we are never going to accept a substitute for our form of government and our way of life. Under our Constitution this country in 150 years has made more progress than was made in all the countless preceding centuries. We have reached here the highest standard of living ever known on this planet, a standard of living that cannot even be approached by any country in Europe. We know that here in America efforts are being made to undermine our system of government, but I have confidence that an aroused America will never willingly accept any foreign "ism" as a substitute for what we have here in the United States.

Russia is planning first to obtain control of all Europe, and this is entirely possible. The British Isles, under its system of national socialization, would be the next goal, and then the big target would be America. I hope that all this will not happen, and yet we must be awake and realize that it all can happen. It is because it is a possibility that they are talking so much in Europe about the next war.

Of course, Americans don't want war with Russia or with any other country, and we will do our utmost to prevent another war, but how can there be any understanding between Russia and America when the Russian people are so deceived by their Government, as they are today?

In the past few months there have been many quotations from the official newspapers of Russia that certainly misrepresent the facts in the international situation and endanger peace between the two countries. When it is realized that every one of these utterances is inspired by the Government, there is good reason indeed for grave concern about the possibility of maintaining peace between the two countries.

American editors, realizing how important it is for the people of the United States and other parts of the world to understand each other, have appealed to the United Nations Organization and expressed the hope that this Organization would take steps that would give us international freedom of the press. So far, however, nothing in this direction has been accomplished and nothing will be accomplished until America, with the aid of Great Britain, takes a determined stand.

We must insist that we have international freedom of the press so that we may know what is going on in other countries and that other countries may know what is going on here, understand what both are thinking and what both are planning.

In Japan one of the first steps taken by General MacArthur was to establish again the principle of freedom of the press and as a result, the vanquished Japanese are already benefiting. They may not know as yet how much this means to them, but time will tell them that out of the war they suffered, they have gained at least one great blessing. Would that all the rest of the world also had what General MacArthur has given to Japan.

Here is an outline of what the United Nations should do:

1. Require that the vanquished nations guarantee their peoples a free press as we know it in the United States.

2. Require that any nation which requests help in reestablishing itself economically will guarantee its people a free press as we know it.

3. Leave to the press itself the missionary work to bring the same result in all other countries.

4. Announce the determination of the United States to foster and bring about news transmission facilities with a nominal rate which will guarantee the free flow of news between all the capitals of the world.

Such a program, of course, would improve our international relations. Merely a declaration that we shall have international freedom of the press is not sufficient. Ways must be found to establish it beyond any doubt so that the black-out and darkness fostered by Hitler, Mussolini, and Hirohito may not again prevail in this world.

I fervently pray that some way may be found to get the Soviets to change their attitude on this great question. Unless they do change it, war with the western world and with us seems certain.

My own faith prevents me from admitting that war is inevitable. It simply must not be, for the next war will be so devastating that practically all involved will be destroyed.

A few days ago I visited a laboratory where some of the weapons of the future are being developed. The speed and power of new projectiles are unbelievable. An American general, thoroughly familiar with what is going on, recently said that already the weapons used in World War II are obsolete. At any rate, we now have powerful bombs that fly faster than sound and search out their targets. We shall have pilotless airplanes loaded with explosives that will travel faster than sound and cover long distances. There are still more terrible weapons not yet disclosed that are fantastic in their killing efficiency.

And of course there is the atomic bomb which will be tremendously increased in its power of destruction. With the new high-speed airplanes it will be possible to deliver an atomic bomb in a few hours to almost any part of the world.

When you face these alarming facts, you must shudder over the possibilities of destruction. So far, it seems impossible to get protection from the fatal blows that will be dealt to civilization.

Realizing that this lethal warfare is the alternative of peace, we must redouble our efforts to prevent a conflict between nations.

One of the first requisites in warfare is the generation of hate between the peoples involved. Some one has truly said that you can't hate anyone whom you really know. The best protection against war is an understanding between the nations of the world, frankness and fairness in their dealings with each other.

I know of no better way to bring this about than to remove all barriers that make is difficult or impossible to gain knowledge of each other, to get acquainted and become friends.

The United Nations has no more important task than to provide international freedom of the press for all the world. If it fails to do this, hope for a peaceful future disappears and civilization will face utter destruction.

Home To Roost

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Sunday Star, Wilmington, Del., July 28, 1946:

HOME TO ROOST

No valid defense can be advanced for the horrible bombing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, in which well above a hundred lives were snuffed out—and the world is prepared to listen to none. It was a pure act of terror in which innocent as well as perhaps partly guilty were sacrificed.

But in the allocation of blame, while truly the instigators and participants in the plot must bear the major and direct guilt, the linen of those who were indirectly the cause is vastly spotted with blood as well.

There is a trite enough saying—"as certain as that the day follows the night"—which is applicable, just as is the more homely declaration that "Chickens come home to roost." If a certain course is pursued inexorably, and as a result, tragedy follows, then those who insist on that course must, unless they can fully justify that course, be indirectly blamable.

The problem of the Jewish homeland in Palestine has been booted about from pillar to post long enough, and if there is not good will and sound integrity of purpose sufficient to make it a realty, the mask should be cast aside and the farce ended.

We note behind that mask in Britain, which promised the homeland, which holds the mandate, which is pitting British troops against the Palestine Jews, which excuses its refusal to permit the much-harried Jewish refugees to enter Palestine by its bending over backward to mollify the Arabs. We have indeed learned from a trusty source that if a Jewish son should be found guilty of admitting his own mother, a refugee, to his Palestine home, he may be imprisoned for 8 years, at the least.

Our own estimate of the situation is that whether the Jewish underground blows up King David hotels or not, or whether the Palestine Jews are meek or warlike, the British do not intend willingly to admit any Jewish refugees, and have been playing a tricky hand all the way through, something like "Heads I win, tails you lose."

This may sound like snap judgment, but we have watched Britain in the past. They are so accustomed in that tight little isle to muddling through that they think they can muddle through the Jewish problem as well. Ireland, for example, had to blow up buildings, wreck trains, and stage revolutions to gain separation at last from Britain (although in that case England held a passble title); India for a generation fought passively against British control, with always those handy excuses that Britain must keep the Mussulman from fighting the Hindu, just as in Palestine the specter of Jew fighting Arab is raised to keep refugee Jews out.

In the case of Palestine, Britain holds merely a mandate, and yet pushes ahead with her own brand of self-righteous, puritanical, and pharasaical balancings of the ends gainst the middle or vice versa, with no thought of genuine equity, justice, or bowels of compassion.

Britain's policy in Palestine invites, nay insures, violence, combat, and the meeting of terror with terror, just as "the night follows the day." Her skirts are not clean.

Justice to Armenia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, it is significant that that ardent champion of Armenian rights, the indefatigable Arshak Ted Ashjian, long an outstanding citizen of Fresno, Calif., should have chosen our Fourth of July to pen a ringing appeal for justice for the Armenian people, a public pronouncement which, I verily believe, will take its place as an historic contribution to the literature of the day.

As founder and first President of the Armenian-American Citizens Club, an American patriotic group with units scattered throughout the length and breadth of our land, Mr. Ashjian frequently raises his earnest voice to plead the cause of the long-suffering people of old Armenia, scattered as so many of them are by unrelenting Turkish fury to the four corners of the earth, but none of his public expressions could be more warmly received than this one which he composed under the inspiration of our American Independence Day.

By fortuitous circumstance, the text of this document, written by this stanch defender of human rights for release on the Fourth of July, has reached my hands, to impress me so much, Mr. Speaker, that I am constrained to ask for permission to spread it upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my instant remarks.

The text of the document to which I have just referred, Mr. Speaker, is the following:

JUSTICE TO ARMENIA

We are celebrating July the Fourth, because this is the day on which our glorious country declared its independence. We, Americans of Armenian origin, deeply appreciate the significance of independence. We could not enjoy it while we were living under Turkish tyranny, we could not even mention its name.

The Armenians, by their Christianity and by their genius, have been the representatives of Western civilization in Turkey. While the Turks furnish the criminals, the Armenians furnish savants, physicians, artisans, and merchants. The Armenia traders in Turkey were so successful that the Financial News, Manchester, England, wrote years ago: "The commerce of the future belongs to the Scotch, the Germans, and the Armenians."

It was through the collaboration of two great Armenian Statesmen, Odian and Servicen, that Midhat Pasha succeeded in framing the Turkish Constitution, which was proclaimed by Abdul Hamid on his accession to the throne, and then prorogued.

The first newspaper ever published in Turkey, eighty-seven years ago, was an Armenian periodical. The introduction of Turkish printing and the establishment of theatres were accomplished by Armenians—Muhandisian and Chouhadjian. Were it not for the Armenian philogoists, like Gurdikians, the Turks would not even have had a grammar of their own language.

Dr. V. Rosents, a great authority on Near Eastern affairs says in Tagliche Rundschau:

The Armenians, industrious, sober, and zealous, occupied principally with agriculture, with raising cattle, and with manufacturing carpet—can be considered the possessors of the highest civilization in Asia Minor. Thanks to their aptitude and their intelligence, the Armenians occupy the highest positions in Turkey.

The whole population of the Turkish Empire was estimated at 32,000,000, of whom only 2,380,000 were Armenians. Yet the Armenians had 785 educational institutions with more than 82,000 students, whereas the Turks could not boast of more than 150 schools, with only 17,000 pupils. In order to demonstrate the economic power of the Armenians in the Turkish Empire, Marcel Leart records the fact that of 166 importers in Sivas, which has the smallest Armenian population of the 6 Armenian provinces, 141 are Armenians, 13 Turks, and 12 Greeks; of 150 exporters, 127 are Armenians and 23 Turks; of 37 bankers and capitalists, 32 are Armenians and only 5 Turks; of 9,800 shopkeepers and artisans, 6,800 are Armenians and only 2,550 Turks, the rest being divided among various other nationalities. The same is true of native industry, of 153 factories and flour mills, 130 belong to Armenians, 20 to Turks, and 3, carpet concerns, to foreign or mixed companies. The directors of all these establishments are Armenians exclusively. The number of employees is about 17,000, of whom 14,000 are Armenians, 2,800 Turks, 200 Greeks, and others.

The Turks, being another version of Krioff's snake that bites the glowworm because it is shining, massacre the Armenians. "It is absurd," confided the mayor of Smyrna to an English traveler, "that we can govern the Armenians—a people so much abler than we."

Because the Armenians are very brave, the Turkish authorities do not permit them the possession of arms. Dr. J. Lepsius writes in his book, entitled "Armenian and Europe," that "Christians indeed, and Christians alone, are by statute forbidden to carry arms." As an example of Armenian valor, Viscount Bryce mentions the heroic resistance of the Zeitunlis, who proudly called themselves the British of Asia Minor—unsubdued and unsubduable," writes:

"These Zeitunlis had only seven or eight thousand fighting men, but the strength of their position enabled them to repel all attacks; and, like the Montenegrins, to develop a thoroughly militant type of manhood. They are a rude, stern people, with no wealth and little education, and practicing no art except that of iron-working—for there is plenty of iron in the mountains that wall them in. From 1800 till now they had forty times been in conflict with the Turks; in 1836 they successfully resisted the Egyptian invaders; and in 1859 and 1862 they repulsed vastly superior Turkish armies. In 1864, by European intervention, a sort of peace was arranged, and in 1878 a fort was erected, and the people were obliged to admit a Turkish garrison, which in 1895 was 600 strong. The Zeitunlis had laid in a stock of grain in anticipation of a general attack by Turks upon Christians, and had for some little while noticed that arms were being distributed by the Turkish officials among the Moslems. When the massacres began in northern Syria in November 1895 they perceived that they would be the next victims, rose suddenly, and besieged the garrison. After 3 days the Turks, whose water supply had been cut off, surrendered. The Armenians, disarming them and arming themselves with rifles which they found in the arsenal, had also weapons enough to supply some of the neighboring villages, and were able to take the field against the Turkish army which was advancing against them and which is said to have been at times 6,000 strong. They repulsed the Turks, with great loss, in a series of hard-fought fights and kept them at bay till February 1896. Through the mediation of the British Ambassador at Constantinople, terms of peace were arranged in pursuance of which the siege was raised and no fresh garrison placed in the town. The most perilous moment had been one when, the fighting men being all absent, the imprisoned Turkish soldiers had risen and sought to set fire to the town. The women, however, proved equal to the occasion. They fell upon Turks and saved the town."

When, just prior to the deportations of 1915, Zeitun prepared to resist, the Ottoman authorities intimated to them, through the Armenian Catholics of Cilicia, that, if they resisted, reprisals would be made upon their defenseless kinsmen in the plain. The elders of Zeitun, like the Armenian leaders throughout the Empire, were determined to go almost any lengths in order to keep the peace. So the majority surrendered, and they were deported. Fifteen hundred fighting men are reported to have withdrawn to the loftier recesses of the mountains.

During the World War the Armenians, fighting either as regulars in the Russian Army or as volunteers in the ranks of the Grand Alliance, displayed remarkable courage and heroism. At a meeting of the Indian section of the Royal Society of Arts, the Right Honorable Viscount Bryce, lauding the martial qualities of the Armenians, declared that the Armenian warriors had shown the utmost courage and valor in the combats before Verdun.

Francis Rogers, writing from a French port to the New York Times, described the Armenian volunteers from America as "a band of crusaders," who "marched resolutely away, a French flag at the head of the column, flanked by the Armenian and American colors. Then he asked admiringly: "Can even this war offer a more inspiring example of patriotism and self-sacrifice?"

At the conclusion of the First World War the allies and the associated powers pledged the Armenians, by the treaty of the Sevres, liberation and a life of peace and progress.

However, that pledge was broken and the Armenians were once more either slaughtered by the Turks or driven to foreign countries. Fortunately, the Armenians in Russia established an Armenian Republic, which has made great strides in its cultural and industrial development. Millions of Armenians in diaspora are eager to join with their brethren, but the Armenian Republic is not large enough to rehabilitate them.

Perhaps you all recollect how President Woodrow Wilson, at the request of the Allied Supreme Council, delineated the boundaries that were allotted to Armenia by Wilsonian delineation, ought to be annexed to the Armenian Republic in order to provide a home for the Armenian refugees.

On this glorious Independence Day of our adopted fatherland, let us appeal to our leaders in Government, religious, and social circles to lend their support to the realization of Armenia's just demands.

As the Honorable James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany, declared in 1920, "Only by the union of Wilson Armenia, which is but 40 percent of Turkish Armenia, with the Armenian Republic (aggregate area 66,000 square miles) can we obtain adequate room for the 3,000,000 Armenians, over three-fourths of whom are farmers, and establish a viable Armenian state."

ARSHAK TED ASHJIAN.

Make Fine Record in Norway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD KNUTSON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, it has recently come to my attention that the Americans of Norwegian extraction who went into Norway after Germany surrendered made an excellent and lasting impression upon the Norwegian people. The entire personnel of the United States naval mission to Norway were of Norwegian descent and all of them spoke the language of the country. Without exception they acquitted themselves with credit and distinction.

Capt. A. O. R. Bergesen was head of the naval mission, and he made a wonderful record. His assistant, Rudy Berghult, now a lieutenant commander and a former mayor of Duluth, did a bang-up job in creating good relations with both the civilians and the military.

Lt. Curtis Christianson, a native of Minnesota, and a brother of our former colleague, and three times governor, was the communications control officer for Norway, representing SHAEF. He was fortunate in that he found many relatives, all of whom seemed to think that their American cousin was all right.

These three officers were personally decorated by the king for their services.

Captain Bergesen had three enlisted men to help him in his duties, Henricksen, Weggeland, and Aldall. These three young sailors came from Minnesota and also spoke Norwegian. Needless to say, these fine young men by their courtesy and conduct added greatly to our prestige over there.

Another good Norwegian-speaking Minnesotan, Maj. M. O. Benson, holder of the Legion of Merit, made a lasting impression on the Norwegians. As head of O. S. S. mission to Norway he was largely responsible for the excellent intelligence reports that came out of that country before the surrender of Germany. His able assistant was Capt. C. J. Selvig, son of former Representative Selvig from Minnesota.

The United States mission to Norway was headed by a swagger stick-carrying colonel who, through his extreme partiality for the British forces, gained the Order of the British Empire. It is to be regretted that the Army did not see fit to head the mission with a man like Captain Bergesen, who would have carried our prestige to even higher heights.

From many reports it appears that the American Red Cross in Norway was even more poorly handled than it was in England, so it was necessary for all our servicemen to provide their own recreation, and in this they were greatly helped by the Norwegian people. From all the reports received they were not let down.

Mr. Speaker, the Americans who went to Norway were ambassadors of good will and it is to be hoped that the seed of American-Norwegian comity sown by them will long continue to bear fruit in the form of closer social and trade relations.

Freedom Without OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Clarion (Pa.) Republican of July 25, 1946:

FREEDOM WITHOUT OPA

During nearly 4 weeks of living without OPA's protecting hand, the American people have suddenly discovered that it is not always essential that government be looked upon as the Great White Father. Many have suddenly awakened to the fact which made our forebearers develop the world's greatest Nation—the fact that a people with individual initiative and work can get along without too much interference from centralized government. They have begun to realize to a small extent, a fact that was becoming unrecognized in this country—the proposition that government in a democracy is solely a servant of society for society's needs, not an authoritarian source of rules and controls.

The dire predictions of Chester Bowles and Paul Porter have not been borne out. The millions of dollars in scarce propaganda that OPA has spent to make the American people believe in its necessity and to perpetuate itself as a Government bureau, have been in vain. The cost of living, OPA said would rise 50 to 100 percent in the first 20 days of its demise. Instead, prices in most instances have held steady with the exception of mark-up to replace Government subsidies. Thus production cost now comes direct from the purchaser to the producer, rather than from the purchaser to the Government to the producer, with high administration cost, as with subsidy payments.

Congress continues to be embroiled in bitter discussions on OPA legislation. The longer the fight goes on, the less chance there is for renewal of anything like full-scale price control, for the people are seeing that all retailers, manufacturers, and service people are not chiselers. There is going to be some need for rent and housing controls until such time as these become more available. People can refuse to buy an item if they believe it priced too high. They cannot, however, move out of living quarters at the present time if exorbitant rates are charged. They have no protection whatsoever against the chiselers, and it is against the very few of this type that we must have suitable control.

Americans are living under real freedom in their work and trade for the first time since early in World War II. As they get the feel of good old American individuality, they will appreciate this freedom more and more. It is very doubtful that a majority of the American people at the present time would support a full-scale reinstatement of OPA. This would seem to be a healthy sign for future American advancement and growth.

A Historic Responsibility of Armenian-Americans—An Address by Mr. Leon Surmelian

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, on May 5, 1946, the famed refugee writer, lecturer, and publicist, Mr. Leon Surmelian, recently the author of the best seller, I Ask You, Ladies and Gentlemen, delivered at Los Angeles, Calif., a long-to-be-remembered address to the members of the Junior League of the Armenian General Benevolent Union, an address of such widespread interest and world-wide importance that I am constrained to ask permission to spread it upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my instant remarks.

As he raised his eloquent voice in a most timely appeal to the outside world for simple justice for old Armenia—an appeal for the reuniting of her valiant sons and daughters in their ancient Fatherland, scattered, as so many of them now are, to the four corners of the world by the bloody sword of Turkish ruthlessness—his forthright plea is deserving of a far wider audience than the one which then crowded into the junior league's convention hall, reminiscent, as it was, of the ghastly story of repeated Turkish pogroms, a narrative of massacres incredible, massacres in which millions of the race from which he sprang were slaughtered by this compassionless foe of all of that which Christian people throughout the world hold near and dear. To extend to him the hospitality of the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD can be our contribution to a cause that is just.

The text of Mr. Surmelian's address to which I have just referred is, Mr. Speaker, the following:

From the very beginning of its existence in the 1890's the Armenian community in America has played an active and inspiring part in the welfare and progress of our people at home. I say "community" advisedly, because there were individual Armenians and small groups of them in America long before the establishment of the United States as one of the independent and sovereign powers of the world. Before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock in 1620 there were Armenians in Virginia, some of whom helped develop the tobacco and silk industries of the Virginia Colony, winning the official thanks of the Virginia Legislature and the panegyrics of at least one Virginia poet.

You will find this information in Malcom's little book on Armenians in America, a pioneer work which needs to be amplified and brought up to date. And now our friend Louis Adamic tells us in his last book, A Nation of Nations, that "a handful of Polish, German, and Armenian workers at Jamestown, Va., in 1619 staged one of the first rebellions in the New World," and to quote him further from his chapter on Americans from Poland:

"On his own since early boyhood, John Smith, according to his own report, had knocked about the Continent of Europe and knew the worth of common people. He brought a number over to America—Poles, Germans, Armenians—because, unlike many of the first English colonists in the South who were 'vagabond gentlemen' wearing silk and shunning work, these men were used to continuous hard labor. Their English, if they spoke it at all even after years in Virginia, was poor; their manners lacked polish; but by Captain Smith's account they were skilled in making pitch, tar, soapashes, and the glass beads which were used as currency in trading with the Indians.

"In his book, Smith gave the Poles and the other workingmen much credit for saving the Virginia Colony. After he left the settlement, the English people in it generally regarded them and the Germans and Armenians as inferior foreigners. For 12 years, while the settlement swayed between success and failure, the Poles, along with the Germans and Armenians, had no political rights and were barred from participation in civil affairs. They were in effect little better than serfs.

"The Polish-German-Armenian rebellion, possibly helped by the Irish who after 1609 were also being brought over, was the first consciously political upheaval in America for the purpose of extending rights to the common man. The uprising came to a fortunate conclusion. The workers' grievances were heeded by the first parliament in America, the House of Burgesses in Jamestown. According to a contemporary record, 'it was agreed that they shall be enfranchised and made as free as any inhabitant there whatsoever.'"

The history of these early Armenians in America offers a fascinating field of research to Armenian American historians and graduate and undergraduate students of history, and speaking as a writer I can say that there is also material for an excellent historical novel in this subject. For certainly those skilled Armenians in Virginia brought their Armenian Bibles and memories and dreams with them, and hand in hand with their German and Polish fellow workers, and the English majority helped lay the foundations of what we still like to call, and must call, the American dream.

The Virginia Armenians, under the pressure of those times, disappeared without being able to organize a distinct Armenian community in America. But the Armenians who followed them to the happy shores of the New World almost three centuries later were able to do this, because of their larger and continuously increasing numbers, and the higher development of the Armenian national consciousness, as well as various other factors I need not dwell upon. They built churches, published newspapers, and gave, gave, gave to the Armenian cause. The great majority of them were humble folk, earning modest wages in the shoe factories of Lowell, Mass., for instance, or escaping from the industrial slums of the East to the wide open spaces of California, where they succeeded, by their native talents, in cultivating the European vine, which is indigenous to Armenia, and after heroic ups and downs rising to a position of considerable importance in the grape, raisin, and wine industry of the State. The largest individual dairy farm in California, if not in the whole of the United States, is also owned by an Armenian-American. Love of the soil is a marked Armenian characteristic. The Armenian without his own home and a plot of ground he can call his feels lost.

And this brings me to the central theme of this paper—soil. The Armenian question, as a political-cultural issue, can be summed up in this one word "soil." We Americans of Armenian birth or descent are today under the most solemn responsibility to help our kinsmen acquire that part of the sacred Armenian soil that remains under alien rule. This is a historic moment, a historic opportunity for us. It is a challenge we can't afford to ignore, and it should test our mettle as men and women, as Americans and as Armenians, and bring out the best in us. This great task to which every one of us must dedicate himself not only as an Armenian, but I repeat, as an American and a human being, includes the cardinal Christian virtues of hope, love, and charity. Not only for our own, but ultimately for the international community of nations, the City of Man.

I need not tell you that Armenia is one of the oldest civilized countries in the world. For 2,500 years it has been the eastern citadel of western civilization. The driving force of Armenian history has been a cultural and spiritual one. Ours has been essentially a cultural patriotism. The soul of Armenia is in its books, music, architecture, handicrafts—and the history they tell is the eternal story of man as God created him in His own image, whether literally or allegorically so does not matter. The legend, the symbolism, is valid, whether one believes only in the natural, or also in the supernatural destiny of man, whether one is religious or not. And today when civilization can be wiped out with atomic bombs, all of us, no matter what our origin, are vitally interested in the preservation of human culture. Armenia has always belonged, and belongs now, on the battle front of this human culture. Armenians have always loved peace and the fruits of peace, being tillers of the soil and craftsmen, and from the international and world point of view the survival and strengthening of Armenia is important for all decent men and women, and particularly for those who share with us in the rich heritage of western civilization, both in its material and intangible aspects.

What I am trying to say is illustrated dramatically by the present picture along the Soviet-Turkish frontier. On one side are flourishing towns and cities. The population of Yerevan, the capital of Armenia, has reached the quarter million mark, where you will find the plays of Shakespeare smash hits, to use the Hollywood vernacular, over a million books in its public library, large industrial works, colleges, orchestras, scientific institutes. If you get into a car and drive out of Yerevan to the Turkish frontier only about 20 miles away, and cross over to the Turkish side, you will find yourself in a vast cemetery, where life for the poor devils still living there is devoid of all cultural activity and interests, is stagnant or retrogressive, and about a thousand years behind Yerevan.

Yet this land is Armenia, too. The boundary that divides the two Armenias is an artificial and cruel one, imposed on our people by fire and sword. Today no Armenians live on the other side. And even if we here in America were not of Armenian origin, we would wish the liberation of this territory and its reincorporation in the domain of civilization. As Americans we would wish and demand this, for the frontiers of America are no longer confined to the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans in the east and west, but extend far beyond them, and are contiguous, or should be, with the frontiers of civilization itself. Just as the frontiers of Armenia and of all other civilized countries include the main streets of America, and New York, and San Francisco, the schools, industries, and the entire tremendous structure of American civilization.

It's really one world—or none, now. But in this one world there are still fallow, uncultivated, blighted areas, such as that part of Armenia remaining under Turkish rule, which once was an integral part of the City of Man, and where flourished some of the loveliest things in civilization. The Armenian question therefore has this historic background and importance for all those who are concerned with the preservation and progress of human culture. This is the larger, philosophical over-all view of the problem, but it is important for us to bear it always in mind, and think and act accordingly.

Unfortunately this one world is still divided into hostile and armed camps. It makes no sense, there is no rhyme or reason to it, but it is so. Sooner or later, of course, the political boundaries will not divide, but unite nations, and we shall have a better, a cultural map of the world, with the principle of unity in diversity fully recognized and practiced. Mankind needs both the unity and diversity, one supporting and complementing the other. But meanwhile, we must face the realities of the day, and do all within our power to enlighten the American public opinion, and yes; also our Government in Washington, on the merits of the Armenian cause.

We love and honor this land, and we know that Americans are fair in their judgments, and share, in common with us, the ideals of western civilization. We should remind our fellow citizens, our neighbors and friends, that western civilization was born in what is commonly referred to as the Near East, and that we Armenians have been its guardians for 2,500 years. We have fought and dreamed and bled and sang and died for it. The cultural argument is important in view of the fact that ideals make a strong appeal to the American public. By tradition, America goes to war not for the acquisition of new territory, but for the triumph of democratic ideals upon which this great Nation was founded, as the first modern republic in the world, with the exception of tiny Switzerland.

But in using this idealistic language we should not whine and cry over our tragedies and sorrows, but make known our historic, racial, innate devotion to the beautiful things of life, our joy in living and creating, our fundamental honesty and the soundness of our national character as people close to the soil, and versed, by long tradition, in the lore of birds and trees, rivers and mountains, the planting and the gathering of crops. Gladstone was right when he said, and I hope you will forgive me for repeating it, "To serve Armenia is to serve civilization." It's an old bromide for us, but it might well be the core of our entire propaganda in the United States at this time, when so much is being said, and done, in the name of culture and civilization, and the whole world is being divided into east and west, as if the east, as represented by the USSR, did not save European culture from Hitler and Mussolini.

We Americans of Armenian descent can be Republicans, Democrats, Socialists, Communists, Prohibitionists, and what not, but there cannot and must not be any division among us on the vital Armenian problem of gathering our refugees in Syria, Lebanon, Greece, France, etc., and transporting them to Armenia, and helping them settle down on Armenian soil. Neither can there be any division among us as members or sympathizers of this or that Armenian political faction.

And there is no room for these refugees, among whom are wonderful human resouces such as any country, not excluding America, would be fortunate in having, unless the boundaries of the Armenian SSR are enlarged to include historic Armenian territories now under Turkish misrule. The destiny of the Armenian nation is dependent, in a large measure, on the solution of this boundary question. If Armenia is to become a freely creative member of the family of civilized, peace-loving, freedom-loving nations, she must have, immediately, an opportunity to care for her own, on her native soil.

The problem is most urgent. As urgent as the problem of the Jewish refugees in Europe. Hundreds of thousands of our brothers and sisters have been displaced persons for more than 25 years, have suffered untold miseries, and in spite of the hospitality of the friendly countries where they had to seek refuge, have one desire: to go to Armenia. There is no present or future for them outside of Armenia. They get along with their neighbors, they have won the esteem of the countries that opened their doors to them, by their industry, thrift, and intelligence, but the conditions of life are hard in these countries, and their position is that of guests, and they must get out and they want to get out, and come not to America, in spite of all the blessings we enjoy here, but go to the bleak, deserted land of Turkish Armenia, and start there all over again. And we may be sure that they are capable of performing miracles.

We know all this. I repeat it because American public opinion is conscious of the urgent, vital human problem of displaced persons. And it supplies us with a line of argument, among many others.

At the present time there are two organizations actively engaged in pursuing the Armenian cause in America, both in my opinion, doing useful work, and both in need of the support of all of us. It is unfortunate that we should have two separate organizations for the same purpose, with its unnecessary duplication of effort, the confusion it is likely to create in the minds of non-Armenians, the added expense of having two separate offices for the same work. Moreover, these organizations are seriously handicapped in their activities by the nonparticipation of our young generation and of large numbers of the more Americanized and more successful segments of our community, not because these latter are indifferent to their aims, and do not share their sentiments to the fullest, but because they have not been encouraged to join. There is not, of course, nor can there ever be, a single dissenting voice when it comes to this question of liberating Armenian territories from Turkey and their return to their rightful owner, the Armenian SSR. We are all united on this 100 percent, in and out of Armenia, everywhere, and all the time, no matter how we vote, Republican, Democratic, Socialist, or Communist, and to what Armenian political party we belong, or our father, uncle, or grandfather belonged.

But you can't encourage the young generation and the more Americanized, educated, or prosperous elements in our community to join en masse unless you put the whole business on an American basis, and talk to Americans in a language they can understand.

We need the help and support of every single Armenian-American, for each can contribute something, and many can contribute a lot, in brains, or money, or charm, or position. We require the best from everybody, and should stand united together with the best in us, forgetting all personal or factional prejudices and dislikes.

I hope this does not sound too naive. It can be done, it should be done—and right now, before it's too late. I urge both organizations to do their utmost to attract our young generation and more Americanized elements to active participation in this supremely Armenian, patriotic, humanitarian task. We have scores of patriots burning to do something and able to do it, too, who are silent now, and on the sidelines, or condemned to individual efforts—men who should be leaders and spokesmen for all of us, and are qualified to talk in a language the American public can understand. And our Government in Washington does what we, the citizens of this great democracy, tell them to do. It's public opinion that does the trick.

Recently I had a talk on the Armenian question with Rex Miller, an old friend of our people, whose nine weekly broadcasts over the Mutual-Don Lee system are heard and enjoyed by millions. He is an acute, objective observer of the political scene, and better informed on Near Eastern problems than any other radio commentator in America. Mr. Miller taught history at Harvard University for 6 years, was an editor of the Christian Science Monitor, former United States trade commissioner in Sydney, Australia, and as a speaker for Near East relief in Kansas and Missouri raised thousands of dollars for our orphans and refugees. Born in Kansas, and educated at Oxford, he was in Baghdad in 1917, where he helped the British Missionary Society set up a hospital and orphanage for Armenian refugees in Baghdad, survivors of the massacres.

"I think that the most likely chance of establishing better understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union is through the fair and proper handling of the Armenian question," he told me. "The best link between the U. S. S. R. and the U. S. A. is their common interest in the welfare of the Armenian people. The tragic misunderstanding between America and the Soviet Union can best be eliminated by the two countries giving their joint consideration to solving the problem of Armenia."

Mr. Miller is eager to go to Soviet Armenia, and also visit Armenian refugee communities in the Near East, for a first hand study of this problem on the spot, and then come back and report to the American public his findings. I am sure that if he goes to Armenia the Armenian Government will give him every facility and courtesy, and he will have the backing of Armenian organizations in America and everywhere on his way. He firmly advocates the justice of Armenian territorial claims, and believes Armenia should be enlarged up to the Wilson line, with whatever modification may be necessary in the region of Trebizond, also claimed by Georgia, whose gifted people he admires.

"As a student and professor of history and a practical news correspondent and commentator, I think that Armenia occupies one of the great strategic positions in the world. History is repeating itself. Rome and Parthia, the Byzantine and Persian Empires, fought their main battles for world supremacy in Armenia. The Armenians, with their superior intelligence and industry, are the coming people in the Near East. Soviet Russia has done for the Armenians many of the things America should have done, but did not."

Mr. Miller believes the Armenian question should be considered separately from the near and middle eastern problem because it has special merits, and the Soviet Government should publicize Armenian territorial claims much more than it has done. The average American does not know that the territory demanded from Turkey belongs to Armenia and Georgia, and would be turned over to the Armenians and Georgians.

His advice to Armenians is this:

"1. You must undertake to educate the American people on the Armenian question by reawakening their interest in Armenia. Armenia dropped out of the news a good many years ago, and should be brought back into the headlines, as after the First World War. A great deal of informational work should be done for this purpose.

"2. Unite your efforts; work together harmoniously."

He has started the ball rolling in the Western States. His comments, with their frequent references to Armenia, in well-measured but cordial and sympathetic words, are broadcast by 40 stations in California, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, and Utah.

We have other friends in a position to enlighten American public opinion and our President and Secretary of State. I am happy to note that at the recent mass meeting in New York for the presentation of a memorandum to UN, United States Senator C. W. TOBEY, Representative CHARLES R. SAVAGE, and Representative CELLER of New York were among the speakers. Another stanch friend of our people in the Congress of the United States is Representative BERTRAND W. GEARHART, of our own State, California. In one of his recent letters to me, Mr. GEARHART expressed his belief that our Government might possibly secure greater concessions from the USSR in international conferences if it were to suport the Armenian claims and help our people in their efforts to be reunited "under the ancient flag of old Armenia." In other words, the Soviet Union might yield in some other matter important to America if America cooperated with the USSR on the Armenian question. I am certain such cooperation would be supported by American public opinion. And in a letter I received from Mr. GEARHART yesterday he tells me he has just sent a letter to President Truman "to impress upon him the importance of doing something about the return of Armenia's lost provinces." I think this is an excellent method of drawing the attention of our Government to the Armenian question, and might well be followed by all of our friends in Congress. There is much good will for Armenia among the rank and file of the American people.

But so far we remain largely unorganized and ineffective, and the historic responsibility which is ours has not been carried out in a manner commensurate with our abilities and resources. Some good work has been done, but so much remains to be done—and what remains to be done is the individual responsibility of every Armenian American without exception. Let us rise to the greatness of the occasion, and no matter what our individual limitations, be truly great in this matter. For then we shall be fulfilling our obligation not only to Armenia, but also to America and to decent men and women everywhere who cherish the ideals of western civilization and still believe in the possibility of a beautiful world.

Advancing Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News:

ADVANCING PRICES

Prices will continue to rise, no matter what is done about OPA, as long as wages rise and strikers curtail production.

The absurdity that large wage increases could be granted without the necessity of price increases has been completely disproved by the price increases which the Government reluctantly had to approve during the past 6 months. Here are a few of them:

Five dollars a ton for steel—an amount equivalent to the cost of the 18½-cents-an-hour wage increase.

Forty and one-half cents a ton for bituminous coal, on the average, to cover a wage increase of 18½ cents an hour, plus extras.

Ninety-one cents a ton for anthracite coal (40 cents to $1.15 a ton) to cover 18½-cents-an-hour wage increase.

Six and five-tenths percent general freight-rate rise, probably to be followed later by another increase, to compensate for an 18½-cent-an-hour wage increase.

Sixteen to sixty dollars a car for General Motors to partly compensate for wage increases of 18½ cents an hour, and an additional 5 percent of former prices to compensate for higher costs of steel and other parts, which, in turn, had been caused by higher wages.

Building materials, textiles of many kinds, and many other materials could be added to the list. The full effect of wage increases has not yet been felt. The increase in the cost of coal, of steel, of freight, and of many other things will force further increases in the prices of many products.

Even if in the end OPA is not completely scrapped, it will have to raise ceilings of many articles, and the cost of living.

Shipbuilding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELLSWORTH B. BUCK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, the Maritime Commission has recently released news that President Truman has halted Commission plans for the construction of five postwar passenger ships. Conservation of Federal funds and shortage of materials were given as the reasons.

This order was given despite the fact that the Navy Department has recommended to the Maritime Commission that it proceed without delay with the building of new passenger ships convertible into troop transports should national emergency arise.

Almost synonomous with President Truman's order came news of State Department approval of an Export-Import Bank loan to Chile for purchase in the United States of steel to be used for the construction of five freight vessels in England. The Civilian Production Administration had already approved the export of this steel.

American shipyards are shut down for lack of business. We loan money and allocate steel for ship construction abroad. American shipyard workers and American shipbuilders apparently receive last consideration.

The Merchant Marine and National Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein an article appearing in the magazine Ships, published by the Shipbuilders Council of America, entitled "The Merchant Marine and National Security", written by Rear Adm. Francis E. M. Whiting, United States Navy. A memorandum with the publication shows that Admiral Whiting was serving as commandant, New York Naval Base. He has an enviable war record and has been awarded the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Star Medal and the Gold Star and other Navy awards. It is appropriately said that his "courageous and inspiring leadership and professional skill were at all times in keeping with the highest traditions of the United States naval service." This statement is made one of his citations and is well merited. As said by the publication Ships, "Admiral Whiting's statement as to the value of a strong merchant marine contains sound logic, and straight American thinking." The article follows:

THE MERCHANT MARINE AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Of all the major belligerents in the recent war, only one, the United States, emerged from the conflict with her cities and countryside untouched by the fighting. Germany and Japan were devastated. All the great cities of England were broken and scarred by Nazi bombs. The whole of France was a battlefield. The villages and plains of Russia were scorched and burned from the Polish border to Stalingrad. Our land alone escaped the ravages of battle.

Our peculiar geographical position contributed to this advantage. A decisive factor, however, was our ability to build and operate the greatest merchant fleet in the world—a fleet capable of carrying the men and materials of war to the distant corners of the earth. Without that merchant fleet to supply and maintain our Army and Navy, we would have been forced to fight, if we fought at all, in our own front yard.

In the two great wars of this century our armies and their equipment have been carried to the doorstep of the enemy by the merchant marine. The lesson is clear: Should this Nation ever again become embroiled in a global conflict, powerful military forces alone will not be sufficient. If we want to continue to be the "visiting team," it is absolutely necessary that we maintain in ready reserve a great armada of cargo and transport ships and the facilities for building more should an international crisis so demand.

We Americans fervently hope for continued peace. We must refuse, however, to be so naive as to assume that peace can be assured by merely hoping for it; we are taking a more realistic view this time and are determined to remain strong—ready for any eventuality should we again become the victim of an aggressor nation. We trust that our continued strength will discourage any ideas of conquest in the mind of a future aggressor.

Unfortunately, as we make our plans for long-range security, we are faced with a great many problems which can be answered only with guesswork. No man knows what form future wars, if there be any, will take. With the advent of the atomic age we can do little more than speculate as to the type of weapons that will be used or the form they will assume.

Of one point we can be sure: We know that should another war come, whether it be fought with guided missiles and atomic weapons or with some new device not yet conceived, we will need seagoing vessels—and lots of them.

During the last year of World War II, much of our fighting was done by far-ranging Navy fighting ships and long-range bombers. This situation, however, did not reduce the need for merchant vessels. On the contrary, as we threw more and more of our strength at the heart of Germany and Japan, the demand for merchant bottoms increased. Some scientists infer that the next war, if there is another, will be a Buck Rogers affair which conceivably might be concluded in 30 minutes. Should this fantastic era come, the conquest still would have to be followed up with troops and supplies, and we cannot foresee an age when seagoing vessels will be supplanted as the most reliable and most economical method of transporting large amounts of supplies across the seas.

There remains the unavoidable conclusion that no matter what type of weapons we adopt or what course the security program of this Nation follows, we cannot neglect our merchant marine. Our transport and cargo ships are an integral part of our security pattern.

How can we best insure that, should the occasion arise, we would have a merchant fleet of sufficient size to meet the demand of war?

First of all we must face the fact that our peacetime tonnage is wholly inadequate to serve the Army and Navy in time of emergency. When both of our great wars began, we found ourselves sadly lacking in the bottoms necessary to carry the tremendous amount of supplies and equipment to the battle fronts. We were forced to undertake an emergency shipbuilding program even to keep up with our combat losses. No one dares estimate the amount of precious time that was lost in the recent war while we frantically built shipyards and trained workers necessary to lay the keels for ships to carry urgently needed supplies already in coastal warehouses.

In 1945 at the peak of our war effort the United States had 5,529 merchant vesesls with a capacity of 56,797,700 deadweight tons. The most optimistic estimates of the Maritime Commission place the number of deadweight tons which can be used by this Nation in the postwar period at somewhere between fifteen and twenty million. In other words, our merchant tonnage in the best peacetime years can only be about one-third as much as was required during the war. And this is a liberal estimate. As the complexities of war increase, we must anticipate even greater wartime demands on our merchant marine.

We cannot risk again a shortage of ships in the event of unexpected attack. We must maintain a reserve merchant fleet of adequate strength.

Since it is not economically advisable to keep the whole reserve fleet in operation it is submitted that one point of a feasible plan for insuring its readiness is to put our present surplus ships in "moth balls." Modern methods of preservation and dehumidification make it possible to put seagoing vessels in storage for a considerable period. If we should again be faced with the prospects of war, it would be a comparatively simple operation to place these ships on active duty within a short time.

Among our commercial vessels there is a certain amount of war-weary ships which must be scrapped in the interests of economy. Still another group of vessels is being transferred to Allied Nations to fill the gaps in their own depleted merchant fleets. There remains, however, a sizable percentage of seaworthy vessels which can easily be placed in storage.

Unfortunately this "moth-ball fleet," together with the active merchant fleet, would be insufficient to meet our demands in the event of another war. We must go even further.

Our private shipbuilding industry must be kept healthy and active during the peacetime years if we are to expect it to be able to arise to meet the unusual demands of a national emergency. The United States has taken her place as a world maritime power; from the standpoint of national security alone we cannot afford to relinquish that position. We must take steps to insure that merchant vessels flying the Stars and Stripes continue to ply the oceans of the world.

We in the Navy came to realize even more keenly during the war that the merchant marine is more than an adjunct to our national security. It is an integral part of it. At the peak of our military operations in 1945 almost one-quarter of our merchant tonnage was required in support of the ships and bases of the Navy. Between one-third and one-half was required to support the Army overseas. In view of this, from a strict military point of view a strong, active merchant marine and ready reserve of merchant vessels and shipbuilding facilities becomes a vital concomitant to the security of this country.

One Year of Socialism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Journal-American of July 26, 1946:

ONE YEAR OF SOCIALISM

The British people have now had one full year of experience under the Socialist government which came into power on July 5, 1945, and thus have an opportunity to judge for themselves if that power has been used wisely and especially if it has been beneficial.

The large majority by which the British people created the Socialist government somewhat belied the real taste of the people for that form of government, for they have a strong tradition of free enterprise and personal liberty and a stronger instinct for government that is the servant of the people rather than the master.

However, the British people had just emerged from a hard and bitter war and they had a harrowing memory of the years of depression and unemployment that followed the last great war.

So when the ardent and persuasive advocates of socialism said they could give Britain a peacetime government without depression and unemployment, the majority of the British people decided to let them have a try at it—although having little enthusiasm for the method.

Now that it is posible to look back at a full year of the reality of socialism, rather than ahead at the prospect and the promise of its benefits, the British people are pretty glum about the situation—and even more glum about the four more years of socialism they have bargained for.

The London Daily Mail, as its Trans-Atlantic edition reports, recalls that one of the things promised by the Socialists was security against a higher cost of living, but the end of the first year of socialism finds the British people paying higher and still increasing costs for all essential articles and services—"among them clothing, fares, laundry, local rates, building and decorating and much else."

"Nationalization will insure that goods are available at decent prices to everybody," Sir Stafford Cripps had promised in urging the Socialist way as a good way to produce the goods the country needed.

But after a year of socialism, as the Daily Mail reports:

"There are only half, or a quarter, or one-fifth of prewar household supplies for the British people.

Likewise, the British people had been told by the same Socialist spokesman that "if the Labor Party is returned to power the housing situation will be clarified in a fortnight."

But the Daily Mail laconically reports that less than 10,000 permanent homes have been completed in all Britain in the first year of socialism and comments that "it is remarkable how long it takes to build a house today."

Moreover, continues the Daily Mail, the slogan of the Socialists a year ago was "jobs for all," but at that time there were only 103,000 unemployed in the nation, and after a year of socialism the army of unemployed numbers 375,000.

It could only be said that socialism has succeeded and been beneficial, the newspaper observes, if the British people could now honestly say they are "better fed, clothed, housed, that the outlook is brighter, and that they can more surely call their souls their own than was the case a year ago."

But the opposite is true, and the British people are worse off after a year of socialism than before.

The principal thing the British people have learned about socialism during the past year is that Socialists do not make promises with any expectation of keeping them, but only for the purpose of gaining power—and once having gained power they consider the end achieved, and consider the means of achieving as having had sufficient warrant.

One Hundred and Ninety-second Tank Battalion Wisconsin Heroes of Bataan and Corregidor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when the final history of World War II is written the stand of our soldiers and sailors at Bataan and Corregidor will be revealed as one of the epic battles in that conflict. The courage and the valor displayed there is unmatched in the military history of our country. Most of that original company were from my congressional district and as their Representative I salute the living heroes of that organization and the survivors of those who paid the supreme sacrifice. To those who will never return I bow in humble respect to their memories and thank Almighty God that he gave our great Nation such men. I am reminded of those few lines of Scripture which are so appropriate: "Greater love hath no man than this: That he lay down his life for his friend." We cannot match their devotion to God and country.

Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and honor to have attended a reunion of the survivors of the One Hundred and Ninety-second Tank Battalion at Milwaukee, Wis., on July 10, and Gen. Jonathan M. Wainwright, that famous officer who commanded those men at Bataan and Corregidor. The meeting of that great soldier and patriot with the survivors of the One Hundred and Ninety-second Tank Battalion was most touching and evidence that he realized the price that had been paid by these men and their comrades.

Mr. Speaker, at that reunion I met an old friend and outstanding newspaper man who related some of the historical facts about the One Hundred and Ninety-second. He was Mr. Frank Sinclair, of the Milwaukee Journal, and formerly a resident of Janesville and an employee of the Janesville Gazette. So that this historical background may be preserved, I insert herewith Mr. Sinclair's statement about that event in his own words. I also include news articles prepared by him as he covered the Wainwright reunion.

BIRTH OF THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SECOND TANK BATTALION

The idea originated with Claude H. Feagin, a native of Atlanta, Ga., who was a Tank Corps veteran of World War I. Feagin was circulation manager of the Janesville Daily Gazette. Early in 1920, he campaigned to get recruits for a tank company. The writer, a native of Brooklyn, N. Y., was sports editor of the Gazette at the time and wrote all the publicity for the drive. But when enlistment night came, no one signed up and Feagin begged the writer to "do something." I had returned only a few months previous from France, where I had been a regimental sergeant major of Infantry and had been made an honorary citizen by the city of Bourges, France, for promoting friendly relations between the French and Americans through the medium of The Cro, official newspaper of the Army Central Records Office and of which I was cofounder and managing editor. I told the crowd of young men that not long before my return from France, I had driven through the French countryside with a Belgian priest, a chaplain attached to the American forces, and had asked him why there were so many wars in France despite its high culture and the loveliness of its land. The priest, deeply moved, said that the French still fretted from past wars with Germany and the peace of Versailles was but a truce and a new war would be upon the world within 20 years. He convinced me so much of that possibility that I told the young Janesville man an organization such as a tank company would some day be needed by the United States which would become embroiled in any new European war. I was the first to enlist in that company, starting the others to sign up. However, I did not remain active once the company got going because my newspaper work at Janesville gave me too little time. Feagin became captain when the company was formed under the Wisconsin National Guard, the first National Guard tank outfit in the Nation, I believe.

GENERAL WAINWRIGHT DEEPLY MOVED BY REUNION WITH JANESVILLE TANKERS WHO SURVIVED BATAAN

(By Frank Sinclair, Milwaukee Journal writer, formerly of the Janesville Gazette)

MILWAUKEE.—Sixteen men from Janesville, survivors of the last terrible days on Corregidor with the One Hundred and Ninety-second Tank Battalion, met their commander in chief, Gen. Jonathan M. Wainwright, here Wednesday afternoon.

And the general wept.

Not many in a crowd of almost 1,000 gathered at the Milwaukee County airport to greet the general on his arrival by plane for an American Legion celebration, saw him falter.

The general had stepped jauntily from his ship swinging a swagger stick, had gaily shaken the hands of Milwaukee's Mayor Bohn and those of a big reception committee. He had stood at stiff attention in salute while an Army band played the "Star Spangled Banner."

Then he saw his boys—about half of what is left of the gallant tank battalion.

The master of ceremonies brought the surviving tank corps men up to meet the general. The general took a step forward. He halted momentarily, his eyes filled with tears, but he fought them back. His voice choked. General Wainwright "broke rank." As the Janesville men and several tankmen from other parts of the State marched in column of twos toward him, the general motioned to them to open ranks. He went in among them, threw his wiry arms around the leaders and as many more as he could gather in a single clasp.

With his voice shaking with emotion, he told his men, "Boys, I want each of you to know how much I appreciated what you did under me on Corregidor. It was a grand job well done."

FORGETS HIS RANK

Then dropping all difference in rank, the four-star general strode between the two rows of men, grasping the right hand of each in both hands of his, squeezed tight, and repeated over and over his thanks.

The men were Lt. Henry Knox, Sgts. Alva Chapman, Leo Dorsey, Herbert Durner, Dale Lawton, William McAauliffe, Carl Nickols, William Nolan, Philip Parrish, Lloyd Richter, Boyd Riese, Robert Ryan, Owen Sandmire, and Lewis Wallisch, and Corps. Wayne Buggs and Wesley Elmer. Sandmire is from Madison.

Once again the general's eyes misted when he was introduced to Sgt. Edward Starz, Milwaukee, one of six paratroopers who landed at Mukden and gathered information that led to the liberation of General Wainwright from the Japs.

Later, General Wainwright told the Gazette special correspondent: "I got a great thrill on meeting these men who did such fine service for the Nation under great sacrifice. It was one of the greatest thrills I've had since I returned." To a press conference, he said, "Frankly, when I saw those men—only a handful left of that great tank battalion—my eyes filled with tears. They were the first ground troops I employed. It gave me a shock to see how few were left."

High tribute was paid to the One Hundred and Ninety-second by General Wainwright. He said that "When General MacArthur of Milwaukee ordered the withdrawal of my troops back to Bataan, it was the One Hundred and Ninety-second who covered my rear. For 142 miles they kept the Japs off. They did a great job. It was a great military feat."

When the general spoke, it was with flashing eyes, expressive gestures, and a show of deep sincerity.

His scene with the Janesville men over, General Wainwright recovered as from a trance. He said he had been carried far away from Miwaukee, back to the Philippines and to those desperate times that he had shared with these men. It seemed that he shook the cobwebs from his mind as he dropped the hand of the last Janesville man.

TAKE PART IN PARADE

Then he wheeled, was the snappy soldier once more, and he walked his gaunt body, still bearing some of the signs of his trials, briskly to a waiting automobile. He joined happily in a parade through Milwaukee's south side, to the lake front and then through the downtown area waving to cheering crowds. The Janesville men, and the widows, mothers, and fathers of those of southern Wisconsin who did not return, took part in the parade. They were present also at a dinner for the general at the Schroeder Hotel, Wednesday night.

Few of the Janesville veterans had seen General Wainwright before. But they came to Milwaukee, they said, to see "Skinny" Wainwright, "a right guy."

Acting in the role of spokesman, First Sergeant Lawton, said that his "buddies" like General Wainwright because "he was in a tougher spot than we were. He was in a tight place" when he was left in command when President Roosevelt ordered General MacArthur to escape so that his vast talents could be saved to defeat the Japs.

"General Wainwright," Sergeant Lawton added, "had all the 'guts' of a great soldier. The only thing that defeated him and us was the lack of supplies. We like him. We admire him. He's a real man. We'd do it again and die for him."

Said the Janesville women, who had remained at home, tormented by lack of information about what was happening to their boys. "We just feel we owe a lot to General Wainwright." "We want to shake his hand," said Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Walsh who lost two sons—twins. So also said Mrs. Minnie Thorman, mother of the late Captain Russell Thorman, Mrs. Velma Bloomfield, widow of First Lt. Kenneth Bloomfield, and Mrs. Hazel Bruni, widow of Capt. Fred T. Bruni. "Our boys died under him and we just want to be near him," they said.

PAID GLOWING TRIBUTE

General Wainwright paid glowing tribute to the One Hundred and Ninety-second Battalion at the night meeting, declaring that not only were they the tail end of the retreat on Luzon, but when his little force reached the Bataan Peninsula, it was the tanks who routed the Japs out of fox holes after the infantry failed. "They went in there, firing their guns into the holes and throwing hand grenades, to clear them out," he said.

The general spoke after an audience of 700 rose in applauding tribute to the Janesville men and the next of kin of those who died, and after William Trinke, Lake Geneva, State American Legion commander, declared that the defense of Corregidor held back the advance of the Japs long enough to make possible the organization of an offensive that brought the Japs to their knees.

General Wainwright told of the horrors of the last 27 days on Corregidor, how his tiny force, that began the defense ill-trained and ill-equipped for the battalions of tanks and a regiment of cavalry, ate its horses but still starved, ran out of ammunition, saw "the rock" pulverized, were forced to give in.

Turning to the women of the One Hundred and Ninety-second's auxiliary General Wainwright said, "I revere those mothers, wives, sweethearts, and sisters," and he called upon the Nation to so keep itself prepared militarily that women shall nevermore suffer like they did and no enemy shall ever again dare attack America."

The Janesville group were guests at a private luncheon with General Wainwright at the Schroeder Hotel, Thursday noon.

THIRTY THOUSAND CHEER WAINWRIGHT AND JANESVILLE TANK COMPANY MEN IN MILWAUKEE PARADE

(By Frank Sinclair, Milwaukee Journal staff, formerly of Janesville Gazette)

MILWAUKEE.—Milwaukee took Gen. Jonathan M. Wainwright, the iron man of Bataan and Corregidor, to its heart Thursday afternoon, and with the general it paid homage to 16 of the Janesville survivors of units of the One Hundred and Ninety-second Tank Battalion.

For while more than 30,000 persons who lined Wisconsin Avenue for 26 blocks cheered, clapped, whistled, and shouted to "Skinny" Wainwright, they saved roars of further greeting for the southern Wisconsin heroes of General Wainwright's last days in the Philippines. They cheered lustily also for the 64 mothers, fathers, widows, and other next of kin of the men who died "over there."

For the parade for the general was a parade also for his comrades in arms.

PARADE SHORT BUT IMPRESSIVE

It was a short column that they were part of—an advance escort of motorcycle police, massed flags of the American Legion, the Army band from Percy Jones General Hospital at Battle Creek, Mich., the general's car, 35 other cars carrying Legion, public, and civic officials—but Milwaukee paid it tribute higher than given to any other visiting figures of prominence in years.

From North Eighteenth Street eastward along the "Avenue" crowds lined both curbs, waving flags, calling out to the heroes. The crowds grew thicker as the main section of the city was approached. From high up in the tall office buildings, store, club, and hotel buildings—even from the roofs—people shouted greetings, and down from the windows came clouds of torn-up paper.

Through it all, the Janesville delegation watched as their general sat high on the tonneau of an open car, waving first one arm, then the other, to his admirers. They saw him blow kisses to little children and to girls, tip his hat to elderly women, nod, smile, and enjoy every minute of his ovation. They chuckled with General Wainwright when veterans of World War II, forgetting they were not in uniform, stiffened to attention and saluted, and the general saluted back.

PRAISE FOR MAC ARTHUR

The Janesville men were guests at Milwaukee's select Cudworth American Legion Post clubhouse on the lake front after the parade. They were present to hear General Wainwright praise the post's most distinguished member, their first commander in chief overseas, General MacArthur.

"In my humble opinion," General Wainwright said, "General MacArthur's counterattack against the Japanese Empire will go down in history as one of the great military feats of all time. General MacArthur, a life member of this post, will forever stand as one of the great captains of history."

At noon Thursday the boys from Bower City and the One Hundred and Ninety-second Tank Auxiliary had luncheon with General Wainwright at the Schroeder Hotel. It was a hushed affair with William Trinkle, Lake Geneva, State commander of the Legion, and Val Ove, Milwaukee, past State commander, the only outsiders present.

Rising to speak at its close, General Wainwright hesitated a moment and then said softly, "My comrades of Bataan and Corregidor, I can never say enough about that gallant campaign you fought on northern Luzon. Last night, when I saw so many of these ladies present at the dinner for me, members of the families of the men who did not come back, it choked me up. I just want to thank you again."

GIVES AUTOGRAPHS TO TANKS

To the Janesville men who asked, the general gave his autograph. He asked each man to tell him his name, wrote it down, and then added, "A Hero of Bataan from his commander, Jonathan M. Wainwright, general, AUSA."

Thursday night, the Janesville folks were cheered again when they were guests at a huge spectacle, the mass initiation of more than 3,000 new American Legion members, at the Blatz Temple of Music in Washington Park, where General Wainwright spoke.

(Frank Sinclair, writer of two articles on the Janesville delegation's visit to Milwaukee, was a member of the Gazette news staff and sports editor for several years following World War I. He wrote the publicity preliminary to the organization of the Janesville National Guard tank unit under Capt. Claude Feagan and became one of its first members.)

REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have a personal letter of Marshall Field's store, of Chicago, Ill., expressing the great hope that the bill for the amputees will pass. In the letter it is stated that they have in their employment a double amputee. He can do his work extremely well, but he loses a great deal of time because he cannot get to and from his work. I know the Members will be very much interested in reading that letter. A motor caravan of 50 persons, including 3 double amputees, came from New York today, bringing copies of 25,000 telegrams sent to Members of Congress asking for passage of the legislation. I have those copies in my possession.

The following story appeared in yesterday's Star. The Army teaches the amputees to drive cars as a part of their rehabilitation. Few of the men have the money to buy cars when they are discharged. They need cars when they first get out of the service. Changes take place in their stumps for awhile. Cars are just a part of their rehabilitation. It is the duty of the Government to provide these cars.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star of July 28, 1946]

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATED BY ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT

About 1,000 Army officers, patients, and visitors gathered yesterday afternoon at Walter Reed Hospital to hear General Eisenhower speak and to view work of the Army Medical Department at exercises commemorating the one hundred and seventy-first anniversary of that branch of service.

The Army Chief of Staff paid tribute and sincere expressions of gratitude to the Medical Department as one of the greatest factors that produced the morale to defeat the Axis.

Maj. Gen. Norman T. Kirk, Army Surgeon General, also addressed the gathering before spectators were invited to witness examples of the results of modern Army medical treatment.

PRAISES HOSPITAL TREATMENT

Praising hospital treatment of servicemen, General Eisenhower also recalled that during the European war about 30,000 more wounded men were treated, healed, and sent back to the front line than were numbered in the entire average strength of the Medical Department in that theater.

In his address, the Chief of Staff pointed out that American fighting men gave their unbounded appreciation and admiration to their comrades armed only with stretchers and first-aid kits, citing their insistence that detachments be awarded battle badges equal to the Combat Infantry Badge.

"A greater military accolade than this, no department, no service, no unit, could receive," he declared.

"But your most enduring monument lives in the hearts and minds of thousands upon thousands of American families where a loved one has come back from the wars because of your skill and devotion."

In a special area, amputee patients from the Forest Glen section of the Army Medical Center demonstrated the proficiency in driving automobiles that they have gained through participation in the hospital's advanced reconditioning and rehabilitation training.

One car was driven by a triple amputee, Corp. Ralph Brown, 31, of Youngstown, Ohio, who lost both legs and his right arm during action near Metz, France.

SPECIAL DEVICES USED

Paul L. Sims, reconditioning instructor and himself an amputee, explained that Corporal Brown would be unable to operate cars with conventional gear-shift operation because his legs were amputated above the knees, but the serviceman was able to completely operate a car equipped with hydromatic drive. Levers were attached to the steering wheel for control of the brake, accelerator, and starter, and a prosthetic device on his right arm was attached to the wheel by means of a hook.

Other patients fitted with artificial limbs proved they could control standard car models without aid. The special steering wheel apparatus for leg amputees and paraplegics, lower limb paralysis cases, can be installed by manufacturers on order, Mr. Sims said.

Another group of amputees gave a demonstration of swimming and diving in the hospital's 120-foot indoor swimming pool.

Doctors advocate use of the pool as a chief means of teaching amputees balance and confidence, at the same time allowing them to exercise through recreation, a spokesman pointed out.

One amputee, Joseph Brofman, 34, of New York City, amazed spectators by swimming 110 feet under water. Discharged from the hospital this month, Mr. Brofman lost both his legs during combat in the Southwest Pacific in 1944. Attempting to swim the entire 120-foot length of the pool he came up for air 10 feet short of his mark, and laughingly apologized for his failure.

UNIT'S HISTORY TRACED

Tracing the Medical Department's history, General Kirk reminded that there is one war—"that of science against suffering and death, in which there is no armistice. Hitler was a puny enemy compared to typhus, and it seems now—due to DDT and typhus vaccines—that this great pestilence will never again sweep over a nation," he declared. "The armies of Japan were just temporary nuisances compared to yellow fever and cholera, against which there were notable victories."

"This war came, fortunately, at the dawn of a new age in medicine and surgery," General Kirk asserted, listing new drugs, vaccines, and treatment procedures which grew during World War II. "The war gave an enormous impetus to development and utilization of all this new material," he said. "It gave an otherwise unimaginable opportunity to test the value of all these innovations. Medical science has been advanced a generation during this war period."

Praising the response of America's doctors to the war emergency, the Surgeon General promised the Army "still assumes complete responsibility for returning all its wartime soldiers to their homes free of disease and physically fit. Our attitude toward the sick and injured who still remain in our hospitals remains that of the family doctor toward his patients—and it will remain so to the end."

After the addresses, General Eisenhower presented the Legion of Merit medal to Col. Frank S. Gillespie, British liaison officer to the Medical Department, for his distinguished service in that capacity during the war. The citation was read by Brig. Gen. George C. Beach, Jr., commanding general, Army Medical Center.

Armenia's Plea for Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, long-suffering Armenia never had a more eloquent pleader for justice for her sons and daughters than that distinguished American citizen of Armenian descent, Mr. Aram Saroyan, of Fresno, Calif.

Raising his voice at Carnegie Hall in New York at a mass meeting held on the evening of April 28, 1946, this gifted orator from the west coast held an attentive audience spellbound as he recited the revolting stories of the seemingly never ending cruelties that have been inflicted upon this valiant race down through the ages, many of whom in this day wander the world homeless and forlorn, the pathetic victims of Turkish ruthlessness.

As that address was one of the epochal pronouncements of the day, a speech most eloquently delivered, a classic in its scholarly preparation, I ask unanimous consent that it may be spread upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my instant remarks.

The address, Mr. Speaker, that I have just referred to is the following:

THE ARMENIAN CAUSE

(By Aram Saroyan, Fresno, Calif.)

Fellow Americans, I have come from the fair State of California and I bring greetings to you all. Indeed, as a citizen of this great democracy, I consider it a rare honor and privilege to joint my voice with yours in bringing the just cause of Armenia before the world at large and the American people in particular.

Before we can discuss the Armenian problem, intelligently, let us turn the pages of history to inquire, Who are the Turks? Who are the Armenians? Why have the Armenians been persecuted for centuries? What has been their crime? Let us not appraise these people by what I have to say, but by what distinguished and reliable historians and statesmen have said through the centuries:

First of all, it was a supreme tragedy for civilization when the Turkish hordes, in the sixteenth century invaded and occupied Armenia. The Armenians were gifted, progressive and above all devout Christians. The Turks, on the other hand, were so uncivilized and barbarous that Pope Calixtus III in 1456 decreed the addition of the following invocation to the Ave Maria: "Lord, save us from the devil, the Turk and the comet."

Many great writers and statesmen have shown that with the appearance of the Turks civilization vanished in Syria, Mesopotamia, Byzantium, Arabia, Egypt, Armenia, and Greece. Victor Hugo admirably described the blighting influence of the Turks when he said: "The Turks have passed there—all is ruin and tears."

William Gladstone, the great English statesman declared: "The Turks were, upon the whole, from the black day when they first entered Europe, the one antihuman specimen of humanity! Wherever they went, a broad line of blood marked the track behind them; so far as their dominion reached, civilization disappeared from view."

The Armenians, by their Christianity and Western civilization in Turkey. The field of activities of American, French, and later, German missionaries, who went to Turkey for educational and evangelical purposes, was strictly confined to Armenian communities. The New York Times of October 19, 1915, published the following statement of General Sherib Pasha, then a Turkish exile in Paris:

"If there is a race which has been closely connected with the Turks by its fidelity, by its service to the country, by statesmen and functionaries of talent it has furnished, by the intelligence which it has manifested in all domains—commerce, industry, science, and the arts—it is certainly the Armenians."

However, the Turks, because of their Mohammedan fanaticism, could not tolerate Christianity, whose faithful followers were the Armenians. As you know, ever since the Armenians adopted Christianity as their national religion in the year 301, they have adhered to it with great devotion and superhuman sacrifices. Historians tell us that when in the middle of the fifth century the Persians tried, first by promises and then by force, to convert the Armenians to fire worship, they failed miserably. To the Persian threats, the Armenians made this classic reply:

"From this faith no force can move us—neither angels nor men; neither sword nor fire nor water; nor any deadly punishment, * * * If you leave us our faith, we shall accept no other lord in place of you; but we shall accept no god in place of Christ. If, after this great confession you ask anything more of us, lo! our lives are in your hands. From you—torments; from us—submission; your sword—our necks. We are no better than those who have gone before us, who sacrificed their wealth and their lives for this testimony."

During all the Turkish atrocities, many thousands of Armenians, who were immolated for their Christian faith, could have saved themselves by merely pronouncing the formula of Islam and renouncing Christ. They preferred, instead, to suffer fiendish indignities and death at the hands of the Turks.

Lord Bryce has said:

"Of the seven or eight hundred thousand Armenians who have perished in the recent massacres, many thousands have died as martyrs, by which, I mean, they have died for their Christian faith, when they could have saved their lives by renouncing it. This has perhaps not been realized even by those who in Europe or America have read of and been horrified by the wholesale slaughter and hideous cruelties by which half of an ancient nation has been exterminated."

Finally, the constant religious massacres of the Armenians by the Turks so outraged the moral conscience of the Western World, that Turkey was compelled to subscribe to the sixty-first article of the Treaty of Berlin, signed on July 13, 1878, which read:

"The Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out, without further delay, the improvements and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds. It will periodically make known the steps taken to this effect to the powers, who will superintend their application."

The ink had scarcely dried upon the solemn international obligation, before it was contemptuously violated.

Instead of the promised reforms, the Turkish Government increased its persecution and encouraged the Kurds to pillage and slaughter the Armenians. From 1884 to 1896 more than 300,000 Armenians were massacred. In 1909 the terrible massacre in Cilicia shocked the civilized world, and when the Turks entered the First World War, in 1914, they endeavored to destroy the entire Armenian Nation by massacre and deportation.

Professor Angelo Hall, of the Annapolis Naval Academy, wrote in 1906:

"Self-interest prompts the nations to let Turkey go on with her work of exterminating the Armenians. The nations may yet pay a heavier penalty for their crime than we paid for slavery."

That prophecy of calamity was fulfilled during the First World War. Perhaps the Second World War would not have scourged the human race if embers of injustice were not left smoldering.

Lord Robert Cecil, referring to the collapse of the Russian Army during the First World War, said:

"In the beginning of the war the Russian Armenians organized volunteer forces which bore the brunt of some of the heaviest fighting in the Caucasian campaign. After the Russian Army's break-down, the Armenians took over the Caucasian front, fought the Turks for 5 months, and thus rendered a very important service to the British Army in Mesopotamia. They served alike in the British, French, and American Armies, and have borne their part in General Allenby's victory in Palestine. The service rendered by the Armenians to the common cause can never be forgotten."

We all remember at the conclusion of the First World War the victorious Allied and associated powers, in order to do justice to Armenia, which they called their "Little Ally," created by the Treaty of Sevres a free Armenian State. Turkey was a signatory of that treaty and the boundaries of Armenia were delineated by President Wilson in 1920 at the request of the Allied Supreme Council.

The only way to remember the valiant and heroic deeds of the Armenian fighters, the only way to promote peace through justice, and the only way to redeem the Allied promises for liberty and security to the Armenian people is for the United Nations to expedite the annexation of the Armenian provinces of the Wilsonian boundaries to Soviet Armenia.

You see now, my friends, that the demand of the American Committee for Armenian Rights to restore the Armenian Provinces in the Wilsonian boundaries to the Armenians, is really a demand for the execution of a legacy left by President Woodrow Wilson to the American people. Let us honor his imperishable memory by upholding Armenia's claims to her own homeland! Let no one cherish the illusion that there can be established universal peace without the establishment of universal justice.

Now comes the Turk and says to the world, unashamed: "Why should the world concern itself with the Armenian problem, since no Armenians exist in the territory in question?" It is like a cold-blooded murderer who kills his victim with malice aforethought and when he is brought before the bar of justice, shouts to the court and jury, without remorse or humiliation: "Why punish me, my victim is dead and buried?"

Because of the hideous crimes which have been perpetrated against the Armenian people for centuries, the Armenians have been scattered, like autumn leaves, to the four corners of the earth. Today, for the first time in history, little Armenia, a member of the Soviet Union opens its doors and its heart to its brethren to come home. Already more than 650,000 now dispersed in Syria, Egypt, Rumania, Turkey, Bulgaria, France, and elsewhere, have signed applications to be repatriated on their ancestral soil. But their home is too small. A great portion which was stolen by the Turks today remain desolate, unproductive, in the hands of our traditional enemy. Today the Armenians in every land are crying to the world's conscience: "Give us back our land, our sacred land; land that belongs to us, historically and geographically; land that has been drenched for centuries with the blood of our ancestors; land upon which we may build our homes, rear our children, till our soil and enjoy the fruits of our labor, and worship God according to the dictates of our own conscience."

To the call of this small, but heroic people, I am confident the American people will respond by assuming the leadership in seeing that justice is done.

America's love for freedom and justice is a guaranty that she will not fail the Armenians now.

Radio Interview by Congressman Wigglesworth—Investigation of Maritime Commission and War Shipping Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include at this point in the RECORD the text of a radio interview on July 20, 1946, over the Yankee network between Francis W. Tully, Jr., Washington representative of the network, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] who for many years has emphasized so strongly the apparent gross waste of the people's money in connection with the financial operations of the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration:

Question. Congressman WIGGLESWORTH, you have been interested for a long time in the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration have you not?

Answer. I certainly have.

Question. What is the basis of your interest?

Answer. I have always been interested in the maintenance of an adequate merchant marine for this country. During the war I was very much interested in the vital work of ship construction and ship operation to which both agencies contributed so greatly through the magnificent efforts of workers and management in the shipping field.

Question. You have, however, been very critical of the financial operations of both agencies over a period of years have you not?

Answer. I have been very critical of their financial operations. As a member of the House Appropriations Committee, it has been my duty for many years to pass upon all requests for money by both agencies. As a member of that committee, I have felt it my duty to report to the House and to the people conditions as they appeared from the record.

Question. Well, Congressman, I think those close to the situation in Washington will admit that you have done that?

Answer. Well, I can say this, that year after year I have stood on the floor of the House and called attention to scandalous conditions apparently existing in the financial operations of both of these agencies.

Year after year I have inserted in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tables compiled from official figures, indicating apparently gross waste of the people's money through excessive purchase prices, through excessive charter hire, through excessive insurance payments, and in many other ways.

Year after year I have stood on the floor of the House and advocated a thoroughgoing investigation of the two agencies either by a regular standing committee of the House or by a select committee set up for that purpose.

Question. There is no doubt in your mind then of the justification for the investigation just started by the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Answer. There is no doubt whatsoever.

Many pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and committee hearings in recent years have been filled with charges of irregularities and gross waste of the people's money running into hundreds of millions of dollars in connection with the financial operations of the two agencies.

Question. The Comptroller General of the United States has been very critical of the financial operations of both agencies; has he not?

Answer. He certainly has.

In January of 1944 he reported to the Congress that he had found many irregular practices in the course of investigations of both agencies during the fiscal year 1943, some of them "due in no small part to the failure of the Maritime Commission to issue proper instructions and exercise the duty of administrative control ordinarily required in the handling of Government facilities and the expenditure of public funds." He specified some of these irregular practices in detail.

At about the same time, he stated that the latest balance sheet available was that of June 30, 1942, and that the records were in such condition—supporting documents and papers being missing—that a proper verification of the balance sheets of the War Shipping Administration and the Maritime Commission as of June 30, 1942, was impossible.

About 6 months ago, he completed his official audits of both agencies up to June 30, 1943. I placed these audits in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 23, 1946. They have been characterized in the United States Senate as one of the severest indictments of any Government department or agency. They show among other things that no less than $8,000,000,000 of the people's money has not been properly accounted for.

Question. As I understand it, Congressman, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has had the necessary authority to investigate the situation ever since the summer of 1941?

Answer. That is correct.

Question. What do you think finally brought the investigation to a head?

Answer. Well, there have been several recent developments which may have contributed. First, the audits of the Comptroller General to which I have just referred; second, the severe condemnation of both agencies on May 23 last by the House Committee on Naval Appropriations; third, perhaps, a resolution which I introduced in the House under date of June 4 calling for the appointment of a select committee to conduct a sweeping investigation of the financial operations of both agencies. I say perhaps because it was exactly 2 days later that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries obtained $40,000 in addition to the $139,000 already made available for the purpose and arranged to start the present investigation.

Question. What questions do you think the committee will go into?

Answer. Well, I am not exactly clear as to the scope of the investigation now contemplated. Of course, the committee will go into the detailed charges of errors of commission and omission embodied in the audits of the Comptroller General to which I have referred but there are many important questions which I hope the committee will ultimately explore in the light of the charges which have been made.

Question. I assume, from what you have said, that you feel the committee should investigate the amounts paid for purchase, charter hire, and insurance in respect to vessels taken over for war purposes?

Answer. I certainly do.

The payments made, according to data furnished by the Comptroller General or one of the agencies under investigation, would seem to indicate that prices paid in many instances had no reasonable relation whatever to the General Accounting Office book value, to a fair market value, or to specific values fixed by Admiral Land himself, when chairman of the Maritime Commission and Administrator of the War Shipping Administration.

For example, the data furnished shows among other things: Sixty-nine vessels, 20 years of age or more, purchased for over $26,250,000 or for seven or eight times the value as determined by the General Accounting Office.

It shows 758 vessels, 20 years of age or more, with a General Accounting Office book value of less than $38,000,000, actually earning under charter hire, almost $200,000,000 in a period of 18 months.

It shows 690 vessels, 20 years of age or more, insured for over $477,000,000, or about seven times the valuation of the General Accounting Office.

If you want one further example, it shows 4 vessels, given a total valuation of December 31, 1938, by Admiral Land, as Chairman of the Maritime Commission, of $300,442, subsequently purchased by the Maritime Commission, between June 26, 1941, and December 6, 1942, for a total purchase price of just under $2,000,000.

Question. Should the committee go into the amounts allowed for old vessels taken over by the Commission under the law in exchange for new tonnage to be delivered after the war?

Answer. In my opinion, it should.

The official data to which I have referred indicates, for instance, that 7 ships, 20 years of age or more, with a book value of about $300,000, were given a credit allowance when traded in of $4,385,000.

It also shows 36 vessels, from 36 to 51 years of age, accorded trade-in allowances aggregating almost 200 percent of their original cost.

Question. Should the committee investigate the matter of renegotiation?

Answer. Well, Pete, all I can say to that is, that I think the people are entitled to know why so little money has been obtained by renegotiation, why so large profits have been allowed after renegotiation, and why, and at whose instance, contracts for purchase, charter hire, and perhaps other purposes were exempted from renegotiation.

Question. It has been suggested recently that shipping companies have been permitted to deposit wartime earnings intax-exempt funds, depriving the Treasury of lawful taxes. Is this something the committee should look into in your opinion?

Answer. I think so emphatically.

A charge has been made that this practice has been permitted in apparent violation of the law and against the repeated and explicit advice of the general counsel of the Maritime Commission. As a matter of fact, I understand that the Treasury now estimates that as much as $80,000,000 may be repayable in taxes in this connection.

Question. Would it not be well for the committee to examine into profits realized on private investments in shipyards financed principally with Government money?

Answer. I certainly would obtain the information if I were a member of the committee. A letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 21, 1945, based on a letter from the Comptroller General indicates a net profit after negotiation for two Kaiser companies alone on an original investment of $100,000 amounting to almost $27,275,000.

Question. Do you think the committee should ascertain why 100 ships were purchased from the Canadian Government at a cost, I believe, of about $164,000,000 for use in the common war effort?

Answer. I think it should.

As far as I know, no satisfactory answer has ever been furnished by the Commission in this connection.

Question. How about the program of concrete ship construction? Should that be looked into?

Answer. I think the Commission should explain why, contrary apparently to the views of the chairman, it embarked upon and carried through a program of concrete ship construction with little anticipated or actual benefit, at a cost to the people of some $167,000,000.

Question. How about inquiring into the steps taken to safeguard the people in the disposal of surplus shipyards and surplus materials?

Answer. To me this is highly important. There may, of course, be an explanation, but a table recently furnished me by the Maritime Commission shows among other things that the California Shipbuilding Corp. costing the Government something over $25,260,000, disposed of at an added cost to the Government of about $2,500,000. It shows also the St. Johns River Shipbuilding Corp. costing Uncle Sam around $17,000,000, disposed of to the Tampa Shipbuilding Co. at $1,928,000. And it shows the McEvoy Steamboat Co. costing Uncle Sam around $1,333,000, apparently disposed of for the large sum of $10.

Question. Have any officials left the Commission or WSA recently?

Answer. Yes. Mr. R. E. Anderson, former head of the Finance Division of the Commission, and Mr. J. A. Honsick, his assistant, left some months ago, after the publication of the Comptroller General's 1933 audits. I hope the committee will inquire into the reasons for their departure. This might throw a helpful light on the scene.

Question. Are there other matters that you think the committee should go into?

Answer. Well, there are many other matters, including numerous individual transactions, which I hope the committee will ultimately go into but time does not permit reference to them now.

May I just repeat in closing what I have already said in substance. First, that I have never failed to pay tribute to the Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration for their contribution to the war effort. Second, that no war, however damaging, can justify gross waste of the people's money resulting from negligence or otherwise. Third, that I have long believed that the situation has called imperatively for a thoroughgoing, fearless, and impartial investigation, preferably by a select committee of the Senate or House not charged with other duties, to be completed as promptly as possible in fairness to those primarily concerned and to the people as a whole.

Mr. TULLY. Thank you very much, Congressman WIGGLESWORTH.

OPA Dizziness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELLSWORTH B. BUCK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, a mattress manufacturer recently handed me a label from a bolt of printed sheetings. The label reads: "Imported from the United States of America." It had accompanied the bolt of sheetings to Mexico but was reimported to the United States because those sheetings could still sell here for less than the black-market price.

Thus do we suffer under OPA.

Albania's Road Back—To Peace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, elsewhere in the Appendix of today's RECORD, I have inserted a confidential report on Soviet activities in Korea. This should be read in connection with the following dispatch appearing in today's New York Times by Camille M. Cianfarra regarding Albania. This report combined with that from Korea shows a pattern of the aggression which is proceeding all around the globe.

Mr. Speaker, reading these two reports might well cause a thoughtful legislator to query Secretary of State Byrnes' optimistic statement of a few days ago that the world is on the road back to peace.

The dispatch follows:

SOVIET SETS UP COASTAL GUNS AND EQUIPS ALBANIAN ARMY—BUILDS MILITARY ROADS AND FORTIFIES STRATEGIC POSITIONS ON THE ADRIATIC—COUNTRY LIVES UNDER A RED TERROR, WITNESSES REPORT

(By Camille M. Cianfarra)

ROME, July 28.—Albania has become a puppet state of Russia, which during the past 6 months has been fortifying the Island of Saseno, just off the Albanian coast, as well as the Bay of Valona and the port of Durazzo, according to several reports that have reached Rome recently.

Russian military engineers have declared that not only Saseno but areas immediately surrounding Durazzo and Valona are "off limits" so that only persons with special permits are allowed to enter. Permits are issued exclusively to those connected with the fortification work and to trusted officials.

Observers who returned from Tirana earlier this month describe Albania as a 100 percent Communist state, where private enterprise has been thoroughly smashed, the clergy are being annihilated, individual freedom does not exist and militarism is rampant. From the end of 1944 to last June the number of persons jailed by the Moscow-dominated Albanian Government headed by Enver Hoxha is estimated at ten to fifteen thousand, with at least 3,000 either killed or missing, including 12 members of the Catholic clergy.

The reports stress that this is an unusually high number if compared with Albania's total population, which is estimated at about 1,000,000.

One of the many reports given to the writer and described in detail concerns the building, by Russian military engineers, of a road from Kukus, a town northeast of Scutari on the Yugoslav border, to Peshkopeja as a link with the already existing road leading to Koritza, on the Greek border, through Elbasan and Pogradetz. The strategic value of the road becomes obvious when it is recalled that troops could formerly move only along the coastal road that from Tirana leads to Scutari and then veers northeastward to the Yugoslav border.

With the new road troops coming from Yugoslavia could more speedily reach the Greek frontier on an almost straight line and without using the coastal road, which would be exposed to naval bombardment.

The following information is a résumé of several reports that paint one of the darkest pictures of terrorism in any Balkan country. They point out that Valona Bay, protected by a line of fortifications, has the geographical prerequisites for becoming one of the largest naval bases in the Adriatic, and that if the hinterland is properly developed through an efficient communications system, it may eventually give Russia in Albania a valuable outpost in the Mediterranean. The area of Valona Bay is 100 square miles, 6 miles wide and 15 miles long. The water depth ranges from 7 fathoms near the shore to 20 fathoms in the middle of the bay.

In the Durazzo zone the Russians have fortified nearby hills, while a number of Russian military engineers, estimated at 1,000, are directing excavations by Albanian labor battalions.

Coincident with direct fortification work, the Russians have reorganized the Albanian Army, which last June amounted to 50,000 troops and 12,000 officers. This army is being fully equipped, with new uniforms—khaki colored for winter and light linen for summer—automatic rifles, light and medium antitank and antiaircraft guns.

Of Albania's 1945–46 budget, totaling 1,016,000,000 Albanian francs, 600,000,000 were appropriated for military expenditures. This is considered out of all proportion to the national economy, especially it is borne in mind that official statistics set the Albanian currency circulation at 320,000,000 francs.

Small groups of Russian officers have been arriving constantly in Albania, where they have subsequently been joined by their families. At the beginning of this year Albanian authorities ordered the evacuation within 48 hours of the entire district called New Tirana and assigned the houses to the Russians.

A military school was founded at Kamza, a village 8 miles from Tirana, and is now functioning on the premises of the former Albano-American boarding school called Kirias. There young Communists chosen from among those who distinguished themselves in fighting with the Partisans in wartime are being instructed in Soviet military tactics. A number of Russian officers have been placed in key positions in the Albanian Army, as "advisers."

Domestically the Government, composed of extreme Communists, has embarked upon a policy resulting in state control of all fields of human activity. Industry, banking, and commerce have become state monopolies. The measures affect also transportation, all types of shops, restaurants, newspapers, radio, and cinemas. "Agrarian reform" has granted 75 acres to former owners and has distributed the rest among the farmers.

However, the reform is reported unpopular because although the peasants are tilling their own soil they must sell the products to the state at very low prices.

MERCHANTS JAILED FOR TAXES

Private enterprise was strangled by the application of a war-profits tax, which purposely was exceptionally high. In the latter part of 1945, when the offensive against commerce began, small, medium, and large merchants were taxed many millions of francs. Since they were unable to pay, the Government seized the firms and jailed the owners.

To achieve control of private wealth the Government this year decreed "revaluation" of the Albanian franc. Citizens were told that they would receive one new franc for each five old francs. The decree added, however, that no one would be allowed to change more than 5,000 francs; it ordered that any sum over that amount must be deposited in the state bank.

At the same time it arbitrarily set the value of the franc at 5 per gold dollar and 2.77 per paper dollar—which is recognized by Yugoslavia and Russia only.

Albania's gold reserve is at present said to be 2,500,000 gold francs, or 125,000 gold Napoleons.

As everything else, the newspapers are also government controlled. In Tirana there is one daily, the Bashkimi (Unity), which is the official Government organ. In the provinces there are three weeklies and two biweeklies and one monthly magazine, as compared with five dailies, many weeklies, and a dozen magazines before the advent of the Communist Government.

The end of 1945 saw 17 books published, of which 4 contained a systematic presentation of Communist theory, 10 exalted the present regime, its works and achievements, and 3 were on nonpolitical subjects.

Albanian cinemas are exhibiting only Soviet favorable aspects of Russian life under bolshevism. The Tirana radio station is operated by the Government, which has installed loud-speakers in the main squares and streets, which blare forth Communist propaganda all day long.

Simultaneously the Government is pursuing a vigorous policy of dechristianization, which is especially aimed at Catholics. The following members of the clergy were killed:

Lawrence Mitrovigi, Franciscan friar, in the winter of 1942–43.

Mother Superior of the Sisters of Charity at Korca.

Leke Luli, friar, winter of 1944.

Lazardus Shantoja, tortured and shot dead in March 1945.

Andrea Zadeja, in Scutari, on Easter, 1945.

John Fausti, Jesuit.

Daniel Dajani, rector of the Albanian Pontifical College.

John Shilaku, friar, and two clerics of the Pontifical College accused of a plot against the Government, in February, 1946.

Antonio Harapi, Franciscan.

A friar in Lushnja, 1946.

To maintain order the Government uses both the police and the regular army, which is aided by a large number of paid informers. Owing to the efficiency of the system, although several attempts against the Government have been made, none has been successful because spies were able to gain the confidence of the plotters. The most recent movement occurred in Tirana in January of this year when 37 persons were arrested and tried.

Reports say eyewitnesses at the trial marveled at the easiness with which the accused admitted all the charges, and they attributed this behavior to torture.

Unaided by foreign powers, the opposition movement is rapidly dwindling. Terrified by the vast espionage system, the population seldom dares to lend aid, which, if detected, means certain death. The opposition movement was composed of about 1,000 badly equipped and armed men hiding in the mountains in the Mirdizia and Dibra regions. They were divided into small groups, the most important of which was led by Muharrem Bajraktari, former aide to King Zog, who not only revolted against Zog but fought against the Italians and Germans during the war.

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 28, 1946

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JAMES WHEATON MOTT, late a Representative from the State of Oregon

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the death of our colleague, Hon. JAMES WHEATON MOTT, on his sixty-second birthday carried with it a sense of real personal loss to his many friends in the House who held him in such affectionate regard.

JIM MOTT had a long and useful career in the public service of his city, State, and Nation. It included service as city attorney in the city of Astoria from 1920 to 1922. It included subsequent service in the Oregon Legislature for 8 years. It included service as corporation commissioner for the State of Oregon from 1931 to 1932. It included service in the Congress of the United States from 1933 until the day of his death 12 years later.

Serving in the Navy during World War I, he took his position on the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, becoming eventually the highest ranking Republican member of that committee prior to his death.

All of us are familiar with the ability and character which he displayed in this capacity and as a Member of the Congress.

The country has lost a capable, courageous, and forward-looking public servant.

I add my word of tribute, Mr. Speaker, to the memory of an able coworker and good friend whom I shall miss.

Carter Speeds the Limiteds—At 69 This Railroad Signal Towerman Still Loves Roar of Thundering Trains

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article from the Parade section of the Washington Post for July 28 concerning Nick Carter, railroad signal towerman of Hoffmans, N. Y.

CARTER SPEEDS THE LIMITEDS—AT 69, THIS RAILROAD SIGNAL TOWERMAN STILL LOVES ROAR OF THUNDERING TRAINS

Every day famous passenger trains roar past a smoke-dulled red-brick signal tower alongside the railroad tracks not far from Schenectady, N. Y.

Rarely does it occur to any of those who ride the New York Central's Twentieth Century Limited, the Empire State Express, or other crack fliers, that for 11 miles along the Mohawk River their safety and the smooth progress of their trip depend on the knowledge and sure hand of Nick Carter, a small gray-haired man in the dingy signal tower.

Except for Saturday, Nick Carter spends most of his waking hours at switch controls and signal levers of the station at Hoffmans, N. Y. A lifetime of railroad know-how, soon to be rewarded with a pension, is behind every direction he gives to maintenance crews. At 69, his eyes are clear, his hands steady, his step sure—and he still loves trains.

With his wife he lives alone in an eight-room house just 10 minutes' walk from his job. Says Carter, "I wouldn't trade places with anybody."

The safety of thousands of passengers daily rests in the experienced hands of Nick Carter, veteran railroader. During his 8-hour shift as operator at signal station No. 11 on the Mohawk division, he routes a score of important trains through an intricacy of blocks and switches. Checking train orders is one of operator Carter's first tasks of the day. His job is to convey changes in schedule to conductors by block signals, written notes, or by voice. His station is the switch point from the main line into the Selkirk yards, where mile-long freights are made up to carry livestock, oil, fruit, milk, grain—the produce of the Nation. When not occupied with guiding the destinies of the dozens of trains during any day, Nick often directs efforts of signal repair and maintenance men.

Korea's Road Back—to Peace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, Secretary of State Byrnes' optimistic statement a few days ago that we are on "the road back to peace" finds little confirmation in factual reports, either from Europe or from Asia. Whole vast areas formerly open to peaceful travel and trade are being sealed off for the purposes of establishing them fortified bases from which control of adjacent, still open countries can be enforced.

Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD the following report from Korea. Control of northern Korea obviously will serve as a base from which Manchuria can be permanently held in economic and military subjection. Control of Albania shuts off access to the Adriatic Sea from all surface transport.

Mr. Speaker, this report displays the pattern made familiar to us daily during the rise of Axis power in Europe. The immensely widened scope of the old pattern which now stretches in both directions across Eurasia should not conceal its threatening familiarity. For those who may be confused by it, and who sincerely desire to understand the present situation of freedom in the world, a few minutes spent with this report and any adequate world atlas should be a clarifying, and perhaps frightening, experience. For legislators, concerned with the security of the United States, such study should be a paramount duty.

THE KOREAN-AMERICAN COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C., July 12, 1946.

Representative CLARE BOOTHE LUCE,
Greenwich, Conn.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE LUCE: Enclosed herewith you will find specific reports of Soviet looting in northern Korea.

Excised only because of the possibility of retaliation upon themselves or members of their families are the names of the Koreans who, upon personal investigation in Russian occupied territory, have been able to give itemized accounts of the Russian rapine of a defenseless people.

The industrial centers of northeastern Korea, especially Sung-jin (Shojin) and Heung-nam (Hongnam), are the places from which the Russians barred Mr. Edwin W. Pauley, United States Reparations Commissioner. The specific reports enclosed herein cover these iron and chemical centers.

Respectfully submitted.

THE KOREAN-AMERICAN COUNCIL,
J. W. STAGGERS, Secretary.

REPORT NO. 1—EYEWITNESS REPORTS FROM NORTH OF THE THIRTY-EIGHTH PARALLEL (RUSSIAN OCCUPATION ZONE) IN KOREA

(Translated from Korean original)

SIR: We, ———— desire to report to you certain conditions now existing in Northern Korea. We have been employed in the rolling-stock section of the Transportation Bureau of the Railway Department of the District of Ham-heung. We wanted to be of help to the restoration of our motherland, but under the dark and evil motives of the Russians, the plans of the Korean people have vanished like bubbles—not only that—we can see the ominous Russian designs even to suppress our very lives. Our plans for a railway enterprise has now come to naught because the Russians have dealt with us in dishonesty and innumerable lies. Having no recourse for redress in the North we have come to Seoul and met Mr. ————. It is through him that we are addressing you this, our eyewitness report on conditions which we have intimate knowledge of, since we have been working in that very place. If this first-hand report should prove of value in your reference, we shall feel that our efforts have been well repaid.

We, ———— and ————, have worked in the Rolling Stock Section of the Transportation Bureau of the Railway Department of the District of Ham-heung, until March 6, 1946. ———— was in charge of locomotives and coal; ———— in charge of passenger and freight cars and railway shops. Our jobs covered the entire district under the jurisdiction of Ham-heung. Hence, we had the full advantage of personally observing the Soviet activities of removing machinery of heavy industries as well as grains and other foodstuffs from both North Ham-kyung and south Ham-kyung Provinces.

REPORTS

I. Results of investigation made by ————.

1. Coal

After the surrender of the Japanese there were 20,000 tons of coal at North Port of Wonsan, South Ham-kyung Province (for use by Railway Department); 18,000 tons of coal in the Young-Pu Factory, Chung-jin, North Ham-kyung Province; 20,000 tons of coal at the wharf of La-jin, North Ham-kyung Province (for Railway Department use).

By the end of December 1945 the entire stocks of coal at Chung-jin and La-jin were removed to the direction of Vladivostok by Soviet naval vessels. Of the stock of 20,000 tons at Wonsan, 11,000 tons were appropriated by the Soviet military; 4,000 tons were used by the Railway Department, and about 5,000 tons now remain in Wonsan.

At all the important depots throughout this district, the Russian military are only concerned with coal needs of their own use, and pay no attention to the needs of the Korean railway. We had formulated certain plans to alleviate the Korean needs but they came to naught by reason of Russian usurpation. All the coal now mined in North Ham-kyung Province is being removed to Manchuria by the Russians for their own military use.

2. Food

Between November 1, 1945, and March 5, 1946, 3,000 freight cars loaded with foodstuffs were carried toward Russia. Each car holds 30 tons.

3. Machinery from Manchuria

On November 4, 1945, there were 600 cars (each holding 30 tons loaded with machinery) on the wharves of Chung-jin. On January 10, 1946, there were 4,800 cars of machinery on various yards under the jurisdiction of the Ham-heung district. The Russian military commanders issued strictest orders to remove all these materials aboard ships before January 25. This task was accomplished on schedule, by working days and nights. This order was issued by the Russians who expected an American military mission to visit the railway yards of northern Korea.

4. Heavy industries

The equipment of the nitrate factory at Heung-nam, South Ham-kyung Province, was moved away by the Russians:

(a) Thirty stands of manufacturing machinery and one crane from Bon-koong works.

(b) Thirty stands of manufacturing machinery and two cranes from the Yong-sung works.

(c) Forty stands of manufacturing machinery and five cranes from the Heung-nam chemical works.

(d) Five stands of manufacturing machines from the gunpowder plant, Heung-nam (Hongnam).

(e) Thirty stands of manufacturing machinery from the technical school attached to the factory.

(f) Entire equipment of the powder plant in Heung-nam (Hongnam).

(The above were removed by ships.)

5. The Japanese

On February 1, 1946, the Russians issued an order to reemploy the Japanese who were discharged after the Japanese surrender. There are more than 500 of them in the employment of the Ham-heung District alone. On food rations the Soviets allow 4 measures (hap) to the Japs per day while the Koreans get only 2½ measures.

The following is a report by ————.

1. Removal of heavy industry equipment

(a) Steel mills: Nippon Steel Co., Ltd., Chung-jin (Seishin), North Ham-kyung Province: All equipment, including manufacturing machines and tools, raw materials, furnaces, ovens, refinery, chemicals, office equipment down to telephones, tables and chairs, and everything movable in the factory. These were removed by the Soviets toward Russia aboard ships from Chung-jin (Seishin). From September 1, 1945, to November 15, 1945, daily employing 20 freight cars each holding 30 tons, the Russians removed them from the factory to the port, thence to Russia.

(b) Textile mills: Nippon Textile Co., Ltd., Chung-jin (Seishin): All materials, including raw materials, chemicals, soda, manufacturing machines, tools, looms, steel, and everything movable in offices. These were removed to the wharves of Chung-jin by the Russians between September 1 and November 20, 1945, and thence aboard freighters to Russia. At present only the buildings remain.

(c) Electric smelting company: Dai Nippon High Frequency Electric Smelting Co., Ltd., Sung-jin (Joshin), North Ham-kyung Province: The entire equipment, including manufacturing machinery, tools, all electrical equipment for making steel, iron and steel raw materials, chemicals, and everything in the offices, were removed by boats toward Russia between September 10 and the end of October 1945 and only the buildings remain.

I have seen with my own eyes the Soviets removing by trains all the materials from the above-mentioned three factories on September 10, October 1, and from November 4 to November 15, 1945, and I have inspected the empty factories thereafter. I have had the opportunity to observe these facts on the occasion of my visits to Chung-jin on my official business on railway rolling stock. The strangest thing about it is that on November 1, 1945, the highest Soviet commander in northern Korea issued an order demanding resumption of operations in those very factories.

2. The over-all present condition of the railways

During the war the Japanese have used the roads and rolling stock without any repairs, hence they were left in an extremely poor condition. When the Russian Army came in, it has been forcing the employees at the point of bayonets to operate the railway without any repairs and under extremely confused and haphazard circumstances right up to the present moment. So the railways will be entirely unable to move very shortly.

At the two great railway shops in Wonsan and Chung-jin, the Soviet military allowed only those rolling stacks needed by their own use to get some repair, and at the same time deliberately prevented any repairs on those for the use of the Korean people. On January 1 and January 20, 1946, the Soviet Military issued orders to the effect that the Koreans may make plans to use railway trains. However, as soon as the Koreans got the rolling stock and coal prepared and ready, the Russian military immediately took them away for their own use and that was the end of that.

Every since the Japanese surrender up to the present, there was not a single day when the Koreans could use their railway trains for themselves. All their equipment has been taken away by the Russian military. The only Koreans who rode any trains did so atop the roofs of cars used by the Soviet soldiers. Because of disrepair, no train will be in condition to move within the next few months.

At present there are 340 locomotives, 230 passenger cars, and 6,000 freight cars left in northern Korea. Of these, only one-third of the locomotives are running, but even among these not one is in good condition. All the passenger cars are in unusable condition. Only about 1,000 freight cars are serviceable. So long as the railway is under the Russian military control, its future looks black.

3. Military display

Since the latter part of October the Soviet Army has been increasing the number of its troops daily. The officers and men of the Russian Army bring their families, take the homes of the Korean people as well as government and public buildings, and live in them. In Ham-heung alone they occupy more than 2,000 of the people's homes.

In Chung-jin they display 17 antiaircraft guns, and there are innumerable cannon, machine guns, and tanks. They hold battle maneuvers every day. They dig caves under mountains where they hide their artillery. In Ham-heung they display more than 70 big field artillery pieces. In Chul-wen and Chun-kok districts their cavalry and infantry troops carry on mock battles daily. All these behaviors are arousing misgivings in the minds of the Korean people.

Americanism Versus Communism

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, the bigwigs of the Republican Party in the city of New York certainly find themselves in a sad predicament. After the press announced about 10 days ago that seven leading Republican citizens had written their county chairman urging strong congressional candidates, a number of substitutions in place of regular and respectable Republican Party designees were made. In the Twelfth Congressional District one Vincent J. Longhi, the candidate of the Communist-controlled Brooklyn American Labor Party was substituted in place of a decent Republican Party member and resident of long standing, James L. Mulhearn. This substitution, according to the newspapers, received the approval of Republican citizens William M. Chadbourne, Roger W. Straus, and Samuel Seabury.

Now we find that the Communists in control of the Brooklyn American Labor Party really put one over on the Republican organization when, at the expense of a deal for a judicial nomination in order to defeat my good friend and fellow Democrat, Anthony J. Di Giovanna, they succeeded in obtaining the Republican congressional designation for their imported American Labor Party member who has never voted in Brooklyn in his lifetime.

The aforementioned American Laborite Longhi disregards the truth when he claims to have had a furnished room in our district for the past 6 months with some members of the American Labor Party. His statement on registration filed at the board of elections in Brooklyn on July 13, 1946, alleges this and shows he was previously an American Laborite from the Bronx. He has had an address in Queens. It is interesting to learn that the Communist Party nominating petition filed in 1942, with the secretary of state in Albany, No. 11018, contained the name Vincent J. Longhi, of New York City.

I am reliably informed that my opponent Vincent J. Longhi, who claims to be a war veteran, has no right to make such claim since he was not in the armed forces during the war. The Republican Party certainly must have been in a dilemma to resort to handing over their designation to a Communist-dominated American Labor Party importation who has had three addresses in three different boroughs in the past 3 years.

The same procedure was followed at the same time in the twenty-fourth assembly district in Brooklyn. The American Labor Party candidate, one Samuel Kaplan, received the Republican designation for member of assembly by being substituted for the regular Republican designee, Herbert L. Maltinsky. It now turns out by his own admissions quoted in yesterday's New York Times that the Communist-dominated ALP man Kaplan enrolled as a Communist Party member in 1934, 1935, and 1936 and could not have so enrolled since, because the Communists lost their party status in the year 1936.

I have been a member of the Democratic Party since my first vote. I have always respected members of the Republican Party and also decent American anti-Communist members of the Labor Party. To deceive the Republicans or any group of citizens or voters is, it seems to me, a direct insult to them.

The Red Fascists hope to purge me from Congress because I have vigorously spoken against them here in the well of the House and at many public gatherings. My sin is that I have often expressed my contempt for communism, the greatest threat to our American way of life. I have been attacked and vilified by the Daily Worker. But I am confident that the hard-working, intelligent American citizens whom I represent in Congress do not want and will not tolerate communistic interference in our district.

I was born and reared in the district I represent and I have consistently fought for and supported organized labor. I have strenuously protected labor's hard-won rights as a member of the Committee on Appropriations as well as on the floor of this House. I have unswervingly fought for and supported every single piece of legislation for the benefit of our war veterans. I have voted and spoken for every measure for the social and economic betterment of our people which came before us in my time in the Seventy-eighth and Seventy-ninth Congresses. My record will prove these statements.

I not only voted against but debated against the infamous Case antilabor bill and voted to sustain the President when he vetoed it. I led the fight both on the House floor and as a member of the Senate-House conferees against the vicious antilabor Elliott rider which sought to destroy the right of collective bargaining to about a million workers in food processing plants throughout the country. I fought for and supported legislation which increased salaries of post-office employees as well as for the Federal Employees Pay Act of 1946.

I voted for appropriations for veterans' housing and have consistently advocated prompt construction of low-rent housing projects. I voted for payment of the enlisted men's terminal leave pay in cash. I voted against the poll tax and have continually supported antilynching legislation and continuance of the Fair Employment Practice Committee. I was a cosponsor of the full employment legislation as originally introduced and advocated adequate unemployment compensation for all employees including Federal and merchant marine. I have never failed to aid the civil-service employees and have made every effort to secure enactment of minimum-wage legislation. I introduced a resolution providing for full and complete study and investigation of the operation of the court-martial systems of the Army and Navy during World War II. I introduced a resolution setting up a committee to make a full and complete investigation and study of the sale and disposition of Government surplus property to war veterans and was appointed by the Speaker of the House to serve on the present Select Committee To Investigate Disposition of Surplus Property. I have consistently advocated unlimited Jewish immigration into Palestine with the eventual establishment there of a Jewish national home and have vigorously protested the autocratic attitude of the British Government in regard thereto. Only this morning I visited the White House with a number of colleagues and spoke with the President on this subject. I have advocated a just peace for Italy and have petitioned the Secretary of State in behalf of such peace. I have been commended by the Committee for a Just Peace With Italy for the active part I played in cooperating with them.

After 7 years in public life, first as assistant district attorney of Kings County under Mayor William O'Dwyer and since I came to Washington as a Member of Congress, my record is an open book. What about Mr. Longhi's? Who is he? Where does he come from? I'll have more to say about these things later.

I am confident that the voters of the Twelfth Congressional District will on election day make their decision on the basis of Americanism against communism and let the Communists know where they stand in the part of Brooklyn I have the honor to represent.

Wartime Railroad Profits

REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. HOOK
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Senate Mead committee to investigate the scandalous wartime profits of the railroads. The railroads' colossal swindle of public funds will make the Garsson case look like chicken feed.

The railroads are owned by a handful of antilabor and greedy banks. They had a field day during the war with the United States Government as their biggest customer. Every school child knows that increased production of anything cuts down the unit cost. During the war, the railroads carried capacity loads. They just could not carry any more. Obviously, their costs were reduced, but the rates were never lowered. The Mead committee should make public the amount of business the railroads did with the Government and the net profit on this business.

There is something wrong with the railroad management. It is either downright crooked or so inefficient that its present leadership should be kicked out. In 1944, the railroads did a gross business of $9,500,000,000, on which they realized a net profit of almost $700,000,000. In 1945, the railroads did a gross business of $9,000,000,000 on which the net income was $450,000,000, after payment of taxes and fixed charges.

Despite all this, the railroads are still crying the blues and over 30 percent of railroad mileage is bankrupt. The railroads now have the gall to ask for a flat 25-percent increase in their rates, a request pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This request, like almost everything else the railroads do, is a phony appeal. The railroads want a new rate based on $28,000,000,000, which is their figure of the real worth of the roads. The ICC says the railroads are not worth more than $19,000,000,000, so that even here we have the railroads trying to swindle the public out of more money.

The Mead committee has been directed to investigate war profits. It should look into the railroads' wartime practice of siphoning off the financial cream into Wall Street channels and leaving the skim milk for labor. The big boys get theirs first, of course. They get fancy salaries, expense accounts, and bonuses before a thought is given to the worker.

The Mead committee should summon forthwith all of the top leaders of railroads and make them testify under oath to just exactly how much they spent in entertainment of Government officials and in propaganda to beat down the just cause of labor. The expense accounts of these people should be made a matter of public record since they were spending public funds during the war.

The Mead committee should examine every phase of the railroad strike of last May. The committee would unearth one of the most shocking chapters in American history. It would unfold a lurid tale of double dealing and sinister back-door tactics. Witnesses should be forced under oath to tell how much blood money they spent in antilabor propaganda. We know that for a period before the war, the railroads spent almost $200,000,000 in propaganda. During the war they spent millions of dollars made on Government contracts in bragging about their fake patriotism at the same time denouncing the unions that were looking for the crumbs that fell from the Wall Street tables.

Mind you, this was excess-profits tax money that the railroads were spending and as such they must be held accountable to the public.

The railroads had been trying for a long time to crush the unions. They almost did in May when they attacked Mr. A. F. Whitney and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. Wall Street sent out word to "get Whitney." They had been trying for years to get rid of this courageous champion of the underdog. He stood in their way. He would not yield to their pressure. As it developed, the railroad vilification of Mr. Whitney backfired. Instead of destroying him, they created a new symbol of justice and a rallying point for those who believe in decency and honest dealing.

The railroad issue was misrepresented to President Truman. Some one close to him or a railroad magnate, using back-door tactics to get into the White House, did not tell the President the truth. They made the President a pawn on the Wall Street chessboard. The Mead committee should make public the name of the person or persons who engineered this deal for the railroads. The Mead committee should make public the amount of war profits spent in Washington during that crisis. The committee further should find out who it was that advised the President in drafting the unfortunate message in which he asked Congress to make slaves out of American workers. Certainly the President did not think that one up himself. He is not that type of man and his thinking does not run along those lines. I am happy that he has redeemed himself by vetoing the Case bill.

The President did not tell the public the facts in the railroad strike for the simple reason that the issue was misrepresented to him. Powerful railroad interests double-crossed the President. His message to Congress and his public denunciation of Mr. Whitney sound like they were written in a smoke-filled hotel room by a group of well-fed railroad presidents.

The public has been led to believe that the strike was caused by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. It most certainly was not. It was caused by the stubborn and selfish position taken by the railroads, who spend millions of dollars on propaganda and balk at expenditures of $50,000 for new safety devices.

The railroad propagandists knew that they would strike a popular chord in blaming the strike on Mr. Whitney. That was a popular attack in those days of national hysteria. But now that the industrial storm has cleared, the true facts are coming to light. We know now that there will be some fancy squirming when railroad witnesses appear before the Mead committee.

The railroads are tied in with powerful propaganda outlets of newspapers and radio stations. They use these outlets for their own gain and for the public attacks on Mr. Whitney. George E. Sokolsky, the notorious labor baiter, recently attacked Mr. Whitney. So did the Cleveland Plain Dealer in a series of antilabor articles.

Other examples of such attacks on the good name and character of Mr. Whitney are too numerous to relate. The Cleveland Plain Dealer reported that Mr. Whitney was too big for the country and that he is a dangerous element. The articles left the implication that Mr. Whitney's wings should be clipped.

Yes, somebody's wings should be clipped and an investigation by the Mead committee will show that the fake set of angel wings fluttering about on the shoulders of railroad leaders should be singed and clipped.

The Mead committee could recapture many millions of dollars of unjustifiable profits by railroads in wartime and thus reduce the national debt by a considerable amount. I hope that this colossal swindle will be exposed and once and for all put an end to the railroad magnates' fake operations.

While railroad financiers were spending Government money in lavish entertainment, scores of members of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen were being maimed and killed because the railroads refused to install safety devices that might have cut down on their profits. Members of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen occupied the unique position of paying taxes which trickled into railroad coffers and then were used for full-page newspaper advertising, telling the public how patriotic the railroads were and how awful the unions were in trying to get only a fair share of this gigantic income for a decent living. The railroads should never have been allowed to spend this money on advertising and the Mead committee should force them to return these funds to the Treasury.

The Mead committee also should force the return of funds spent by the railroads in their smear campaign against Mr. Whitney and his Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. This shameful pillorying of Mr. Whitney should be stopped. Mr. Whitney has done more for his country and for his men than all of the railroad presidents put together.

Realistic Thinking on the Labor Front

REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, there is welcome evidence of some realistic thinking on the labor front.

A few days ago I was pleased to call to your attention a statement by Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. The message from Mr. Green is basic and fundamental and deserves repetition. He said:

Our major need is increased volume of production. Our safety lies in getting through this period of transition with no major increases in costs or stoppages of production. Major changes will be cumulative in effect and may start the chain of dangerous inflation. Wage earners can best stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production which can wipe out the scarcities and the danger of runaway inflation.

Now, we have good news from another great labor organization. Mr. Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers, has invited heads of the automobile industry to join union representatives in a conference on how to increase automobile production, voicing his deep concern that automobile output is only 40 to 50 percent of the 1941 rate.

If labor will follow through on this indicated program all along the line, we will begin to go places.

The United Automobile Workers, in line with new CIO policy, has abandoned any thought of new wage increases in favor of an all-out effort to preserve the present purchasing power of the dollar, it is reported.

Purchasing power can be stabilized only by increasing the production to the point where supply meets market demand. Wages seldom, if ever, keep pace with an upward price spiral, and wage increases defeat their own ends in a scarcity market by increasing the number of dollars bidding for the same limited products.

The inability of the automobile industry to satisfy demands for new cars is an important contributing factor to the present inflationary trend. If labor and management can solve this problem through cooperative action, a long step will have been taken toward stabilization of both prices and wages, for the two are interdependent.

It appears now that labor is supplying the leadership so sadly lacking in the national administration, and is pointing the way to successfully combating inflation and high prices. Full production is the one sure means of combating inflation and high prices, and it seems this fact is recognized by everyone except the spokesmen and the control manipulators of this administration.

Admission of Jewish Refugees into Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, on Monday, July 15, I was visited here in Washington by a delegation of Jewish veterans from my State of New Jersey who are deeply concerned over the present situation in Palestine, and the problem of admitting into Palestine the 100,000 Jewish refugees as recommended by President Truman.

I ask unanimous consent to publish in the Appendix of the RECORD the brief remarks I made to this earnest sincere group of our New Jersey citizens on this subject.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Jewish War Veterans from New Jersey: It is an inspiring thing for me to meet with a group such as yours, engaged in a human endeavor in which you all so heartily believe. You are entitled to come here to make your plea. None deserve that right more. You have served your country nobly. You have taken your place among other Americans of all races, creeds, and colors, willing to make the supreme sacrifice, that the principles and ideals for which this great Nation of ours stands, may endure.

The Jews have played a glorious role in our military history since the birth of the Nation. Haym Salomon dedicated his entire fortune to the young Republic, and many Jews served with distinction in the Colonial Army. Commodore Uriah P. Levy following the War of 1812 succeeded in effecting the abolition of bodily punishment in the United States Navy. Ten thousand Jews fought on both sides in the Civil War and seven earned the Congressional Medal of Honor. Fifteen Jews were on the ill-fated Maine when she was sunk.

In the first World War you represented a phalanx 250,000 strong, representing 5 percent of the total fighting forces. While Jewry represented but 3½ percent of the total population, more than 6 percent of Jews served in the military forces. One thousand and one hundred Jews were cited for valor in action. We of New Jersey are proud of the two Congressional Medals of Honor earned by Benjamin Kaufman, of Trenton, and William Sawelson, of Kearny.

And then in the recent war, Americans of Jewish faith again proved their patriotism and great devotion to our beloved country. About 600,000 of you saw service in World War II, of which there were 35,000 casualties. You served with honor, on land, on sea, under the sea, and in the air. The names of Gen. Maurice Rose, Admiral Ben Moreell, Sgt. Meyer Levin, Sgt. Barney Ross, Hymie Epstein, and scores of others will live forever in the archives of our Government.

And now you have come to Washington to ask us who have the responsibility of government to help you to save the remnant of the Jewish people who today are homeless and outcasts in the world—people without a country. You are asking merely that they be given the opportunity to live again, that they may be partners with you in carrying on your great spiritual traditions. You have earned the right to demand, in our day and age, for the God-given right of all human beings to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Of course, we respond. We are deeply moved by the entire righteousness of your cause, and your deep sincerity.

The greatest sufferers in the late holocaust were the Jews. The greatest tragedy in all history was the wholesale and brutal massacre of 6,000,000 Jews throughout Europe during the recent war. Now with the war over, we find further tragedy threatening the meager remnant of these people; namely, the homelessness of hundreds of thousands who have been rescued and gathered together in different parts of Europe in temporary camps until their fates are determined. They have no homes to return to; they have been led to believe that homes would be found for them in Palestine, and now these hopes have been dashed.

I have consistently supported President Truman's recommendation of many months ago that at least 100,000 of these dispossessed Jews be admitted immediately into Palestine in the spirit of the Balfour declaration and under the terms of the British mandate. President Truman's recommendation has only recently been reinforced by the report of the joint British-American Commission, and today a special committee of the President is in London trying to work out ways and means for accomplishing this objective.

I have personally seen the President on three different occasions in this connection, and tried to rush the transfer of the 100,000 Jews to Palestine. I have tried to keep in touch with every step that has been taken to work out the difficult situation presented. I believe that real progress is being made, that we will have an answer to this immediate emergency in the near future, but we must hasten the consummation.

As I have said to my Jewish friends on previous occasions, I believe that for the longer look ahead the difficult question presented by the Palestine situation must be a matter to be considered by the United Nations, and probably it will be the wise course to transfer the British mandate to a United Nations trusteeship. If that action is taken, then of course the United States will accept its share of responsibility for the proper administration of the trusteeship.

It is my further hope that not only the problem of this group of 100,000, but that the problem also of all the other displaced persons in Europe may be promptly solved. It has seemed to me for some time that the United Nations between them should be willing to accept fair quotas of these people, in which the United States should share, to the end that they may find their new homes and may start life again.

What we need today is intelligent and understanding cooperation. We must do all that we can to unite rather than divide at this time of intense strain and suspicion.

It is my sincere hope and prayer that the one God—the Jehovah of your forefathers—the God of my forefathers—will show us together the way not only to solve this problem, but also to bring peace on earth and good will to all mankind.

Commercial Air Transport Companies

REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a resolution calling for an investigation by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the operations of commercial air transport companies and the regulation of them by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

I have been constrained to do this because of complaints that I have received from my constituents, indicating lack of efficient and courteous service by the air lines in my section of the country. They have reported exasperating experiences that indicate the possibility of black-market activities in the sale of seat space on the planes.

Several personal experiences of my own have corroborated that which others have reported to me. In fact, all of my air trips to and from Maine during the past year have been marked with the disagreeable necessity of having to fight for seats at originating and transfer points—seats that have been reserved and confirmed for many days in advance of the trips. The principal offenders have been American Airlines and Northeast Airlines.

Because this is a period of the expansion of air service and the granting of certificates for new routes, particularly feeder lines, by the Civil Aeronautics Board to air lines, I sincerely feel that these conditions should be thoroughly investigated. I have already pointed out to the CAB that such conditions should be investigated and considered in determining whether certificates on new routes should be granted to those air-line companies about which complaints of inefficient and discourteous service have been made—and which are applying for new routes.

Fundamental to the granting of a certificate of convenience and necessity, an air-line company must prove that it is ready, willing, and able to render safe, efficient, and courteous service to the public. If it cannot, or will not, then the application for the certificate should be denied or the certificate should be revoked.

Obviously, inefficiency and lack of courtesy by a company over an existing route should have a bearing on, first, whether that company's certificate over the existing route should be retained or revoked; second, whether another company should be granted in lieu of or in competition with, a certificate over the same route and a chance to render the desired efficiency and courtesy in service to the public; and third, whether companies or certificate holders, guilty of inefficiency and discourtesy, should be granted the right to operate over new additional routes for which they have applied.

There are indications of the need for new blood in the commercial air-transport field, presently dominated by quasi monopolies. Perhaps our air veterans of World War I and II should be given the chance to break these quasi monopolies and render the efficient and courteous service that the public is entitled to.

The CAB has failed to report action in this matter after being given a reasonable time within which to act. Consequently, I believe it is the duty of Congress to act where the administrative-executive body has failed and to investigate and study this matter of vital concern to the public in the age of air transportation.

In absence of satisfactory action by either the air lines or the CAB in the period intervening between the adjournment of this Congress and the convening of the Eightieth Congress, I shall reintroduce this resolution and push for action by the new Congress.

Address by Senator Guffey Before Political Gathering in Harrisburg, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I made recently before a political gathering in Harrisburg, Pa.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEST WE FORGET

Now, 14 years since that fateful year when the American people rose and created the New Deal with the aid of the Democratic Party, under the leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, it seems fit that we should recall to ourselves and the country the meaning of that great political action.

The Wall Street panic and the Hoover depression were the result of national failure to control speculation and to manage our foreign trade and investments with elementary common sense. The result was the greatest mass unemployment in our history, the greatest disaster to the farmers in our history, the greatest failure of the banking system in our history. We faced starvation in the midst of plenty, despair and frustration in what should have been a land of hope and glory. Our business system had failed, our savings were destroyed, and Government was paralyzed. We were closer to a social revolution in 1932 than at any time since the Constitution was adopted and there was no man wise enough to foresee that, within a few short years, thanks to the New Deal, the American people would have raised themselves to an unparalleled height of power and prosperity.

Let us not forget how it was that we dealt with that crisis.

Let us not forget that the New Deal was, above all, a national movement, so much so that in 1936 only two States in the Union—Maine and Vermont—failed to cast their electoral votes for President Roosevelt. It was a political coalition of the farmers, particularly those of the South and West, with the miners and the industrial workers of the North and East. Its point of view was national, not sectional, and there are men in Congress today who enjoy the power and privileges of committee chairmanships as a result of the same labor, liberal, and New Deal votes which they now deride and repudiate.

Let us not forget that the New Deal checked unemployment and laid it down as a national policy that no American should starve in this bounteous land. Through the FERA, WPA, the CCC, the NYA, PWA, and other measures of emergency relief, the unemployed were given useful work at fair wages and the whole Nation benefited from their achievements. Schools, parks, and playgrounds were but a few of these and there is not a county in the United States which is not today the richer.

Labor benefited directly through both relief and reemployment measures. Let us not forget that it was through the NIRA, the National Labor Relations Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Social Security Act, the Bituminous Coal Act, and other national measures that, for the first time in our history, collective bargaining became the rule rather than the exception in industrial relations. Today it is charged that labor has abused its rights. Perhaps certain sections of organized labor have done so. They will learn better, but let us not forget that it is sounder business policy to have satisfied laboring people even with some leaders occasionally "rambunctious" and unreasonable than to have the Nation's workers cut off as a market for business by sweatshop wages. And the war showed us that it is sounder national policy to have labor strong and productive than, as was the case in France before Germany struck, sullen and disaffected.

Let us not forget that the New Deal saved the farmer. The drop in farm prices was checked and parity became the established national policy. Salt tears were shed over the killing of little pigs in the summer of 1933 from eyes that had remained dry as Death Valley when farmers were evicted and foreclosed and when it cost more to harvest crops than the crops themselves brought in the market. Let us not forget the AAA, the Soil Erosion Act, the Farm Security Act, the Tenant Farmers Act, and the numerous credit and administrative measures which ended anarchy on the farm so completely that within 4 years the prairie farmers were rid of their bankrupt days, paying off their mortgages, and soon, unmindful of former misfortunes, returned to the Republican Party which had caused them. However, let those farmers not forget that it was the buying power of labor, as measured by industrial pay rolls, which ever since has sustained the farmers' income and underwritten his welfare and security.

Let us not forget that, despite its unwarranted opposition, American business and industry benefited mightily as a result of these and other measures. The closing of the banks was followed by a much-needed reconstruction of banking, insurance of deposits, financing by the Government of housing and construction, policing of the securities markets, the reformation of the holding companies system of private utilities, and the elimination of unfair competition. Business moaned but the profits of business rose astronomically. Let us not forget that the New Deal was good business for big business as well as for the farmer and for labor, and for small business. In fact, everyone prospered.

Let us not forget the great measures of national reconstruction and development which prepared us vitally for the ordeal of war. The Government-generated power in the Tennessee Valley and at Boulder Dam, at Bonneville and Grand Coulee, made possible not only the great war-munitions output but also the atomic bomb.

Let us not forget that the foreign policies of the New Deal—the good-neighbor policy in Latin America and the grant of independence to the Philippines in particular—laid the basis of our success in keeping the war out of the Western Hemisphere and in driving Japan out of Southeast Asia. Let us not forget the reciprocal trading agreement by which we gave the greater part of the world a stake in our welfare and received access to the world's wealth, constituting the great economic guaranty of our survival in the war.

Above all, Mr. President, let us not forget the moral and spiritual values which lay behind the entire New Deal and its national measures. In the early years, it was customary for many conservatives to bewail the undermining of our moral stamina and the loss of individual initiative due, as they believed, to so-called New Deal paternalism and regimentation. These prophets of doom got their answers: in north Africa, on Guadalcanal, at Cassino, Salerno, and Anzio, on Okinawa and Iwo Jima, on the beaches of Normandy and in the Battle of the Bulge. They got their answer, too, from American labor which turned out mountains of munitions for every battle, every front, every beachhead, every ally in a world-wide war.

Let the people not forget the years of Republican indifference to the farmer, the laborer and small businessman from 1920-1932.

Let them remember the 14 years of Democratic reestablishment of the common good which will continue and increase only under the Democratic leadership.

Federation of Major Groups Interested in Voluntary Health Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH H. BALL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD portions of a series of eight articles written by Mr. Selig Greenberg for the Evening Bulletin of Providence, and an editorial appearing in the same newspaper on the subject of voluntary health funds.

In preparation for these articles Mr. Greenberg interviewed officials of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis and the American Cancer Society as well as many authorities in the fields of philanthrophy, medicine, public health, and public welfare.

Mr. Greenberg's report is designed to focus attention upon the need for a federation of the major groups interested in voluntary health agency programs to be organized much the same as the National War Fund and Community Chests which, during the war, conducted one campaign for contributions to be used by a variety of local civic as well as various war-relief groups and the USO.

The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis, the largest of the voluntary health agencies, raised $16,200,000 during its 1945 campaign, and has now a $30,000,000 reserve it has been unable to spend. Yet all voluntary agencies treating and conducting research on heart ailments cannot collect more than $100,000 annually to combat this principal cause of deaths in the United States. Diabetes and cancer societies are similarly without adequate funds for meeting the requirements of the great number of people who annually suffer or die from these diseases.

The suggestion is made that one contribution to one health fund campaign and the allocation of funds thus collected to various agencies in amounts proportionate to the incidence and the need for research in prevention and treatment of the various diseases would bring about a more equitable distribution of financial assistance to voluntary agencies and would better serve the health needs of the country. This would correct the present condition under which the Paralysis Foundation has $130 to spend on each case of polio when the incidence—not deaths—of polio is exceeded annually 45 times by deaths from heart disease, 20 times by deaths from cancer, 14 times by deaths from cerebral hemorrhage, 11 times by deaths from kidney disorders, 7 times by deaths from pneumonia, 6 by deaths from tuberculosis, and 4 by deaths from diabetes.

In 1945 voluntary funds for tuberculosis cases amounted to about $22 per case, for cancer about $5.70, for diabetes $0.05, and for heart diseases $0.03.

The articles further point out that fund raising and administrative expenses would be reduced were a single group to be assigned the collection and allocation of all funds, thereby freeing more money for research and treatment.

At no time is the idea expressed in these articles that a Government directive was needed to bring about the unification of all these agencies. Rather it is hoped agency governing boards and better-informed donors will create a popular sentiment for the proposed federation.

Mr. President, I have had an estimate made of the cost of printing this matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The estimate of cost is $450.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin, of April 25, 1946]

(By Selig Greenberg)

While most voluntary agencies fighting disease have been starved for funds, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis has raised $62,505,099.80 since its founding in 1938 but has been unable to spend much more than half of this sum.

The principal reason for the foundation's failure to spend a larger share of its income is simple.

Poliomyelitis stands in fifty-second place by mortality in the list of diseases in the United States and is also far down in the list on the basis of incidence. Although crippling caused by polio often entails expensive treatment and care, there are not enough cases to require the spending of such large sums as have been collected by the foundation through the most highly dramatized and successful fund-raising venture ever devised in the health field in this country.

Even though a large proportion of the funds raised through the annual March of Dimes in January goes for research and education, the foundation has been able to spend only 51.7 percent of the money it has collected up to now.

But at the same time that the Infantile Paralysis Foundation was obtaining far more money than it knows what to do with, organizations devoted to combating heart disease, cancer, diabetes, and other mass killers have been forced to get along with far less money than they should have for their vitally urgent tasks.

These and many other facts about the present lack of balance in the voluntary health work field in the United States and about the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis as the outstanding example of the existing disparity between need and resources are brought to light in a survey made by the Providence Journal-Bulletin.

The facts and conclusions brought out in this article all apply to the national foundation, which has no direct connection with the Rhode Island Infantile Paralysis Foundation.

More than 20 nationally prominent authorities in the fields of medicine, public health, public welfare, and philanthropy were interviewed by this Journal-Bulletin reporter in New York, Washington, and New Haven and extensive statistical data was obtained from the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis, the American Cancer Society, the United States Public Health Service, and the United States Children's Bureau. Also utilized in the survey were the findings of a recently published 3-year study of voluntary health agencies in this country made by Selskar M. Gunn and Dr. Philip S. Platt and financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.

Virtually all of those consulted with the exception of officials of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation agreed that the foundation's huge and steadily growing reserve was entirely out of proportion when considered in relation to the meager funds with which other—and far more important health agencies—have had to get along.

The facts in the situation speak eloquently for themselves. Here are a few of them:

The Infantile Paralysis Foundation last year had a net income of $16,242,553. Not only did it collect more money than any other voluntary health agency in the United States but it raised in 1945 more than one-third of all the funds contributed to national voluntary health agencies in this country and more than all of the other agencies, except the National Tuberculosis Association, put together.

And yet, according to official Government statistics, there was an average of only 8,662 polio cases a year in the United States during the 1930–44 period and the disease caused an average of 1,017 deaths a year during this time. Only a small proportion of those stricken by polio are permanently crippled. According to the Infantile Paralysis Foundation's own figures, which are questioned in other quarters, there are now about 125,000 persons in this country requiring some form of medical care for disability resulting from polio.

This means that, even on the basis of the foundation's figures, it raised last year nearly $130 per case.

In sharp contrast with the more than $62,000,000 collected since 1938 by the Infantile Paralysis Foundation is the record of the American Cancer Society, which in the same period took in a total of $6,266,000. In 1945, its most successful year to date, the American Cancer Society raised $4,025,000.

CANCER KILLS ONE OUT OF EIGHT

Cancer is estimated to have killed 172,700 persons in this country last year. Out of every eight Americans who die, one dies of cancer. According to the most conservative estimates, there are now at least 700,000 cancer cases in this country.

In 1945, when its collections were nearly five times its previous year's income, the American Cancer Society thus raised $5.70 per case.

Next to the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, the National Tuberculosis Association is better off financially than any other voluntary health agency, thanks to its extremely successful annual Christmas Seal sale. Last year it raised $15,000,000. There are about 680,000 persons affected by tuberculosis in this country. The amount collected per case is therefore about $22.

Nowhere as well off are sufferers from diabetes. This disease now kills about 34,000 persons a year in the United States, and it is estimated that there are 660,000 diabetic cases. But all the voluntary agencies fighting diabetes have a total of only $30,000 a year to spend on this vital job. This is less than 5 cents per case.

HEART DISEASE HEADS LIST

Even worse off is the fight against heart disease, the No. 1 killer in this country. In 1942, the last year for which complete figures are available, 394,915 persons died of heart disease in the United States. This was more than 28 percent of all deaths. It is estimated that there are now more than 3,700,000 Americans suffering from heart disease. And yet the American Heart Association was able to raise only $28,776 in 1944. All voluntary agencies fighting heart disease now manage to collect a total of about $100,000 a year, which is less than 3 cents per case.

Some of the reasons for this glaring disproportion in the voluntary health work field—a lack of balance in which an agency's success in raising money obviously depends on its promotional capacity rather than the relative importance of its work—will be discussed in succeeding articles of this series. So will various authoritative proposals for remedying the situation. Also to be taken up in detail will be other aspects of the operation of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, aside from its phenomenal success in raising more money than it can usefully spend.

The foundation has 2,714 local chapters throughout the country, a ratio of a local chapter per approximately each 3.2 new patients at the 1930–44 rate of incidence of polio. Such a ratio of local chapters not only causes excessive supervisory expense but militates against a proper level of responsible and effective operation.

So sprawling and unwieldy is the organization scattered in the field that, according to the foundation's own admission, it did not know until recently what the expenditures and assets of its chapters were and has only recently undertaken to enforce submission of audited accounts by each chapter. Even now there are still sizable gaps in the information which the foundation is able to supply about the financial condition of its chapters.

FIGURES INCOMPLETE

Although Louis C. Haughey, assistant treasurer and comptroller of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, furnished me at a lengthy session in New York with what he said were the latest available figures, any review of the finances of the foundation and its chapters that can now be obtained is still not as complete as could be desired. Furthermore, as the foundation's current fiscal year does not end until May 31, 1946, expenditures since June 1, 1945, must be surmised on the basis of the past year's costs. But the survey of the foundation's finances which appears below is nevertheless the most complete which, to this newspaper's knowledge, has as yet appeared in print.

According to Mr. Haughey, the foundation and its chapters raised a net of $42,879,722.59 from the time of the organization's founding in 1938 through the 1945 March of Dimes. He explains that by net he means the amount split between the foundation and its local chapters—roughly speaking on a 50–50 basis—after fund-raising expenses of 7.4 percent had been deducted. When this fund-raising cost of 7.4 percent is computed and added to the net, it makes a gross total of $46,306,395.80 collected through 1945.

Foundation officials estimate that about $15,000,000 was raised in the January 1946 March of Dimes. This is presumably net. When the fund-raising cost of 7.4 percent is added to this year's estimated net income, it makes an estimated gross of $16,198,704.

The gross grand total collected by the foundation to date is thus $62,505,099.80. Of this, $4,625,377.21 represents fund-raising costs, leaving net collections of $57,879,722.59.

Of the net of $42,879,722.59 raised through last year, $21,727,434.51 went to the foundation, leaving $21,152,288.08 to the local chapters. The slightly larger share which accrued to the foundation is explained by the fact that in addition to the 50 percent of the receipts from the March of Dimes, it also gets some direct donations.

Through May 31, 1945, the end of the past fiscal year, the foundation actually spent from its beginning $7,109,375.09 in grants and appropriations for research, education, and epidemic aid to local chapters, and $1,437,445.76 in other disbursements, largely for administrative expenses. This makes total actual expenditures of $8,546,820.85, leaving the foundation with a reserve of $13,180,613.66 as of May 31, 1945. The word "actual" is used to describe expenditures to distinguished funds paid out as apart from a $4,000,000 reserve set aside for epidemic and other emergencies and $2,782,390.97 in authorized but undisbursed grants and appropriations which the foundation lists under expenditures in its balance sheet.

Mr. Haughey admitted that reports on expenditures and assets for the fiscal year ending May 31, 1945, had been received by the foundation from only 85.6 percent of its 2,714 chapters. But the reporting chapters, he said, represent 95 percent of the money raised last year.

CHAPTERS SPEND $10,825,330

The reporting local chapters had total assets of $9,835,197.95 as of May 31, 1945, according to Mr. Haughey. When assets on a similar ratio of reserve are computed for the nonreporting chapters representing 5 percent of the funds raised in 1945, it makes a total reserve by the local chapters of $10,326,957.85. When this sum is deducted from the $21,152,288.08 received by the local chapters through the 1945 March of Dimes, it means that they had spent $10,825,330.23.

Thus, the foundation and its local chapters spent together a total of $19,372,151.08 through May 31, 1945, and had left $23,507,571.51. When the $15,000,000 raised in January 1946 is added to this sum, it makes a reserve grand total of $38,507,571.51 for the Foundation and its chapters.

Out of this reserve must be deducted expenditures for the current fiscal year starting June 1, 1945. No figures on such expenditures will be available until the foundation's next annual report is published, and they must therefore be deduced on the basis of the previous year's disbursements. If 1944 was a serious epidemic year, with 5,000 more polio cases than in 1945, such a surmise is conservative.

In the year ending May 31, 1945, the foundation had expenditures of $4,775,853.24, including research and education grants amounting to $2,108,674.52.

But, as stated above, the foundation lists $2,782,390.97 in authorized but undisbursed grants and appropriations. Research and education grants and appropriations are usually made on a 5-year basis but are paid out at the rate of about one-fifth a year. Of such grants and appropriations made during the year ending May 31, 1945, a total of $1,719,556.74 was undisbursed. When this figure is deducted from the listed expenditures, it reduces the foundation's actual expenditures for the past fiscal year to $3,056,296.50.

It is assumed that in the current fiscal year the foundation will have had similar expenditures. When to this are added an allowance of $425,000 for disbursement of undisbursed grants made in the 1944–45 fiscal year and another allowance of $300,000 for disbursement of funds appropriated but unexpended in previous years, the foundation will have had expenditures of $3,781,296.50 in the fiscal year ending next May 31.

The chapters reporting to the foundation had total expenditures of $4,345,792.49 during the fiscal year ending May 31, 1945. When expenditures on a similar ratio are computed for the nonreporting chapters representing 5 percent of the raised funds, it makes a total of $4,563,082.11 in expenditures by the local chapters in the past fiscal year. For the purposes of the present computation it is likewise assumed that the chapters are having similar expenditures in the current fiscal year.

When the total estimated expenditures of $8,344,378.61 by the foundation and its local chapters for the current year are deducted from the reserve of $38,507,571.51, it leaves a reserve of $30,163,192.90.

When these estimated expenditures for the current year are added to the expenditures from 1938 through May 31, 1945, arrived at on the basis of the foundation's own figures, we get an expenditure total of $27,716,529.69. Addition to this of the $4,625,377.21 in fund-raising costs makes a disbursement grand total of $32,341,906.90, or 51.7 percent of the amount raised as against a reserve of $30,163,192.90.

As can be readily seen, the expenditure percentage of 51.7 is arrived at by including fund-raising costs. When such costs are excluded the foundation's reserve exceeds its disbursements, including administrative costs, which will be discussed in detail in a later article, by more than $2,000,000.

Foundation officials have argued in the past, and will undoubtedly do so again, that the proceeds from the latest March of Dimes cannot properly be included in the reserve as part of these proceds are to be used to cover expenses in the ensuing fiscal year. Such reasoning is questionable, however, as with the March of Dimes occurring in January and the foundation's fiscal year not starting until June, the organization will always be a year ahead in receipts over expenditures.

In his survey of the voluntary health work field, Mr. Greenberg talked with officials of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis and the American Cancer Society and also interviewed the following authorities in the field of philanthropy, medicine, public health, and public welfare:

Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank of New York and president of the National War Fund.

Gerard Swope, former president of the General Electric Co.; honorary president of Community Chests and Councils, and chairman of the budget committee of the National War Fund.

Harold J. Seymour, general manager of the National War Fund and national campaign manager for the USO.

Ralph H. Blanchard, executive director of Community Chests and Councils.

Dr. James B. Murphy, director of cancer rerearch for the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

Dr. Philip S. Platt, executive director of the New York Association for the Blind and coauthor of the recently published study of Voluntary Health Agencies, financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.

Dr. Louis I. Dublin, vice president and statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. and chairman of the National Health Council executive committee which sponsored the above study.

Dr. C. E. A. Winslow, professor emeritus of public health at the Yale University School of Medicine and retired director of the Yale Public Health School.

Dr. Ira V. Hiscock, professor of public health at the Yale School of Medicine and chairman of the board of directors of the National Health Council.

Dr. Martha M. Eliot, Associate Chief of the United States Children's Bureau.

Dr. R. R. Spencer, Director of the National Cancer Institute of the United States Public Health Service in Washington.

Congresswoman FRANCES P. BOLTON, of Ohio, for many years a leading figure in public health nursing activities.

Dr. Charles A. Armstrong, Chief of the Division of Infectious Diseases of the United States Public Health Service.

George St. J. Perrott, Chief of the Division of Public Health Methods of the United States Public Health Service.

Dr. Abram Daley, Chief of the Division of Health Services of the United States Children's Bureau.

Miss Mary Taylor, Director of the Division of Reports of the United States Children's Bureau.

Robert E. Bondy, director of the National Social Welfare Assembly and former national administrator of American Red Cross services for the armed forces and veterans.

Paul Reed, executive director of the National Information Bureau, nonprofit organization set up by the various social agencies to evaluate their work and press for necessary reforms in their operations.

Bradley Buell, executive editor of Survey Midmonthly, leading national social work magazine.

In addition, Mr. Greenberg discussed the work of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis with a number of prominent orthopedic surgeons, who requested that their names not be used.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of April 26, 1946]

(This is the second of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

Pooling of the present separate and competitive fund-raising drives of the various voluntary health agencies into a single, unified, Nation-wide health fund campaign as a more effective and economical method of enlisting the support of the American people in the fight against disease and of distributing that support according to need is favored by a number of nationally known authorities.

In urging replacement of the present confusing multiplicity of appeals by a federated campaign, these men stressed the need for an integrated and well-balanced voluntary health program which would be concerned with the total health of the community rather than any specialized disease and assure the contributor that his dollar would be used where it could do the most good.

An important guidepost on the road toward such a program, several of those interviewed emphasized, was provided by the achievements of the National War Fund and of the widespread net of local community chests which in joint drives during the war years raised a total of $750,000,000 for home-front and war-front needs.

ENDORSED BY LEADERS

Among those who endorsed the idea of a federated set-up in the voluntary health field, by gradual steps, if necessary, and with possible extension later to include national public welfare agencies, were the following:

Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank of New York and president of the National War Fund.

Gerard Swope, former president of the General Electric Co., honorary president of Community Chests and Councils, and chairman of the budget committee of the National War Fund.

Dr. Philip S. Platt, executive director of the New York Association for the Blind and coauthor of the recently published 3-year study of Voluntary Health Agencies financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.

Harold J. Seymour, general manager of the National War Fund and national campaign manager for the USO.

Ralph H. Blanchard, executive director of Community Chests and Councils.

Dr. Louis I. Dublin, vice president and statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and chairman of the National Health Council executive committee which sponsored the Rockefeller Foundation study of voluntary health agencies.

Dr. R. R. Spencer, director of the National Cancer Institute of the United States Public Health Service in Washington.

Dr. Abram Daley, Chief of the Division of Health Services of the United States Children's Bureau.

George St. J. Perrott, Chief of the Division of Public Health Methods of the United States Public Health Service.

SOME QUALIFY APPROVAL

Several of the others interviewed expressed qualified approval of the idea of federation, their objections being based on questioning the practicability of such a step in the immediately foreseeable future or some of its technical details rather than its desirability or logic.

The logic of the idea of federation is indeed irrefutable.

Under the National War Fund and, for some 20 years previous to the war under the community-chest system, the motto has been teamwork among agencies serving the community and apportionment of funds through budgeting on the basis of relative need as determined through objective appraisal of the work done by the various agencies and of the needs of the community as a whole.

In striking contrast is the antiquated, competitive, hit-or-miss system still prevailing in the voluntary health field.

Each of the dozen or so major voluntary health agencies and of the numerous organizations operating on the local level is concerned with a single disease and is out to get as much money for it as it possibly can. With each agency preoccupied with its fraction of the health problem, there is no machinery for critical appraisal of the total problem or for filling existing gaps.

In the 1944–45 fiscal year, the national voluntary health agencies obtained a total of $48,100,000 in contributions. Of this amount, more than $16,000,000 was raised by the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, which deals with a disease decidedly minor in character. About $15,000,000 was collected by the National Tuberculosis Association, an organization combating a disease showing definite signs of receding and leveling off. Only about a third of the total went to agencies fighting heart disease, cancer, diabetes, nephritis, and other ailments with high mortality rates.

APPEAL TO EMOTION

The average layman, beset by a confusing multiplicity of causes, is hardly in a position to choose the most worth while in terms of scientific need. There is naturally a limit to what he can contribute, and all too often the appeal to his heart rather than his head is the quickest way to his pocketbook.

But appeal to emotion is a poor guide to giving and an even poorer criterion of worth.

As Dr. Platt, one of the outstanding experts in the voluntary public health field in the country, cogently puts it: "Getting money is in itself no proof of anything except that the public has been persuaded to give it—as it has been persuaded to spend millions of dollars on patent medicines and gimracks."

The extreme disparity between the phenomenal fund-raising success of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation and the income of the American Heart Association, which in 1944 was able to collect only $28,776, is regarded by Dr. Platt "as startling as it is significant."

Dr. Platt also likes to emphasize the contrast between the present disparate assortment of voluntary health agencies, specializing in more than a dozen different organs of the human body, and city or State health departments. The voters, he points out, could not be induced for a moment to run a health department for a single disease or a collection of independent departments for specialized diseases.

AGENCIES HOSTILE

The book which Dr. Platt wrote together with the late Selskar M. Gunn, a vice-president of the Rockefeller Foundation, built up a formidable case for federation in the voluntary health field. It was received, as was to be expected, with open hostility by the agencies which now get a far greater share of the proceeds of private philanthropy for health work than they would be entitled to under a system of scientific budgeting.

But Dr. Platt is not discouraged. He said it was to be expected that agencies which had staked out private "gold mines" for themselves would be the last to agree to give up their vested interests for "uncertain diggings." He believes that, while the time may not be ripe at once for a single national health fund, unification will come "by evolution rather than revolution," with a start made first on a demonstration basis on the local level.

Mr. Aldrich, Mr. Swope, and Mr. Seymour fall back on the lessons learned through the National War Fund in their advocacy of federation in the voluntary health field. The National War Fund—the first federated philanthropic effort on a national scale—ran its final campaign last fall and is liquidating its activities this year, but they feel that the spirit and procedures should be retained and further developed in peacetime.

"One of the greatest achievements of the National War Fund," Mr. Aldrich declared, "was the manner in which it brought about unity between the various religious, racial, and economic groups and between the various sections of the country. I think that if this kind of unity can be continued in the postwar period it would be a very advantageous thing."

The National War Fund, he said, has not only widely extended the frontiers of organized philanthropy but has fully demonstrated the feasibility and advantages of federated effort.

ALDRICH FOR COORDINATION

The War Fund included many agencies devoted to the war effort and to foreign relief work, the latter of which had to be approved by the President's War Relief Control Board. Now that both this board and the War Fund are going out of existence, Mr. Aldrich feels that "a national effort of similar character should now be concentrated in the domestic field," with both health and welfare agencies uniting in coordinated fund-raising and budgeting.

Mr. Swope said he was unqualifiedly in favor of a health agency federation along the pattern established by the community chests and the National War Fund.

Besides achieving a distribution of donated money "according to need rather than dramatic appeal," Mr. Swope declared, federated fund-raising would end the present confusion which leaves to the lay donor the choice of the most worth-while charity, and would reduce campaign expenses and overhead. He admitted that a period of education might be needed before unification can be achieved, just as considerable preparatory work was required before the community chest idea became widely accepted, but said he regarded education and study toward such a goal as most desirable.

"Federation obviously means a better balanced program all around," Mr. Seymour said. "You can get things in their proper relationship, which you never can do under a system of independent agencies. Federation makes for unity and mutual understanding, for economy of effort and for economy of fund-raising and promotion expenses. It makes it possible for the individual giver to do a more intelligent giving job and to budget his philanthropy more effectively."

RESEARCH IMPLIED

Mr. Blanchard, who directs the agency coordinating the activities of community chests throughout the country, declared that "naturally we believe in federation; that's our field of work."

"That implies research and study to determine need," he said, "it implies the principle of budgeting and joint approach to the problems of public relations money raising, etc. As to the specific application of these general principles to the national picture, my judgment is that it would take time for the situation in detail to develop. I believe that over a period of time the basic principles of federation would become more and more accepted on the national level."

Dr. Dublin, who has long been an advocate of voluntary health work integration, feels that only through federation can be accomplished the kind of planning essential for an over-all campaign for life and health conservation and for a wiser and more economical use of funds under skilled professional direction.

Deploring what he regards as "a trend toward vested interests" and the degeneration in some instances of enthusiasm to serve the public "into a desire to preserve a going institution," he expressed the hope that the voluntary health agencies would not let selfish considerations stand in the way of better service to the American people in cooperation with governmental health agencies.

The vital need for better coordination of private and governmental health activities was stressed in particular by Dr. Spencer, Dr. Daley and Mr. Perrott, all of whom come in frequent contact with voluntary agencies in their capacity as Government officials. All three said they were in favor of "rationalization" of the voluntary health field, with joint fund raising and budgeting, so as to establish a far more equitable relationship than now exists between the relative standing of diseases and the funds available for combating them.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of April 27, 1946]

(This is the third of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

"I wish I knew how much is too much."

Spokesmen for the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis frequently quote this statement by their president, Basil O'Connor, in strongly denying that the foundation and its local chapters are accumulating too large a reserve.

But what are the facts?

While it is hard to state with absolute certainty in the case of an epidemic disease such as polio "how much is too much," the facts, based on medical statistics, on the opinion of public health experts and on the foundation's own financial statement, contravert its denial that it has too much money.

Criticism of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation should not, of course, be construed as designed to cast any reflection on the positive accomplishments which the organization has to its credit. The foundation and its chapters have made great strides in perfecting the treatment and care of the victims of paralysis and in alleviating much of the human suffering which crippling causes. Through large grants, the foundation has inaugurated important research in the field of virus infection. Granted all this, the question at issue still remains, however, whether the organization should be allowed a share of the proceeds of American generosity far in excess of the relative importance of the disease it was set up to combat.

The March of Dimes has from the beginning greatly profited from the prestige which the late President Roosevelt's auspices gave it. The President's own infirmity and the courage with which he strove to overcome it gave the drive a unique and sentimental character, gaining for it support from many and varied quarters and dramatizing to an unusual degree what is essentially a comparatively rare disease. A dynamic money-raising technique based on an appeal for very small contributions, combined with the universal response which crippled children evoke, have brought the Infantile Paralysis Foundation a financial success unprecedented in the history of voluntary health work in the United States.

As was shown in the first article of this series, the foundation has raised $62,505,099.80 since its founding in 1938, but has been able to spend only 51.7 percent of the money, and is now left, with its chapters, with a reserve of more than $30,000,000.

Whether such a reserve is too large is a question which can be considered from two angles—(a) the relative standing of polio and its consequent rightful share of the amount made available by philanthropy for health work, and (b) the absolute financial requirements of such a disease as polio, on the basis of past experience with it, and regardless of other health needs which far surmount it.

As there is a limit even to American generosity, the first criterion is obviously the most important, if not the only salient one. Spokesmen for the Infantile Paralysis Foundation brush it aside, however, as if any disease other than polio was no concern of theirs and their only function was to guard their private domain against any infiltrating attacks. But even when the problem is considered from their own isolationist point of view, there is ample ground for questioning the need for a $30,000,000 reserve.

RELATIVE PLACE ALREADY DISCUSSED

The relative place of polio in the list of diseases in the United States has already been discussed.

Here is just one more figure: At the average rate of 8,662 polio cases a year during the 1930–44 period, the incidence of this disease—not the number of deaths from it—was exceeded annually 45 times by deaths from heart disease, 20 times by deaths from cancer, 14 times by deaths from cerebral hemorrhage, 11 times by deaths from kidney diseases, 7 times by deaths from pneumonia, 6 times by deaths from tuberculosis, and 4 times by deaths from diabetes.

In asserting that the Infantile Paralysis Foundation needed all the money it could get, George H. LaPorte, its director of public relations, declared it was "conservatively estimated" that there are at least 125,000 persons in this country requiring some care for the effects of polio.

LaPorte said the foundation arrived at this figure in this way: The average number of cases per year is about 10,000. About 25 percent, or 2,500 a year, suffer a marked disability in the form of orthopedic deformities or residual paralysis. The average age when polio is contracted is 9, when the average life expectancy is 60. This means that 2,500 of each year's polio victims will require continuing aid in some measure for about 60 years.

The foundation proceeds, by the way, on a policy that no one is too rich to be denied aid if he is stricken by polio. "We don't operate as a welfare agency, where an applicant has to be indigent to become eligible," said LaPorte. Polio can be an extremely expensive disease, and we like to feel that people contributing to the March of Dimes look upon it as a form of insurance."

In the opinion of several authorities, this policy is contrary to all modern social welfare philosophy by, first, ignoring the paramount duty of governmental agencies to furnish health service and, secondly, disregarding the question of ability to pay in the disbursement of funds raised through contributions.

According to figures published by the United States Public Health Service, the average annual incidence of polio was 8,662 for the 1930–44 period. Figures for the 1915–44 period compiled by the Infantile Paralysis Foundation itself give an average of 7,115 cases a year, even though this period includes the 1916 epidemic, the worst on record, when there were 27,363 cases. Foundation officials admit that a rise in the incidence of the disease in the past few years may be at least partly attributed to better diagnosis resulting from greater awareness of the symptoms of polio on the part of both physicians and the public.

One of the booklets on polio published by the foundation itself says that of every 100 persons contracting the disease, 50 will recover completely and be none the worse for their experience, 25 to 30 will show slight after affects but not enough to interfere with their leading a practically normal life, 15 to 20 will be left seriously crippled, and 5 to 10 will die.

ORTHOPEDIC PHYSICIANS' VIEWS

Several orthopedic physicians consulted by the Journal-Bulletin said that about 75 out of every 100 persons stricken by polio usually recovered within 6 to 8 weeks, that from about 10 to 20 are permanently affected with some form of paralysis, and about 5 die.

It would therefore appear that 15, rather than 25 percent is the more authoritative figure for the proportion of those affected permanently by polio. When this percentage is applied against the average of 7,115 cases for the past 30 years and multiplied by 60, the average life expectancy from the age the disease is most frequently contracted, we get about 64,000—and not 125,000—as an estimate of the number of persons in the United States now requiring some care for the effects of polio.

Polio, as will be pointed out in a later article, is by no means the only disease crippling children and not even the leading cause of orthopedic and other deformities.

"Should we have another epidemic such as 1916, with more than 27,000 cases." LaPorte said, "all the money now held by the national foundation and the chapters would not be sufficient to cope with it at the average minimum cost of $1,000 per case."

This figure of an average minimum cost of $1,000 per case is also questioned by orthopedic physicians. One surgeon who has handled many polio cases said that in the District of Columbia, where there were 301 cases of polio during the 1944 epidemic, a total of $97,000 was spent that year for their treatment by the local chapter. This is an average cost of about $320 per case.

At this rate, assuming the foundation had to pay the cost of every single case, it would have to spend $8,640,000 in the case of the recurrence of an epidemic such as that of 1916, the worst on record.

This sum is only about half of what was raised by the foundation last year.

It is less than one-third of the reserve now held by the foundation and its chapters.

While no one knows when a severe epidemic will or will not strike, the average incidence of polio for the past 30 years has been only slightly more than one-fourth of the number of cases in the 1916 epidemic.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of April 29, 1946]

(This is the fourth of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis and its local chapters spend for fund-raising 7.4 cents out of every dollar they collect.

The fund-raising costs are aside from administrative expenses, which in the case of the foundation, amounted last year to 17.2 cents out of every dollar spent. In the case of the money spent by the chapters themselves, administrative expenses were 6.9 cents for every dollar.

In other words, out of every dollar donated through the March of Dimes only 75.4 cents went for the purpose for which it was actually collected if that dollar was spent through the foundation itself, which gets half of the funds raised through the annual appeal. Out of every dollar spent locally through the chapters, 85.7 cents went for the aid of victims of polio.

In the opinion of the man widely regarded as the outstanding authority in the country on philanthropic fund-raising techniques, the Infantile Paralysis Foundation's fund-raising costs are excessive.

This man is Harold J. Seymour, general manager of the National War Fund and national campaign manager for the USO. Before taking over the direction of these two Nation-wide drives he was connected for 24 years with the John Price Jones Corp., considered the leading firm of fund-raising and publicity experts in the United States.

"I consider a fund-raising cost of 7.4 percent as too high for a broad appeal for a substantial amount of money," Mr. Seymour told me.

The National War Fund, which raised $126,000,000 in 1943 and $90,000,000 last year, spends $1,200,000 a year for fund-raising and administration. This is 0.95 cent per dollar on the basis of the amount raised in 1943 and 1.3 cents per dollar on the basis of the proceeds of last year's drive.

LOCAL COSTS CITED

In addition to the National War Fund's combined fund-raising and administrative costs on the national level, its local branches have similar costs, which are reported to vary greatly. In 1944, the United Rhode Island War Fund spent 2.89 cents out of every dollar for fund-raising and administration.

It thus appears that out of every dollar raised in Rhode Island for the National War Fund, which covered local community funds as well as national and foreign relief agencies, only slightly more than 4 cents went for fund-raising and administration as against 7.4 cents spent for fund-raising alone by the Infantile Paralysis Foundation and its chapters.

Mr. Seymour admitted that "the amount you're after affects the percentage of fund-raising costs," so that an organization which raises $16,000,000 would be expected to have proportionately higher fund raising expenses than one collecting $90,000,000. But he added, in discussing the March of Dimes, that "studies have proven that it isn't economically feasible to run any campaign in which you ask for contributions averaging less than $2."

The national headquarters of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation spends for fund-raising 1.7 percent of the total amount collected, while the local chapters spend an additional 5.7 percent.

According to a spokesman for the American Cancer Society, funds raised by that organization are divided as follows: 60 percent goes to the State branches and 40 percent to the national headquarters; of its share of 40 percent, national headquarters spends 25 percent for research, 9 percent for a national education and service program, and 6 percent for fund-raising and overhead.

PROVIDES POLIO RESEARCH

The primary function of the local chapters of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation is to provide aid for polio victims by paying for hospitalization and medical and nursing service and furnishing orthopedic appliances. The principal function of the national foundation is to finance research into the cause, prevention, and cure of polio; provide funds for the training of physicians, nurses, and physical therapists, and assist chapters in epidemic emergencies by helping pay for the care and treatment of polio victims.

The figures on fund-raising costs are those furnished by the foundation. The percentage of administrative costs was arrived at on the basis of the foundation's own financial statement. In both cases, the figures are extremely conservative.

About $6,000,000 of the $16,242,553 raised by the Infantile Paralysis Foundation in 1945 was obtained in collections made in motion-picture theaters and was presented to the foundation by the motion-picture industry in a lump sum. Foundation officials were vague when questioned whether this sum had not been turned over to them clear of fund-raising costs, which had been borne by the motion-picture industry. From other sources I was informed that in the case of this money the fund-raising expenses were borne by the industry. If this is so, then the foundation's costs for raising last year's March of Dimes proceeds must be figured on the basis of $10,242,553 only and would amount to 11.7 rather than 7.4 cents on the dollar.

Another point to be considered is the fact that in many of the communities where the March of Dimes is climaxed by the President's birthday ball, the use of ballrooms is donated by the owners free of charge as their contribution to the drive. If rental had to be paid for all the halls, fund-raising costs would naturally be still higher.

ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

The foundation's last annual report for the year ending May 31, 1945, lists the following administrative expenses: Maintenance of State offices, $301,134.72; service and assistance to chapters, $100,576.52; salaries and wages, $60,506.86; office expenses and travel, $40,404.63; furniture and fixtures purchased, $26,414.77. This is a total of $527,037.50 as against the foundation's total actual expenditures of $3,056,296.50, making the percentage of administrative costs 17.2.

There was some difference of opinion among several authorities consulted whether two other items carried in the foundation's report were to be properly considered as administrative expenses. Because of this divergence of opinion, the two items were not included under the administrative cost column. The two items are $71,387.60 for health education services and $70,066.73 for medical advisory services.

Tucked away in the foundation's financial statement for the year ending May 31, 1945, are two other items which also come close to being administrative expenditures. These are $25,229.69 in expenses of the medical advisory committees in considering applications for research and education grants, and $111,687.12 spent for publications and their distribution.

According to Louis C. Haughey, assistant treasurer and comptroller of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, the 85.6 percent of the 2,714 chapters which reported to the foundation on their finances during the last fiscal year had office and general expenses totalling $299,726.38. The reporting chapters, he said, represent 95 percent of the money raised last year. When office and general expenses on a similar ratio are computed for the nonreporting chapters representing 5 percent of the raised funds, it makes a total administrative expense of $315,501.45, or 6.9 percent of the $4,563,082.11 spent by the local chapters during the past fiscal year.

In a statement given this writer, Mr. Haughey broke down the expenses of the reporting chapters during the year ending May 31, 1945, as follows: Medical care of patients, $3,456,644.84; special equipment purchased, $284,543.46; expenses for training nurses, physical therapists, technicians, etc., $91,453.75; office and general expenses, $299,726.38, and "other expenditures," $213,424.06.

What the last item involves is not quite clear. Mr. Haughey says that it "consists principally of miscellaneous, unclassified disbursements of our small chapters. Since practically the only activity of these small chapters is caring for infantile paralysis cases, it can be presumed that this item consists largely of disbursements for the medical care of patients." What percentage of administrative costs this item includes is hard to say, and it is therefore not carried under administration.

The administrative expenses of the local chapters are less than half of the national foundation. This is to be expected as, according to foundation officials, most of the chapters are run by volunteers and only in the bigger cities are paid executive secretaries employed.

On the other hand, the foundation is faced with the need of trying to supervise the sprawling network of 2,714 chapters throughout the country. It maintains regional and State offices and employs 156 persons in its national headquarters in New York.

While comparative data for administrative expenses by other public health and public welfare agencies are difficult to obtain, there can be little doubt, in the opinion of several experts, that the Infantile Paralysis Foundation's overhead is high. Nor can there be any doubt, in the light of the experience of the community chests and the National War Fund, that a federated health fund campaign favored by many authorities would sharply reduce the overhead on money donated to help the sick.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of April 30, 1946]

(This is the fifth of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis is frequently resorting to fear propaganda in an effort to bolster its fund-raising campaigns in the opinion of several of the men interviewed in New York and Washington.

One of the top-flight medical research scientists in the country criticized what he called the foundation's "exaggerated claims on behalf of a rare and minor disease."

According to Dr. Howard A. Howe, one of America's leading neurologists and head of the poliomyelitis research center at Johns Hopkins University, "even in epidemics the chances are that only about three children in a thousand will suffer a recognizable attack of polio. And of these three only one is likely to be permanently crippled."

During the 1915–44 period, the incidence of polio in the United States averaged 7,115 cases a year. When this is pro rated for 135,000,000 Americans, it makes 1 case for approximately every 19,000 persons in this country.

Children are far more susceptible to the disease than adults, more than 75 percent of all victims of polio being under 20 years of age. The chances of a child being stricken by polio are considerably higher than in the case of an adult, but they are still pretty small. According to statistics compiled by the Infantile Paralysis Foundation itself, the average annual expectancy of polio cases among 100,000 persons in the following age groups is: Under 5, 34.4 cases; 5 to 9, 54.8 cases; 10 to 14, 30.4 cases; 15 to 19, 11.5 cases.

"STOP WORRYING" ADVICE

" 'Stop worrying' is still good advice—however hard to follow—in the present stage of our knowledge about polio," says Dr. Howe. "During epidemics the virus is so widespread, in cities at least, that avoiding contact with it is virtually impossible. There is nothing much you can do to protect your children against polio except to keep them out of epidemic areas; and, in any case, their chances of escape are good."

"I am being fairly conservative," Dr. Howe further declares, "when I say that 50 to 75 percent of the paralytic cases recover the function of their limbs completely. This is true, regardless of the epidemic or the treatment employed—in fact, it is also said to be true if no treatment at all is used. Another 10 to 20 percent make fairly satisfactory recoveries. This leaves a relatively small fraction whose progress is slight."

NO PREVENTATIVE KNOWN

Dr. Don W. Gudakunst, who until his death several months ago was medical director of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, declared flatly that "there is no specific means of warding off polio."

A great deal can be done to control heart disease and cancer, the two major causes of death in the United States, but little is being done because of the lack of funds, while idle millions lie in the reserves of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation and its local chapters. Tuberculosis still kills nearly 60,000 persons a year, and much can be done to control it through education and more widespread chest X-ray examinations.

According to Dr. James B. Murphy, director of cancer research for the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research, at least 50,000 of the more than 170,000 persons who died of cancer last year "could have been saved if we had gotten them early enough." Dr. Murphy pointed out that cancer of the skin is 95 percent curable in the early stages and cancer of the breast is 70 to 80 percent curable if caught in time.

PEOPLE BECOME POLIO CONSCIOUS

But while progress in the battle against the diseases which are mass killers has been disappointingly slow in recent years, the American people have increasingly become polio conscious as a result of the high-powered and well-financed publicity efforts of the Infantile Paralysis Foundation.

That there is a direct connection between this growing awareness of polio on the part of the public and the phenomenal rise in the proceeds of the March of Dimes has been frankly acknowledged by Basil O'Connor, president of the foundation. "It's almost like waking up one morning and finding that many of your dreams have come true," O'Connor declared sometime ago in a statement hailing the high returns of the foundation's drive, which he said "probably was due in part to the high incidence" of polio in the past few years. The "high incidence" referred to by Mr. O'Connor was relative rather than actual and looks a lot more impressive in terms of percentages than in actual figures. Furthermore, as is admitted by the foundation itself, the higher incidence of the past few years is at least partly due to better diagnosis.

RECENT NATION-WIDE SURVEY

The extent to which the American public has been high-pressured into polio consciousness is attested by a recent Nation-wide survey made by the foundation.

Among the questions asked in the survey was this: "If you had some money you wanted to contribute, to which one of these organizations would you give the most: the National Tuberculosis Association, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis, or the American Cancer Society?" The answers were: 38 percent for polio, 28 percent for cancer, and 22 percent for tuberculosis.

Of those questioned, 83 percent said they knew there was an organization doing something about polio, 76 percent knew of one fighting tuberculosis, 63 percent knew there was an organization fighting cancer, and only 9 percent knew there was an agency doing something about rheumatic fever, which cripples far more children than polio does.

QUESTION OF BROADENING SCOPE

In answer to the question whether they thought the Infantile Paralysis Foundation should do something about all diseases that cripple children or just go on limiting itself to polio, 49 percent were in favor of broadening the foundation's work and only 22 percent felt it should continue on the present basis. The foundation, its officials say, has no intention of broadening its field of activity.

Examples of the foundation tendency to "statistical vagueness through the use of percentages" abound in its monthly bulletin, National Foundation News.

On page 1 of the June 1945 issue is a 2-column headline reading, "50 percent increase in polio is reported." The story starts off by telling of "an increase of almost 50 percent in the number of infantile paralysis cases for the first 5 months of this year as compared to the same period last year." If you read on, you will discover that the actual figure of cases reported during the first 5 months of 1945 was 740. As a matter of fact, the number of cases for all of 1945 turned out to be far below the 1944 record. The 1945 figure was 13,733 as compared to 19,029 in 1944.

EDITORS STILL AT IT

But the editors of the National Foundation News are still at it.

In the March 1946 issue there is a 2-column headline reading, "Early '46 incidence breaks all records." Again you have to read on to discover that things are not quite as bad as they sound. The story says that during the first 5 weeks of 1946, a total of 238 polio cases was reported throughout the country as against the previous high total for the first 5 weeks of any year, which was 223 in 1931.

The March issue also contains the information that "there are 84,480 dimes to a mile." How the editors managed to arrive at this esoteric fact is not stated. But if it's so, then the foundation could string out 7,635 miles with dimes with the money it has raised to date and cover about half of that mileage of dimes with the money it hasn't been able to spend up to now.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of May 1, 1946]

(This is the sixth of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis not only has no intention of joining any proposed Nation-wide health fund campaign but does not plan to extend its activities to any crippling children's diseases other than polio, officials of the foundation have informed the Journal-Bulletin.

While the foundation remains adamant in its isolationist attitude, it is worth noting that the Federal and State Governments together spent only $7,027,190 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1945, for their crippled children's programs.

According to the latest figures available in Washington, there were 381,000 crippled children on the State registers for the program financed jointly by the Federal Government and the States. Government officials say the money spent for the care, treatment, and rehabilitation of these children was pitiably inadequate.

Only a relatively small proportion of the crippled youngsters listed on the State registers are polio victims.

Thus, as the Infantile Paralysis Foundation and its local chapters keep on accumulating what has been aptly described as "inert and sterile" millions, the majority of crippled children in the United States fail to get the kind of care, treatment and rehabilitation aid they should have. Lacking the foundation's high-powered fund-raising technique, the National Society for Crippled Children was able to raise only $1,600,000 in 1944 through its annual Easter seal sale.

Furthermore, even in the small segment of health work they have set for themselves, the caliber of the work of the National Infantile Paralysis Foundation and its chapters have been far from satisfactory, in the opinion of a Government official in Washington who is in an excellent position to know what he is talking about.

This official pointed out that "while State and Federal agencies are professionally equipped to operate programs for physically handicapped children and have doctors, nurses, therapists, and research facilities, the foundation, and particularly its chapters, have only money and neither an adequately planned program nor the required professional staff and facilities to execute it."

Finding and aiding polio victims has been a hit-and-miss proposition with most of the foundation's chapters, this official said, and only recently have negotiations been started with the foundation looking toward some arrangement under which the chapters would pay for the treatment and care of polio victims under the Federal-State programs.

Having "only money," in the words of this highly placed Federal official, the foundation is in no mood to join any rationalized voluntary health work set-up under which its share of the proceeds of a unified campaign would presumably be cut sharply in accordance with the proportionate needs of polio and more important diseases would get a larger share than they now do.

SEES ENVY AS MOTIVE

"Pooled fund raising under a centralized organization would only result in communizing health activities and lead to their eventually being turned over to the States and the Federal Government," declared George H. LaPorte, the national foundation's public relations director. "Proponents of such a plan are motivated by envy of successful organizations such as ours. This movement is just another way of saying that they want those who have acquired wealth to share it."

Such a statement, referring to dimes contributed by millions of Americans for the benefit of crippled children as "acquired wealth," need occasion no surprise.

Authorities favoring reorganization of voluntary health work under a joint fund to cut overhead costs and assure more effective and economical spending of the dollars and dimes donated by Americans have advocated—as a minimum objective and as a possible first step toward attainment of the maximum goal—that the Infantile Paralysis

Foundation broaden its activities to cover all diseases crippling children.

But, according to Mr. LaPorte, the foundation's trustees feel that "there is so much to be done in polio, particularly now that the end of the war will free many capable scientists and permit increased research, that we will have all we can do and be able to spend all the money we have to accomplish our purpose of finding a prevention and cure for polio."

While the objective of discovering means of curing and preventing polio is undoubtedly laudable in itself, it cannot be viewed in isolation. It must necessarily be considered as a part of the total picture of health problems confronting this country and of the amount of money made available by the American people through philanthropy to combat all diseases through voluntary agencies. The National Infantile Paralysis Foundation has so far shown no sign of comprehending this elementary truth.

The Division of Health Services of the United States Children's Bureau gives some rather frightening estimates of the number of children in this country handicapped by some kind of physical defect. The estimates are: dental defects, 20,000,000; visual defects, 4,000,000; hearing defects, 1,000,000; orthopedic and plastic defects, 500,000; rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease, 500,000; epilepsy, 200,000; tuberculosis, 175,000; diabetes, 35,000.

PROPORTION BELIEVED LOWERED

At the end of 1940, the latest date for which such a break-down is available, there were 54,735 polio cases on the State crippled children's registers. This was 19 percent of the crippled children known at that time to State agencies. The number of such children registered with State agencies has increased considerably since that time, and the proportion of polio cases is believed to have declined materially.

Officials of the United States Children's Bureau say that rheumatic fever and cerebral palsy are two major children's diseases almost untouched so far. Rheumatic fever kills more school-age children in the United States than any other disease. And for every child who dies of rheumatic fever there are many more who are attacked by the disease and who do not die of it but have long drawn-out attacks lasting many months.

According to a study published by the United States Public Health Service, only 30 percent of all persons under 25 with orthopedic impairments, reported the impairment as caused by polio. The same study states that the incidence rate per 100,000 children under 15 is as follows: Polio, 52; diphtheria, 111; scarlet fever, 1,080; whooping cough, 1,599.

NEW YORK CITY CONDITIONS

The register of orthopedically handicapped children maintained by the New York City Health Department shows that only about 22 percent of the deformities were caused by polio.

A break-down of childhood diseases compiled by the United States Census Bureau found that in 1938, when there were only 1,705 polio cases, the incidence for other diseases was: Diphtheria, 30,508; mumps, 153,967; whooping cough, 227,319; chickenpox, 286,843; measles, 822,811.

In Rhode Island there were eight new cases of infantile paralysis last year, which is just about the average annual rate for this State. Last year Rhode Island contributed $106,358.98 to the March of Dimes, standing thirty-fifth in the list of States in the amount of money raised.

Dr. Edward A. McLaughlin, State director of health, estimated earlier this year that there are 75 polio cases under care in this State, a few of them in need of operative work.

The register of crippled children maintained by the crippled children's division of the State health department listed 2,602 youngsters as of December 31, 1945. Of these, 611 were diagnosed to have had polio at one time or another, but the majority were suffering from only minor physical handicaps, and but a very few were described as actually afflicted with paralysis. Other major causes of deformity were: Rickets, 369; club feet, 186; cerebral palsy, 156, and birth paralysis, 147.

POLIO FOUNDATION REGISTER

The register compiled by the Rhode Island Infantile Paralysis Foundation and covering all of the State except Newport County lists 937 persons—both children and adults—who have had polio. Of these, 557 are described as suffering from some form of disability.

In 1940 there were two deaths from polio in Rhode Island. In the same year the death rate from heart disease in this State was 374.4 per 100,000, having more than doubled since 1920. The Rhode Island death rate from cancer in 1940 was 157.6 per 100,000, an increase of more than 100 percent since 1900 and about 60 percent since 1920.

The rise in both heart disease and cancer deaths is to a large extent the result of the increase in the average age of the population. On the assumption that cancer deaths will continue to increase at the rate of the past 20 years as medical science goes on discovering means of lengthening the life span, statisticians of the American Cancer Society estimate that the cancer fatality rate will more than double in the next 45 years unless substantial progress is made in preventing and curing the disease. Cancer deaths numbered 172,700 last year. They are expected to total 190,900 in 1950, 232,600 in 1960, and 347,500 in 1990.

But cancer is by no means merely a degenerative disease afflicting the aged. It will undoubtedly come as a surprise to most readers to learn that more children die of cancer than of polio. In 1942, when 277 children between the ages of 5 and 19 died of polio, cancer killed 1,124 youngsters in this age group and leukemia, cancer of the blood, caused the death of 621 others.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of May 2, 1946]

(This is the seventh of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis is run by a staff which appears to be strong on boosters and weak in numbers of personnel professionally qualified to plan and operate a public health program.

Examination of the foundation's supervisory staff list shows only three full-time medical men as against a plethora of promotional talent.

The emphasis in the make-up of the foundation's top personnel is obviously on continuing to keep the dimes rolling in.

The foundation's full-time medical staff consists of Dr. Hart E. Van Riper, acting medical director; Dr. H. M. Weaver, in charge of the administration of the research program, and Dr. Morton A. Seidenfeld, a psychiatrist recently discharged from the Army.

The foundation's secretary, treasurer, and assistant secretary are all members of the law firm of Basil O'Connor, the organization's president and himself a one-time law partner of the late President Roosevelt. Mr. O'Connor is also president of the American Red Cross and of the Warm Springs Foundation.

Joe W. Savage, recently named to the foundation's No. 2 post as executive director, is a former newspaperman and for some years served as executive secretary of the West Virginia Medical Association. George H. LaPorte, the public relations director, is a former sales manager and advertising man. Other top men on the staff are the director and assistant director of organization, who devote themselves entirely to fund-raising activities; the chapter director, the information director, and the director in charge of radio publicity.

The foundation's board of trustees consists entirely of laymen and includes some of the leading industrialists in the country. By way of contrast, the board if directors of the American Cancer Society is divided almost evenly between physicians and laymen. Whether the governing board of a voluntary health agency should comprise only laymen or should also include a strong representation of medical men is a moot question, but all authorities agree that a lay board should be advised by well-qualified professional men in the formulation of policies and that such policies should be executed by a professional staff of high standing.

There has been some criticism to the effect that the names of many of the prominent men on the foundation's board of trustees mean little in that most of them rarely attend meetings and only infrequently take part in determining the organization's policies. This was denied by a spokesman for the foundation, who said that attendance at the board's quarterly meetings "is practically 90 percent and never less than 60 percent," of the membership of 36.

The board of trustees is advised by several medical advisory committees. These advisory committees pass on applications for research grants from medical schools, universities, hospitals, and other institutions and submit their recommendations to the board of trustees, which has the final authority in the matter.

The research program financed by the foundation is generally conceded to have already contributed materially to the general field of knowledge regarding virus organisms. But unlike the American Cancer Society, whose research program is passed upon by the National Research Council of the National Academy of Science, the Infantile Paralysis Foundation seeks no appraisal of its research grants by any outside scientific agency. The foundation feels, according to Dr. Van Riper, its acting medical director, that its medical advisory committees are as representative as any outside agency could be. Regardless of whether this is true, the fact remains that while the American Cancer Society has vested the last word about its research program in the leading scientific organization in the country, the Infantile Paralysis Foundation lets a board of laymen have the final say about so highly technical a matter as medical research.

Comparison of the amount of money spent for polio research and for research in other diseases is illuminating.

The Infantile Paralysis Foundation disbursed $588,274.90 for research in the year ending May 31, 1945, in addition to $256,935.37 in educational grants for the training of physicians, therapists, and other technicians. This was only about one-fifth of the total grants appropriated during the year, as grants are usually made on a 5-year basis and not paid out all at once.

On the other hand, the American Cancer Society had about $800,000 to spend for research last year. The Medical Society of the County of New York stated in an editorial in its official publication some time ago that figures on research expenditures for various diseases per death were as follows: Polio, $500; other infectious diseases, $4; tuberculosis, $2; heart disease, 17 cents. On the basis of last year's cancer deaths, about $4.50 was spent on cancer research per death.

From the time it was founded in 1938 until May 31, 1945, the foundation spent a total of $7,109,376.09 in grants for research and education and in epidemic aid to local chapters. Of this amount, $4,740,380.04 has gone to research and education. A total of $1,461,660.55 was spent in epidemic aid to chapters. Georgia Warm Springs Foundation received $925,000, and Tuskegee Institute was given $376,886.69.

Such expenditures for a disease so comparatively minor as polio are palpably excessive, when considered in the light of total voluntary health expenditures and the Infantile Paralysis Foundation's huge and growing reserve. But what many authorities in the public health field find even more disturbing is the sprawling network of the foundation's 2,714 chapters which up to now have spent more than $15,000,000 without adequate professional supervision and which at present have an estimated reserve of more than $13,000,000.

"The situation that distresses public health workers," says the Rockefeller Foundation study of voluntary health agencies, "is the accumulation of constantly growing surpluses in a larger number of counties for which there is at the moment no need."

Only recently has the foundation begun to inaugurate a policy under which funds of various county chapters in a State are allowed to be pooled in an emergency. Such pooling of funds on a State level in the case of epidemics, supplemented by emergency funds from the national headquarters, is permitted only if chapters have a surplus in excess of their normal requirements for the ensuing year.

Unlike virtually all other organizations, the Infantile Paralysis Foundation does not operate on a budget. Foundation officials say that, polio being an epidemic disease, coming needs can in no way be adequately anticipated. Nor has the organization any budget for campaign costs. Louis C. Haughey, its assistant treasurer and comptroller, admitted to the Journal-Bulletin that national headquarters has no control over the rate of campaign costs on the local level. "We try to control such costs," he said, "by getting the best man on the spot to do the job."

A recent survey of the finances of the foundation's chapters in Rhode Island showed that, with the exception of the Greater Providence and Newport County chapters, they are spending only a small proportion of their income for the care and treatment of polio victims. One chapter in this State had no expenditures at all last year, while several others had expenditures ranging from about 1 to 4 percent of the money they had raised.

Discussing with this reporter the glaring disproportion of funds available for polio as compared to other diseases, one of the country's leading medical scientists remarked he thought the best thing the Infantile Paralysis Foundation could do would be to terminate its fund-raising activities, invest its reserve and use the income, in somewhat the same manner as the Rockefeller Foundation is doing, to finance the fight against polio.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of May 3, 1946]

(This is the eighth and final of a series of articles written by Mr. Greenberg.)

Proponents of the pooling of the present competitive fund-raising drives for voluntary health work into a unified campaign, so that every dollar donated by Americans to fight disease may be used more effectively where it is most urgently needed, do not underestimate the obstacles standing in the way of achievement of such a goal and concede that it may take years to attain fully.

But they cite as encouraging three recent developments pointing to unification progress on the national level in the voluntary health and welfare fields.

These are:

1. Reorganization of the National Health Council, the agency looked upon as the logical leader in any move toward unification, with a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation to finance its activities.

2. Establishment of a national budgeting committee by Community Chests and Councils, the agency coordinating community fund work throughout the country, to pass upon the budgets of various health and welfare organizations.

3. Establishment of the National Social Welfare Assembly, with membership by 30 welfare and health organizations to provide for joint planning and services.

The National Health Council, founded in 1921 with the idea of achieving the unification which is now again being sought, soon ran into interagency jealousies, was unable to obtain adequate financial support for the maintenance of a professional staff of sufficient stature to be able to provide effective leadership, and degenerated into a routine clearing house for the member organizations.

COUNCIL INTEREST REVIVED

Interest in the council was revived after the recent publication of Voluntary Health Agencies by Selskar M. Gunn and Dr. Philip S. Platt. This study recommended that the council be reorganized with a directing board of outstanding citizens and a strong executive staff to take the leadership in coordination of the voluntary health movement and in experimentation toward that end.

As a start toward carrying out this recommendation, the Rockefeller Foundation has for the first time agreed to give the council an annual appropriation of $78,000, and a new slate of officers has been elected. The new president is Philip Mather, Boston industrialist and civic leader and president of the American Social Hygiene Association, the only voluntary health organization already on record in favor of unification. Dr. Ira V. Hiscock, professor of public health at the Yale School of Medicine, is chairman of the board.

While reorganization of the council is hailed as an encouraging first step by many health and welfare leaders, some of them caution against overestimating its importance without further decisive action toward unification. They point out that the council made a similar start 25 years ago and that good intentions will prove of no avail if the present divisive tendencies in the health field are allowed to continue.

OBJECTIVES DEFINED

A Nation-wide voluntary health fund with a unified campaign has been set by the Gunn-Platt study as the desirable ultimate objective. Intermediate objectives favored by the study, pending achievement of the final goal, are broadening of the activities of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis and of the National Tuberculosis Association, both of which were found to have more money than they can effectively use in their own restricted fields, and immediate pooling of the appeals of eight smaller national agencies whose income is now quite below their needs.

The Infantile Paralysis Foundation, the National Tuberculosis Association, and the American Cancer Society are the big three of the voluntary health movement. In authoritative circles the first two, with such surefire money-raising devices as the March of Dimes and the Christmas Seal sale, are regarded as the most determined hold-outs against unification. The Infantile Paralysis Foundation, in particular, which stands to lose most financially from a federated campaign, is expected to fight unification to the last. Some leaders favor immediate action to unify the smaller agencies, hoping that the big ones will be gradually forced to come in as the federated health fund gains in prestige and popular appeal.

With the imminent liquidation of the National War Fund and of the President's War Relief Control Board, community chests and councils have set up a national budget committee to review the budgets of some war fund agencies which are continuing their activities, and of any other organizations desiring such service. Several organizations have already agreed to have their budgets screened, and among those whose financial appeals have been reviewed by the committee is the USO. It is hoped that the committee will gradually expand its activities in the field of budgeting, which is the cornerstone of rationalized operation.

The National Social Welfare Assembly is an outgrowth of the National Social Work Council and is expected to take increasing leadership in furthering teamwork among the various voluntary organizations and between them and governmental agencies.

About half of those interviewed by the Journal-Bulletin expressed unqualified approval of the idea of federation in the health field, with possible extension later to include national welfare agencies. Most of the others conceded the need for greater coordination of planning and services, their objections being based on questioning the practicability of unification rather than its desirability or logic.

LOSS OF PERSONAL APPEAL

Several of those interviewed argued that the proposed federation might mean the loss of the personal appeal of some of the agencies with a consequent loss in income for all. They said that people like to donate for a particular disease and may not give as much as they do now if the appeal is for some such abstract idea as total health needs.

To this argument proponents of the federation movement retort by pointing to the success of the community funds and of the National War Fund. Subordination of the appeals of the individual agencies will result in larger, rather than smaller income, they maintain, recalling that the very same arguments were used—and disproved—about 25 years ago with the inception of the community-fund movement.

Federation, they argue, would further result in the replacement of separate planning by a well-thought-out, coordinated plan of attack on disease without duplication or cross-purposes and without the serious gaps now existing in the health program; the public's present confusion over the variety of health organizations would be done away with, better qualified professional staffs could be obtained, and overhead and fund-raising costs would be reduced.

One of the most serious existing gaps in the health program was pointed out by Dr. C. E. A. Winslow, professor-emeritus of public health at the Yale School of Medicine and retired director of its public health school. Dr. Winslow emphasized that between 40 and 50 percent of all hospital beds in the United States are now occupied by mental and nervous cases and said that available resources for mental hygiene work were utterly out of proportion with the needs for such work.

NEED HIGHEST STANDARDS

As to the argument that unification might be a step in the direction of the Government taking over all health activities, the exact opposite is the truth, in the opinion of Congresswoman FRANCIS P. BOLTON, of Ohio, for many years a leader in public-health nursing work.

"To avert socialized medicine," Mrs. BOLTON declared, "we've got to provide the best that the private agencies can do. Doctors come to me and ask me to work against socialized medicine. I'm opposed to socialized medicine, but we must work out an adequate alternative.

"Blue Cross serves only the people who can pay insurance premiums. But what about the indigent? Their illnesses, combined with bad housing, is the focal point of the spread of disease. We cannot evade the question of our responsibility for those who are unable to join the Blue Cross. That's where State action and Federal aid to the States come in and where the voluntary agencies have an important function to perform."

A significant indication of growing irritation over the present multiplicity of fund-raising drives for health work was recently furnished by the American Theaters Association, the national organization of motion-picture-theater owners. At their annual convention in St. Louis, members of the organization voted unanimously to limit henceforth theater collections to one combined drive a year in which the American Red Cross, the Infantile Paralysis Foundation, and other agencies would participate.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Evening Bulletin of May 5, 1946]

HEALTH FUNDS

The annual financial appeal of the American Cancer Society has closed nearly two-thirds short of its goal of $78,480 in Rhode Island. This poor showing in the face of the universally recognized need for funds for cancer research, education, and service is in sharp contrast with the phenomenal success of the "march of dimes." The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis last year raised $106,358 in this State.

There can be little question that the need for money to finance the battle against cancer is far more vital than the requirements for infantile paralysis work. Next to heart disease, cancer is the greatest mass killer in the United States. It caused the deaths of 172,000 Americans in 1945, and it is conservatively estimated that there are now at least 700,000 cancer cases in this country. On the other hand poliomyelitis stands in fifty-second place by mortality in the list of diseases. The incidence of infantile paralysis during the past 30 years has averaged only 7,115 cases annually. About 1,200 persons died of cancer in Rhode Island last year, while there were only 8 cases—not deaths—from infantile paralysis. And yet Rhode Islanders are contributing about four times as much for infantile paralysis as for cancer work.

The failure of the cancer drive in this State provides another striking illustration of the point driven home with a profusion of facts and authoritative comment in the Journal-Bulletin series of articles on the voluntary health work field. The point is this: That under the present antiquated, chaotic, and confusing system of competitive appeals from the various voluntary health agencies, the distribution of funds donated by Americans to fight disease is largely governed by the effectiveness of an organization's money-raising technique rather than the relative importance of its work. Such distribution now happens to be almost exactly in reverse proportion to need. In other words, the less money an agency needs the more it gets under the present set-up.

The extent to which this deplorable condition prevails is shown in the series of articles published by this newspaper after an extensive survey of voluntary health agencies and interviews with more than 20 nationally prominent authorities. The National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis, set up to combat a relatively minor and rare disease, collected more than $16,000,000 last year. (The Rhode Island Infantile Paralysis Foundation uses the money it raises annually solely in Rhode Island, receiving an allowance from the national foundation for doing its field work here.) This was more than one-third of all the funds contributed to national voluntary health agencies in this country and more than was raised by all of the other agencies, except the National Tuberculosis Association, put together. The foundation has raised more than $62,000,000 since its founding in 1938 but has been able to spend only 51.7 percent of this sum. In the same period, the American Cancer Society managed to take in only slightly more than $6,000,000. All voluntary organizations fighting heart disease, the Nation's No. 1 killer, have only about $100,000 a year to spend.

What can be done to remedy this palpably undesirable and even dangerous state of affairs?

An eminently reasonable solution was recently proposed in the exhaustive study of voluntary health work made by Selskar M. Gunn, a vice president of the Rockefeller Foundation, and Dr. Philip S. Platt, executive director of the New York Association for the Blind, under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation. The solution is the unification of the present multiplicity of health agency appeals into a federated health fund campaign so that every dollar donated by Americans to fight disease may be utilized more effectively where it is most urgently needed.

A number of the authorities interviewed by a member of the Journal-Bulletin news staff have heartily endorsed this proposal for federation. Those who have done so include Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank and president of the National War Fund; Gerard Swope, former president of the General Electric Co. and chairman of the National War Fund's budget committee, and several other leading figures in public health and welfare activities. In urging unification in the voluntary health work field, these men have pointed to the achievements of the National War Fund and of the widespread net of local community chests as a telling demonstration of what can be accomplished through teamwork and the apportionment of funds on the basis of objective budgeting.

Federation would not only remedy the present glaring lack of balance in the distribution of voluntary health funds but would have several other beneficial results. It would replace separate and piecemeal planning by a well-thought-out, coordinated plan of attack on disease, without duplication or cross-purposes and without the serious gaps now existing in the health program. It would end the public confusion over the variety of health organizations now appealing for funds. It would allow the reduction of overhead and fund-raising costs.

Unfortunately, many obstacles stand in the way of unification. Divisive tendencies in the voluntary health field are of long standing and remain strong. Some of the agency officials have come to feel that they have an economic stake in the continued separate existence of their organizations and appear to be far more concerned with what has been described as their "private gold mines" than with the total picture of the battle against disease. The Infantile Paralysis Foundation and the National Tuberculosis Association are reported to be the most determined holdouts against federation.

The essential rationalization cannot be enforced by Government fiat. The last thing that those who prize highly the traditional functions of voluntary health and welfare agencies would want is to see them governed by decree from Washington. The job must be done by the agencies themselves through their governing boards. Its accomplishment can be helped along through the education of the donors of dollars and dimes—the real constituents whom the trustees of the various organizations are supposed to represent. These trustees must abandon their selfish attitude of parochial isolationism. They cannot go on viewing their own agencies as their private preserves but should learn to see them in the context of the total health problem of the Nation. At stake are the health and well-being of millions of American men, women, and children.

The Mead Committee Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio interview which occurred on July 28 between Lucian Warren, a newspaper representative, and myself, with reference to the work of our special committee.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WARREN. It is a privilege to welcome to this program again Senator JAMES M. MEAD, our own distinguished Buffalonian. I know you listeners have been reading and hearing a good deal about the current Mead committee investigation. It is the consensus of seasoned Washington observers that this investigation is the hottest case before any congressional committee since the Teapot Dome scandal. It has been on page one of the country's leading newspapers practically every day for 3 weeks. As the chairman of the committee looking into the fabulous war profiteering paper empire run by the Garsson brothers, our Senator MEAD can give an inside slant of what's happening in this complex case.

I am disappointed, and I know Senator MEAD is disappointed, that we cannot talk today about the appearance of the star witness, Congressman ANDREW J. MAY, of Kentucky. Mr. MAY has been repeatedly mentioned in the hearings as a man who was willing to put personal profit above patriotism. He was to have made his belated appearance before the committee on Friday morning. I say belated, because he refused to appear voluntarily to answer the charges against him, and he finally had to be subpenaed. But at the eleventh hour, the Congressman developed heart trouble, according to his physician, and the belated Mr. MAY became more belated.

Senator MEAD, let's hear from you some of the questions you want to ask Congressman MAY.

Mr. MEAD. We are very much interested, Lucian, in what became of certain sums of money paid by the Garssons to Mr. MAY or to the Cumberland Lumber Co., of which Congressman MAY was the Kentucky agent.

Mr. WARREN. Let's see, Senator, how much money was involved?

Mr. MEAD. The accounts show that the Garsson firms ordered $48,000 worth of lumber from the Cumberland company. This money was paid out, but strangely enough the lumber was never delivered. Of this $48,000 advance payment, we have evidence indicating that $28,000 was paid directly to Congressman MAY.

Mr. WARREN. Is that all the money involved?

Mr. MEAD. No, Lucian, we have some additional testimony by a secretary to the Washington representatives of the Garssons. This secretary spoke of $3,000 in cash being delivered to Congressman MAY by the Garsson interests at one point, and of two other $1,000 payments on other occasions. Our committee is very much interested in all these financial transactions, for it is against the law for a Representative or Senator to accept payment for services before any Government department or agency.

Mr. WARREN. After you have completed your questions on any financial gain Congressman MAY may have received from the Garssons, what other questions will you take up?

Mr. MEAD. We wish to go into the question very thoroughly of all the political pressure and influence he allegedly brought upon the War Department for favors to the Garssons.

Mr. WARREN. Speaking of the War Department, Senator, I suppose you could hardly call the military branch of our government blameless in this shady affair?

Mr. MEAD. I most certainly would not call them blameless. It is my personal opinion that the people in the War Department who handled these Garsson contracts fell down miserably on their job. They never investigated the character of the men to whom they handed out $78,000,000 in contracts. They gave the first contract for $3,000,000 to a newly formed company with no tangible assets, and advanced $1,000,000 secured by a bond which was rejected. They never obtained a good bond and mysteriously forgot the whole matter. The Chemical Warfare Service of the War Department promoted a $1,500 clerk to a legal adviser at $10,000 a year—a man named Albert Jacobson, who had resigned from the District of Columbia bar under fire. Time and again, War Department officials in Washington overruled and interfered with agents on the scene in Chicago where the Garssons were doing the work on their war contracts. Instead, some of the high-ranking officers at the War Department jumped around to please the Garssons and to lend tone, as one of them said, to their social affairs.

Mr. WARREN. Senator, the testimony before your committee has shown that five high Army officers went to New York to the Hotel Pierre to attend the wedding of Murray Garsson's daughter. Do you think that proper, in view of the fact these same officers were handling the Garsson contracts?

Mr. MEAD. That's what I call the "Mission Pierre." Here were three generals, two colonels, and a legal adviser, Jacobson, who got official orders to go on temporary duty to New York for procurement, administration, or research purposes. Maybe some of them did some work on the side, but the fact is that this simultaneous exodus of the whole headquarters staff of the Chemical Warfare Service had the single common purpose of drinking the Garsson's champagne and cavorting with the good-looking ladies of the Garsson household. Incidentally, the Government paid the officials transportation and subsistence, but Murray Garsson also paid most of their hotel bills, which looks like double payment. There is some suggestion that the Garssons tried to charge the expense of the whole affair to the Government. This is being checked.

Mr. WARREN. That was in January 1944, right in the middle of the war and a lot of hard fighting.

Mr. MEAD. Yes; it's a far cry from "Mission Pierre" to the mission of our boys overseas, who were landing on the beaches, braving death in the face of enemy fire. Right here, in this connection, the procurement people in the War Department were allowing defective shells to go to these men on the battle front. It was only when I read into the record that heartfelt complaints of two young officers about the 4.2 shells that we got information from Chemical Warfare that some of the shells turned out by these manufacturers were exploding in the mortars and killing our own men. That, remember, was the same Garsson group with which these Army officers in Chemical Warfare were on such close social terms. The committee is also obtaining the details on this matter.

Mr. WARREN. Should an officer such as Gen. Alden Waite, who went on "Mission Pierre," still be in charge of an important branch of the Army?

Mr. MEAD. The job of our committee, Mr. Warren, is to bring out all the facts. We are not an administrative agency and have no administrative powers, but my personal belief is that the War Department should consider this whole situation very carefully and take immediate steps to correct the glaring deficiencies in procurement practices disclosed in these 3 weeks of hearings. We are interested in the exposure of evils, but we are more interested in aiding in the development of sound defense procurement principles and practices.

Housing Profits—Public Versus Private

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Joseph H. Deckman, chairman, housing and rent control committee, Federation of Citizens' Associations of Washington:

HOUSING PROFITS—PUBLIC VERSUS PRIVATE

(By Joseph H. Deckman, chairman, housing and rent control committee, Federation of Citizens' Associations of Washington)

It is repeatedly stated by public housers that public housing does not contain a builder's or realtor's profit. To the unthinking and advocates of Government ownership of property this seems like a logical argument to use against private construction of all low-rent housing.

Analysis of this argument, like all the others in favor of public housing, discloses so many important flaws as to render it ridiculous.

Before entering on a discussion of the merits of the statement it might be well to ask the question: "Why is it a crime for private enterprise to make a profit?"

It is from profits that taxes are acquired to carry out the operation of the Government and to finance all of the social gains made in this country to date. Furthermore, taxes from private enterprise profits have given America the highest standard of living the world has ever known. Wages to labor are directly in proportion to the ability of American industry to increase the margin of profit so as to allow wage increases and still maintain proper reserves for maintenance and expansion of business.

Profits are the rewards which make the merit system work. It is the merit system which is the most equitable in distributing nature's favors and wordly goods.

But now let's return to the argument that public housing does not contain a profit and thereby its existence is justified in the housing of the low-income groups. Public housing, from the time a pick is stuck in the ground to dig the footings for a building until its final completion and operation, contains greater profits and their equivalents than does private enterprise.

Almost all public housing is built by private contractors who either work on a guaranteed profit through cost-plus contracts or through normal bidding processes. In either case a profit is made as only a comparatively few large commercial building contractors are allowed to bid on public housing. This is due to the United States Labor Department ruling that union commercial building scale wages must be paid on all Government work. This eliminates the average home builders who are the experts in the construction of all types of housing.

Not only is a profit contained in the construction of public housing but a cost of from 25 to 40 percent more has to be borne by the taxpayer as a result of the employment of commercial contractors and Government red tape in the construction of this type of housing.

Another enormous profit in public housing results from the fees paid for engineering and architectural services. These costs are many times those of private enterprise in the home-building field.

Fees paid to engineers and architects are based on a percentage of total costs of projects, whereas private-enterprise builders either perform these services themselves or only pay for the work performed. For example, most public-housing projects seldom contain more than two or three typical housing units and these are varied throughout the entire project.

This means that very little architectural work is necessary on the basic designs, yet a fee is paid on the total project cost instead of the units designed. All of this cost is found in public housing even though a full-time staff of so-called qualified engineers, planners and architects are maintained in the overhead cost of public-housing agencies at the taxpayers' expense.

It has been previously mentioned that public housing embodies not only profits in its construction and maintenance but the equivalent of profits as normally defined.

By this is meant the salaries that are paid to the personnel of public-housing agencies. It can also be added that these salaries or wage profits are guaranteed by the taxpayers and are not subject to the risks and hazards that confront private enterprise before profit is made. The agencies which contain an abundance of salaried workers include the National Housing Agency, the Federal Public Housing Agency, and all the many local public housing agencies scattered throughout the country.

Due to the inefficient operation of the public housing, the management costs of projects are more than double the going rate of management cost of private enterprise. This private rate strangely enough pays a profit for tax purposes.

All of the salaries paid to executives and the personnel of public housing can be compared to private enterprise profits as they are a cost chargeable to the rents and subsidies needed to operate public housing.

These overhead costs are the primary cause of the huge subsidies and tax exemptions needed for public housing. They are also the reasons why the indigent citizens and those really needing housing are left to public welfare for attention while public housing concerns itself with housing the upper crust of the lower third and the bottom portion of the middle class wage earners. As a matter of fact more than 70 percent of those housed in public housing can afford to pay private rents for comparable housing, due to the tenant selection policies of public housers.

It is significant to note that public housers continually condemn profits and all the other fundamentals of the American business system on which the American way of life is based. By this method the issue is confused so that the scheme to sneak over state socialism on America can be accomplished.

The reactionary philosophy of stateism has as its basis the destruction of private property and all the benefits accrued toward individual liberty and freedom which have been accomplished under the American way of life.

It is about time that America in general and private business in particular, awakens to the danger that threatens to engulf the time-tested profit system and sweep it into state socialism.

Voluntary Alcohol Control Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLYDE R. HOEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix to the RECORD a statement and plan for reducing the use and consumption of alcoholic liquors which has been prepared by Mrs. Annie Ihrie Pou Wadden, one of the outstanding women of Washington. Mrs. Wadden is a North Carolinian, and daughter of the late lamented Edward W. Pou, who was a distinguished Representative in Congress from North Carolina for 33 years and until his death in 1934. Mrs. Wadden is the mother of three children of college age, and is tremendously interested in the preservation of the home and in protecting the youth of the land from the devastating effects of the excessive use of alcoholic beverages. Mrs. Wadden denominates the plan which she proposes as the Voluntary Alcohol Control Plan. This represents the views of many with whom she has discussed this important question. Her statement follows.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CHALLENGE

Mr. and Mrs. and Miss America, and all young people: During this most perilous period of our history, of all times, national liabilities should be reduced to a minimum. Is our drinking custom a national liability or asset? If a liability, we can reduce it, by individual cooperation with the voluntary alcohol control plan for discouraging alcoholic drinking. At present, we treat our custom as an asset:

We spent $674,000,000 more on beverage alcohol in the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1946, than in the preceding year:

Expenditure on beverage alcohol, fiscal year ending June 30, 1946, $7,770,000;

Expenditure on beverage alcohol, fiscal year ending June 30, 1945, $7,096,000. (U. S. Department of Commerce, July 17, 1946.)

Increase at the end of February over the beginning of February, 1946 (1 month) in storaged hard liquor, 15,000,000 gallons.

Increase in 1946 over 1945, in manufacture of whisky and spirits made from grains, 142 percent. (Statistics quoted from newspaper by Representative JERRY VOORHIS, regarding his bill H. R. 325.)

There is incontrovertible evidence that the alcohol issue is a recognized public health, economic and social problem. The theory that the issue is controversial is archaic and evasive.

For far too long, we have listened to the liquor traffic's suggestions about drink, to the tune of an estimated seventy-five to one hundred million dollars in recent year. Isn't it time that the voice of the home is heard on that subject? Listen, please to this voice:

Our broad-scale drinking custom jeopardizes the better progress, happiness and security of the home and thus, of the Nation. Liquor's contribution to crime, juvenile and adult delinquency, insanity, disease, divorce, indigency, and intolerable waste, is a matter of startling record, available to the public in scientific departments, Government departments, police courts, and in State, county, and municipal institutions. Liquor is at the bottom of many of our public health, economic, and social problems. By condensing public sentiment against habitual drinking, the voluntary alcohol control plan aims to dynamite to "that bottom." We now squander time, money, and energy, in merely tapping the tops of these problems.

We generously contribute to the praiseworthy Red Cross and other drives such as the campaign against infantile paralysis. Drink addiction is a more nationally disastrous scourge than infantile paralysis. Of our neglect of proper effort for eradicating drink addiction, I quote:

"We sit on a volcano to swat a fly. Applied to public health, we see people die, murder, and go insane through excessive use of alcohol without evoking a murmur from the public or a gesture from the health officer, while a rare disease that has caused the death of half a dozen people in some obscure place becomes a matter of public concern. Alcohol has caused more deaths than any one of the 31 infectious diseases; some of which were veritable scourges." (Dr. Lawrence Kelb, former Assistant Surgeon General, U. S. Public Health Department.)

Let us wake up. Let us put first things first, in our effort to aid humanity. Let us inaugurate an annual voluntary alcohol control drive with as much punch and as many posters and slogans as other drives. Counter American home ingenuity for "preservation of happiness through fitness" against the liquor traffic's lure of "relaxation through drink." Capture the support of radio, press, pulpit, schools, colleges, and organizations of your community for the VAC plan of disseminating fact about the result of drink upon the person and State, in pamphlets, slogans, and posters. Face fashionable society with its great responsibility and power for checking drink. In every community, the dust of the upper crust seeps down through the cracks of humanity, to the less privileged or even to the underprivileged, below. Reduce the handicap of drink and we reduce the need for charity, for crime prevention and medical care.

Last year our cocktail lounges, night clubs, liquor restaurants, liquor dining rooms and taverns served alcoholic beverages to a large percentage of America's 50,000,000 drinkers. (Number of drinkers, estimated, Dr. E. M. Jellinek, Yale University.) The liquor traffic's invasion of our American way of life is a challenge to you and to me to repel it. The liquor traffic would be wise to begin its own retreat. The VAC plan courts such cooperation. Part of the casualty from the liquor traffic's invasion; 3,000,000 excessive drinkers; 750,000 chronic alcoholics; 40,000 new alcoholics yearly (Dr. E. M. Jellinek).

Just the average mother, who refuses to take the master minding of the liquor traffic sitting down. I am rising up to stand for much that is dearest in life, when, in my plea for better citizenship through greater resistance to social drinking, I pit my voice-of-the-home against the liquor traffic's. Will you help augment that voice to the point of giving the Nation chance for response, by your support and projection of the VAC plan?

FACTUAL PROOF OF THE NEED FOR VOLUNTARY ALCOHOL CONTROL

Our patriarch of wisdom, Mr. Bernard Baruch, has sagely suggested that we take inventory before we proceed further with reconstruction. Let us evaluate our drinking custom from fact and act upon it.

1. In 1944, we spent more on beverage alcohol than on the general running of our Government, minus expenditures on war. (U. S. Departments of Treasury and Commerce.)

2. In 1944 our drinking custom cost our Nation more than the combined expenditure for Red Cross, Community Chest, and campaign against infantile paralysis, the churches and their charities, and relief departments of the Government—such as social security, and education of every kind, including public libraries. Should not such loss of economic equilibrium be corrected, if we are to stand most securely?

3. To refute the theory that revenue from alcoholic beverage taxes is an asset: In the one State of Massachusetts, in 1943, the liability from drink was almost five times the alcoholic beverage taxes received by the Commonwealth and cities.

Total annual probable cost, mental patients, financial dependence upon others, and crime, all due to inebriety, $61,000,000. Alcoholic beverage taxes, $13,139,266.79. (Special committee study drunkenness, filed Massachusetts Legislature, Mar. 6, 1945.)

4. To prove that revenue from alcoholic beverage tax entails terrific liability to our Nation: To the $7,770,000,000 spent on beverage alcohol in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1946, add reports of cost incurred by alcoholic drink from the police, jail, welfare department, hospital, insane asylum, divorce court, accident and sick benefits, unemployment insurance. Compare this total with the United States Government revenue on alcohol-beverage tax, fiscal year to May 30, 1946, $2,327,669,922.59 (to be increased probably more than $200,000,000 by June report, not available to date). (U. S. Department of Commerce and Bureau of Internal Revenue, July 17, 1946.)

5. One out of every five fatal automobile accidents due to drinking in 1942. What might be the percentage now? (Dr. D. S. Berry, U. S. Safety Council.)

IS ALCOHOL AN ESSENTIAL?

"There is no personality structure that makes a need for alcohol." "In each and every case whatever function is under observation, whatever method is used, whatever the amount of alcohol, whatever the errors made, the end result is always impairment and never stimulation." (Dr. E. M. Jellinek, assistant head of physiology, Yale University, authority on alcohol.)

The American Red Cross First Aid Text Book, page 6, revised 1945: "Whisky and brandy are not proper first-aid stimulants. They may do considerable harm. Hot tea and hot coffee are satisfactory particularly if the patient is cold."

A BRIEF OUTLINE OF THE VOLUNTARY ALCOHOL CONTROL PLAN

If cure is important, prevention is imperative.

It is not the alcoholic (stop signal) but the moderate frequent drinker (go signal) supporting our broad-scale drinking custom and best concealing his impairment, who is the problem drinker. He decoys new candidates to the use of a drug that causes impairment always, and can cause enslavement, too often. Arouse his sense of responsibility.

Original purpose of voluntary alcohol control: To insure sooner and safer return of our armed forces from battle front by increasing efficiency along the home front, through a trend for reduced drinking.

The present purpose of voluntary alcohol control: Through encouragement from some college presidents, the voluntary alcohol control appeal is continued to develop a trend for making it easy instead of difficult for our returned armed forces not to drink by removing suggestions to drink in food and in fun; thus to win the peace and to fortify the future.

To gage the power of trends: Please compare some ideas which have developed into trends, more luxury, better sanitation, shorter working hours, better health. Why, then, should not the idea of voluntary alcohol control, expressing a need of the moment, develop into a powerful trend?

The voluntary alcohol control plan creed: "By word and example, I will discourage frequent, promiscuous drinking to better mental and physical fitness of the individual and to promote the national welfare."

The VAC plan does not presume to curtail individual rights but places special emphasis upon the obligation of individuals to use in unity together the power that is theirs, to check drink. The plan appeals to every man and every organization, but especially does it appeal to:

(a) The individual who drinks.

(b) The prospective drinker.

(c) To one unaccustomed to assuming responsibility about the alcohol problem.

(d) To all young people in and out of college and high school, and to their fraternities and other clubs.

Not an organization but an idea, the voluntary alcohol control plan is intended to be absorbed by individuals and organizations, and projected upon the resources of each. The VAC plan creates a custom instead of a law.

The VAC plan emphasizes total abstinence as the ideal estate, but values any degree of drink discouragement whether abolition or reduction.

A VAC suggestion: "If a total abstainer, remain one; if not one, become one; if total abstinence is not acceptable, drink the least feasible—one drink only, to set the precedent for reduced drink."

The Voluntary Alcohol Control plan is intended to carry information and not condemnation; to convince and not to criticize; to educate citizens to act upon fact. The author writes in vain if tolerance is not exercised. To support or to oppose drinking is the individual's privilege. The attendant discussion or decision, which should be based upon fact and not emotion, should not alter friendships or guest lists. The plan proposes to arouse the individual to his responsibility to use the power that is his to develop a trend for discouraging drink. Milton said: "A nation is a person and accountable to God."

TO PROMOTE VOLUNTARY ALCOHOL CONTROL

1. Arouse all but especially civic organizations, to their obligation for listing as a prime project, the solution of our economic-, public health-, social-alcohol problem.

2. Appeal in person or in group to our President, to State governors, and to the other proper authorities to support the Voluntary Alcohol Control idea and the idea of naming an annual Voluntary Alcohol Control day for the purpose of collecting and disseminating facts about the result of beverage alcohol upon the person and state.

3. Quarantine against alcohol by reducing exposure.

4. Label drinking alcohol what it is; a depressant; a sedative in small doses; an anesthetic in large doses. State the dosage of each, as in other sedatives, barbital, trinol, veronal, and luminal, with warnings against overdosage, according to the Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906. Ask your Congressman to uphold this suggestion in the form of a bill.

5. Revive the tea vogue. Let must-be cocktails dwindle and substitutes increase. Revert to the previous custom of having alcohol an accompaniment and not the dominant feature of the entertainment if you will not more wisely discard the use of alcohol.

6. Deglamorize beverage alcohol by glamorizing inherent social graces.

7. Point to the matchless power and definite responsibility of hostesses, America's sweethearts, and influential citizens, in and out of the Government, for outmoding our broad-scale drinking custom.

8. Emphasize the importance of prevention ahead of and in connection with cure.

9. Court, rather than condemn, cooperation from the liquor traffic, which could smartly choose voluntary to mandatory control of alcohol, by radically reducing advertisements to drink, volume of business and drinking places, for the betterment of their war heroes, who sacrificed, not only their business but their all, at the front for the security of us back home.

10. Establish summer institutes for studying the result of liquor upon the person and state. Combine Olympic games, competitive talent, epic drama—keep in mind the chautauquas of former days.

11. Place prescribed or original VAC posters or slogans in public places, stores, restaurants, hotels, and apartment houses (in lobbies, elevators, dining rooms, on stationery, menus, and telephones) office buildings, schools, colleges, newspapers, magazines, trains, busses, taxis, and streetcars, bus and streetcar stop signs, traffic stop signs, telegraph blanks and milk bottles.

12. Compile reports pertaining to alcohol from local police, jail, traffic departments and hospitals; from United States Departments of Bureau of Internal Revenue, Treasury, Commerce; and Public Health, and from all State departments.

13. Base promotion to and retention of responsible position in part, upon reputation for sobriety, whether on or off duty.

14. Call community mass meetings of religious, civic, and social organizations for the purpose of discovering new remedies for our national alcohol difficulties.

SOME VAC CONCLUSIONS

1. That opposition to prohibition, does not absolve a citizen from responsibility to seek another solution.

2. That we cannot solve the alcohol problem by doing nothing about it.

3. That the chief solution of the alcohol problem rests in correcting the drinking custom.

4. That it is preposterous to attempt to catch the gushing leak from the flow of alcohol with the small vessel of cure when we need to get up on the roof and mend the leak with prevention.

5. That the above-reproach drinker cannot rely upon such reputation, but should decline to conform to our drinking custom, even though not embracing total abstinence, to do his part in breaking the compulsion in the custom.

6. That the contention it is the person and not alcohol that makes the alcoholic is, at least, 60 percent fallacious, according to scientific calculation. While the "40 percent correct" includes neurotics who become alcoholics with a bang, the "60 percent come from entirely normal origin" (quotation, Dr. E. M. Jellinek, Yale University). "Normal origin" is our drinking custom.

The voluntary alcohol control plan is submitted not only to win your support and inform you but to consult you. Any suggestion will be gratefully received.

THE VOLUNTARY ALCOHOL CONTROL PLAN SLOGANS

1. Greater national strength through greater freedom from habitual drinking.

2. It is not the alcoholic but our custom of frequent drinking that recruits excessive drinkers. Correct the custom.

3. If cure is important, prevention is imperative.

4. Better citizenship through greater resistance to drink.

5. Heal diseased social attitude toward drinking with the drinkers.

6. Bottle morale is not building morale.

7. Greater freedom from fear and failure through greater freedom from beverage alcohol.

8. Less drinking everywhere, more national security.

9. Superiority, greater progress and security through sobriety.

10. To solve the alcohol problem, conviction is a greater power than compulsion.

11. More power in a deed performed voluntarily than forcibly.

12. Drink less; achieve more; save money; build homes.

13. Less drinking, better thinking.

14. Good health through right food and sobriety; reconstruction through strength.

15. Less liquor, build quicker.

16. For diversion, use your head instead of the bottle.

Let such slogans be seen as often as liquor advertisements.

MRS. ANNIE IHRIE POU WADDEN.

The Facts About Cancer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "Gentlemen of Congress: Let's Face the Facts About Cancer," written by Quentin Reynolds and published in the Washington Post of July 28, 1946. I subscribe to the recommendation which he makes for the early consideration of the legislation referred to.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF CONGRESS: LET'S FACE THE FACTS ABOUT CANCER—AN APPEAL BY QUENTIN REYNOLDS

The time has come when it is imperative to talk about a deadly killer and what we can do to stay its hand.

Before the House of Representatives is the Neely bill. Its counterpart in the Senate is the Pepper bill. This joint measure provides $100,000,000 for research into the cause and cure of cancer. It is a long-time, continuing research program.

Gentlemen, that measure must pass!

There are 17,000,000 Americans doomed to die of cancer unless we do something about it. During 1946 approximately 90,000 women, 83,000 men, and 2,000 children will be its victims. That is 478 every day—20 every hour—1 every 3 minutes. Some of these cancer victims will be your own constituents, for no one is safe from cancer. Its toll is appalling. From Pearl Harbor to VJ-day cancer killed more than twice as many Americans as were killed or were listed as missing in action due to the Nazis and Japs combined.

But let's look at it another way.

The Neely-Pepper bill provides $100,000,000 for continuing research over a period of years. That's a lot of money—but every year cancer causes our Nation an economic loss of at least $900,000,000. That is no fanciful figure. It is the result of a cold analytical survey made by insurance companies and statisticians.

There is no person today who has not had some relative or friend who died of cancer. We know that awful feeling of helplessness—that realization that there is nothing we can do, personally, to save the victim.

The measure now up for consideration makes it possible for us to act. It may take years of research, but in the end when the cause and cure of cancer have been found, we will consider every dollar well spent.

I urge you to speed this measure before Congress adjourns. The lives of millions may depend on your vote. I am certain I am supported in my thinking by every American.

The next time you face your constituents, be proud to say, "I voted for the $100,000,000 cancer research bill because I know it makes possible a campaign to save lives—perhaps yours or even my own."

Presented as a public service by Quentin Reynolds in behalf of 17,000,000 Americans doomed to die of cancer unless we do something about it.

The Right To Strike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "'Right to Strike' Weighed Against Interest of Public," written by Daniel S. Ring, and published in the Washington Star of July 21, 1946.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"RIGHT TO STRIKE" WEIGHED AGAINST INTEREST OF PUBLIC—OBSERVER SEES NATURAL TREND TOWARD A NEW APPROACH TO SETTLEMENT OF SOME CURRENT PROBLEMS IN INDUSTRIAL FIELD

(By Daniel S. Ring)

(Mr. Ring, a Washington attorney, served during the war as a labor relations officer for the Maritime Commission.)

Once upon a time it was regarded as a matter of absolute right for a man or a group of men owning a business to close it down, throw all employees out of work, and keep the plant doors locked until the owner or owners in their own sound judgment felt impelled to reopen on their own terms.

Once upon a time it was regarded as a matter of absolute right for two or more owners of certain properties to combine resources, corner markets, and fix their own price and profit for the goods sold. If they wished to "squeeze out" the little fellow nobody stopped them. They could under-cut prices until a market price far below cost would eventually send the little man to the wall.

Such activities continued until pressure from the public prodded public representatives into regulating practices that threatened the public interest. The corrective was law. Law against trusts and monopolies. Law against restraint of trade. Law against unfair combinations. Law requiring collective bargaining.

The concept of a government by law as distinguished from a government by men has been our greatest national treasure. If a citizen is defrauded today, or injured by anyone, his recourse under a government by law is the courts. We have to resort to courts and law, regardless of the fact that quicker and more satisfying means of redress, such as brute force, are sometimes available.

ENFORCED WORK QUESTIONED

Only short weeks ago we were faced with the shut-down of one of our basic fuels, with resultant stoppages of the plants that give us light and power, of transportation that brings us our food and supplies, all of the necessities of life. Again, from another source we were faced with the paralysis of transportation.

On the heels of the threat came strident clamor for relief. Panic-bred frenzy produced proposals directly akin to totalitarian methods. A few cool, calm, courageous figures argued for dispassionate, far-seeing planning. The President suggested a drastic stop-gap and then followed up by more reasonable suggestions of long-range policy planning.

The problem is a delicate one. It involves freedom. Can men be free if they are forced to work by government edict? Do not the people who contend that the government is theirs become mere pawns of their government if that government can force them to work at the point of a bayonet?

On the other hand, can a minority in a democratic nation rule, starve, freeze or dictate to a majority, even if the minority has been subjected to unfairness, indecency, inequity and exploitation? Is the government supreme or must it cede its sovereignty to a strategically powerful minority of the people? Is "the right to strike" a really sacred right?

TWO PROPOSITIONS CITED

In searching for an answer, let us proceed analytically and dispassionately.

Proposition 1. No group of citizens has a right under any circumstances to starve its fellow citizens. This is axiomatic.

Proposition 2. Any group of citizens making substantial contributions to the daily life of all the citizens is certainly entitled to a return for such contribution in some fair ratio to its value.

For the sake of argument with respect to this proposition, let us suppose that the coal miner, who is essential in providing a commodity that moves our industry, gives us warmth and brings us our food and supplies, feels that he is being rewarded for that contribution with a pig-sty for a home and a trash dump for a lawn. He certainly cannot be criticized, then, if that be the case, for fixing his mind on procuring more decent conditions.

Still for the sake of argument, let it be admitted that decent living conditions comprise the end he seeks. Then we come to the first step in the analysis.

We must now distinguish between a proper end, on the one hand, and on the other, the means employed to attain it. Admitting the propriety of the end, let us evaluate the propriety of the means.

RIGHT TO STRIKE LIMITED

Is a strike which deprives lovers of eurythmic dancing of the enjoyment of that art, or a devotee of fine gems from getting a beautiful diamond, in the same category with a strike that keeps food from all urban tables, lights from all our cities and warmth from homes in zero winter weather?

Hitherto the right to strike has generally been regarded as an unassailable basic right of a free worker. Recent events, however, now indicate that no matter how closely or inseparably the right to work or refrain from working, individually or collectively, is bound to freedom, there may be a higher right to which even this one is subservient. The higher right in a democracy is the protection of the people's sovereignty, which is the maintenance of the welfare of the Nation.

Recent events have made clear what hitherto has been a vague understanding—that the right to strike has its limits. Yes, even though voluntarism and democracy have for their cornerstones the right of workers to work or refuse to work, nevertheless it has come to be realized that a cornerstone cannot truly serve its purpose if it pulls its building down. It has become clear that the right to strike reaches its limits when it imperils a society which otherwise it supports.

There are many strikes which do not and will not seriously imperil the public interest or the public welfare. Between those that do not affect the public welfare and those which jeopardize it, somewhere, someone must draw a dividing line if the limitations of the right to strike are to be properly defined.

Who shall draw the dividing line? Who shall make the determination? In this sort of a democracy, when serious national problems confront the Government, the theory is that the people themselves act to protect their Government. If this is a Government by law, it seems logical that the representatives of the people themselves, the House and Senate, by joint resolution, are the ones who should draw the dividing line between the strike which harms the national welfare and the one that does not. If and when a strike threatens national prostration, certainly it is sufficiently serious to claim the immediate attention of the House and Senate, each body acting as a committee of the whole or in such other way as will guarantee careful consideration and deliberate determination of the issue.

Some timid souls will inquire, "How would labor take all this?" The answer is that labor is a name for a collection of millions of individuals who are just as good, true, and sincere Americans as any other group.

Labor will certainly fight antilabor bills which it sincerely believes are aimed at the destruction of unionism, but we can all be certain that labor will support any measure sincerely designed for the protection of this country and the welfare of the people, even though such protection may put some restriction on labor's activities.

It was not the president of the National Association of Manufacturers who was quoted with regard to the railway strike recently as follows: "Anyone possessed of an elementary knowledge of labor relations would have known that a strike against the Government was foredoomed to failure." The quotation came from the head of the locomotive firemen and enginemen, D. B. Robertson, whose union stood with 18 other railway unions against the strike called by the railway trainmen and locomotive engineers.

SWITCHMEN'S HEAD BACKS TRUMAN

It was not the newly elected president of the United States Chamber of Commerce who remarked, "Why should labor criticize him (Truman) for doing the only thing he could do under the circumstances?" That was Tom Cashen, chief of the switchmen's union.

So let's not be too timid about labor's reaction to a bill that is primarily evolved in the interests of the national welfare when it is shown that that interest is one which must remain paramount for the benefit of all our people and all groups of them.

Nevertheless since we must preserve the right to work or not to work so long as it does not imperil the national welfare, any law which checks that right in the interest of the national welfare must have a safeguard thrown about it to prevent intemperate, ill-advised, or capricious determinations. No greater safeguard could be devised than one which requires joint deliberation and determination by our legislative bodies in each instance where it appears that a strike will impair the national welfare. This sort of law would be a law of national self-defense. And still, if the people, acting to defend themselves under the protection of such a law, are compelled to strip from any group the means whereby such a group seeks improved conditions and the redress of inequities, there arises a reciprocal obligation to substitute for an illegal strike an adequate alternative.

Remembering that the strike is merely a means to an end, the time to set up alternative means is not in the chaos of a crisis. Let the same law which provides for the determination of an illegal strike set up machinery whereby it will be possible speedily to examine conflicting claims, justly to assay relative equities and effectively to provide adequate redress for such wrongs as are determined to exist. Let the machinery be always ready for use when the need arises. Let this machinery be placed on the highest possible platform we can provide.

URGES OUTSTANDING REFEREES

What should this machinery consist of? How should it operate? These are matters for careful and close attention of the legislators who would be considering the bill. One thought occurs. The men who are selected as the country's referees in such industrial clashes should be able to command the respect of all our people. In the writer's opinion, Bernard Baruch is such a man. So is Charles Evans Hughes. Eric Johnston, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and Senator Morse are of such stature. Three such men could be designated as the Nation's highest industrial referees. A working organization, not necessarily numerous but capable of expansion in time of need, should be provided so that at the moment legislative determination is made that a strike imperils national welfare, the machinery can be galvanized into action. General rules for proper hearings, general authority for adequate determinations, all necessary procedural formats could be provided.

All of this naturally requires study and analytical planning. It may prove to be the first step in a sane and logical readjustment of our national economy. Because basic free rights are involved, such a step must not be taken precipitately.

It is not beyond the realm of possibility that one day everyone will recognize the lack of economic logic in industrial warfare and the economic loss that ensues when production is stopped as the means of attaining justice. Later we may come to the day when the desirability of an industrial code and streamlined procedure in an industrial court of the same relative dignity as a District Court of the United States may be critically and calmly evaluated. Some day in the future it may be found that the answer to the strike as a means to an end may well be peaceful, fair, and adequate settlement of labor disputes under a fair law in an impartial court. All these are matters for the future.

The Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Poll Tax Bill Again," from the Columbia State of July 24 last.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLL TAX BILL AGAIN

Once more the poll tax bill rears its head in the Senate. It is again on the calendar of the Upper Chamber. And Democratic Leader BARKLEY has said that he will call up the bill before Congress adjourns.

The State regretted that the Kearse bill, which passed the South Carolina Senate but failed in the house, was not passed. We see no sound reason why the poll tax should not be repealed. And we believe the people of South Carolina would be glad to see it wiped out, since it is of no value but a decided irritant. However, there is a right way and a wrong way to do a thing, and the right way to repeal the poll tax is by State action, not Federal. Therefore, while we favored action by our State assembly looking toward repeal, we are just as opposed to any action by Congress telling us what to do. And for the very simple reason that the Federal Constitution gives to each State the right to set its own voting requisites, and it is none of the business of Congress what the voting requisites are in South Carolina or any other State.

Legislation favoring repeal was passed by the National House of Representatives where southern Democrats were outvoted and had no recourse. But in the Senate it is different, and while it is regretted that it will be necessary to invoke filibuster again, that is what will be done if Senator BARKLEY insists on testing the bill on its merits.

If Congress wished to submit an amendment to the Constitution to the people of the United States, there would not be the objection to it that there is to direct legislation seeking to force abandonment of the poll tax by the seven States which still have it, for it would be an orderly procedure.

As a matter of fact, the poll tax keeps no one from voting in South Carolina who really wishes to vote. It is only $1, is not paid by women, and by men only between certain age limits. But there is a principle involved when Congress tries to dictate voting requisites to States in violation of the Constitution. And that is the point.

The Pearl Harbor Report—Editorial From Newark (N. J.) News

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Point of Departure," published in the Newark (N. J.) News of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POINT OF DEPARTURE

Pearl Harbor, to most of us, seems an event in our remote past. None of us is apt to forget how the first news reached him on the afternoon of December 7, 1941, or how the first, incredulous shock was transformed in an hour into a sense of common involvement in a desperate hazard affecting our national existence. But those emotions became less sharp as the strains and sacrifices of the war itself were imposed upon millions of American homes.

So we are able to read the final report of the congressional investigation of Pearl Harbor without passion. And it is in a spirit of calm retrospect that it is written. The report finds that Japan, not President Roosevelt, was responsible for the attack on our fleet; it places the immediate fault for the failure of our defenses upon the Pearl Harbor commanders—Admiral Kimmel and General Short; it examines the fundamental disabilities of our methods of intelligence and command, and suggests reforms that are of special importance now that we have passed into the age of atomic fission.

The lives lost at Pearl Harbor cannot be restored. But the fleet was restored, our defenses, at great cost, were made good, and we were able to wage an offensive war in the Pacific based upon a preponderant sea and air power, both of which Japan had challenged, with such striking, initial success.

All that need be known, doubtless all that can be known, about Pearl Harbor is now set forth. As a government and as a people, we still have to learn how to stand firm and resolute on all matters pertaining to our national defense. For the top command of the armed services, there are more specific lessons set forth in the Pearl Harbor report. If this statesmanlike document is taken as a point of departure rather than the end of a once acrimonious probe, we shall profit from the sound knowledge gained at such terrible cost.

The Pearl Harbor Report—Editorial From the Chicago Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Pearl Harbor Report," published in the Chicago Times of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEARL HARBOR REPORT

While the joint congressional committee investigating the Pearl Harbor disaster was in session, there seemed little hope that a constructive and useful end would be reached.

The members of the committee—six Democrats and four Republicans—rowed and jawed and indulged in such political maneuverings as to make almost a farce out of the 3-month procedure of seeking the facts about one of the Nation's greatest military catastrophes.

It is, therefore, doubly pleasant to be able to say that the findings of the committee are sound; that they ought to contribute substantially to the prevention of any such future happening; that they are historically accurate.

This holds not only for the majority report, signed by 8 of the 10 committee members, but likewise for the reservations expressed by Representative FRANK B. KEEFE, of Wisconsin, and the minority dissent of Republican Senators HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, and OWEN BREWSTER, of Maine.

Probably the most outstanding quality distinguishing the reports is their reasonableness: They recognize the fact that human beings fall into human errors. They condemn the errors, but make no accusations of venality or criminality.

It is impossible to do more than touch upon the highlights of the 15,000 words of "conclusions and recommendations" reached in the three separate reports. But there are certain important points. No. 1, from the majority report, is this:

"The committee found no evidence to support the charges made before and during the hearings, that the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy tricked, provoked, incited, cajoled, or coerced Japan into attacking this Nation in order that a declaration of war might be more easily obtained from Congress. On the contrary, all evidence conclusively points to the fact that they discharged their responsibilities with distinction, ability, and foresight and in keeping with the highest traditions of our fundamental foreign policy."

This is of prime importance. The principal reason for the Pearl Harbor investigation was the charge made by the Chicago Tribune, its affiliates, the New York News, and the Washington Times-Herald, by the Hearst press and by such individuals as the economist-writer John T. Flynn that President Roosevelt and his associates had deliberately conspired to make Japan attack the United States.

It is of extreme significance to note that this charge was unanimously rejected by the committee.

Five of the Democrats signing the report fairly may be labeled "New Dealers," or 100 percent Roosevelt men. But not conservative Senator WALTER GEORGE, of Georgia, most noted of all Mr. Roosevelt's purgees.

Certainly Representative KEEFE and Representative BERTRAND GEARHART, California Republican, who also signed the majority report, made every effort during the hearings to develop just that point. But they could not develop it, because it simply was not so. Nor do Senator FERGUSON, of Michigan, nor Senator BREWSTER, of Maine, make that charge in their dissent.

Mr. KEEFE's "reservations" to the majority report, and the dissents by Messrs. FERGUSON and BREWSTER, hinge primarily upon the fact that there were going on, under Mr. Roosevelt's direction, many very delicate diplomatic maneuvers with Japan about which the American public was insufficiently informed. We were in much greater danger of war than the people were allowed to know.

That charge seems fairly justified. There was too much of a hush-hush atmosphere in our dealings with Japan—and too little of the spirit of "open covenants, openly arrived at" which Woodrow Wilson so strongly advocated.

Gen. Walter C. Short and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, the Hawaiian commanders in 1941, come in for severe criticism by the committee. But the report states plainly that they were guilty only of "errors of judgment and not derelictions of duty."

This acknowledgment should do much to rectify the undue blame which has been attached to Kimmel and Short.

In fact, in a reading of the full report of the committee, these became weak words. For at least equal blame is assigned to the high Navy and Army authorities in Washington for their failure to assess the situation accurately and to keep the outpost commands properly advised. About that more later. For now, in conclusion, it may be said that the Pearl Harbor report is a fair and honest summary of tragic errors made by many persons.

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "No Betrayal at Pearl Harbor," published in the Evansville (Ind.) Courier of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO BETRAYAL AT PEARL HARBOR

The congressional Pearl Harbor investigating committee, in placing the weight of responsibility on the Army and Navy and specifically on Admiral Kimmel and General Short, agrees in the main with findings of all previous inquiries.

Two Republicans joined in this report with six Democrats. Two other Republicans, Senators BREWSTER, of Maine, and FERGUSON, of Michigan, turned in a minority report, saying that Mr. Roosevelt and Cabinet officers must share responsibility for the failures that led to disaster.

The last inquiry report is in line with majority opinion: That there was confusion, lack of coordination, and lack of foresight, but that there was no betrayal of America, as many either have charged or hinted.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Japan's Blunder," published in the Christian Science Monitor, of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPAN'S BLUNDER

The full-dress report of the long Pearl Harbor investigation confirms first impressions—the United States was not ready for war on December 7, 1941. The inquiry brought out many interesting sidelights but has not greatly changed the picture.

As political dynamite the investigation has proved a dud. Those who hoped to explode President Roosevelt's reputation by showing that he purposely "baited" Japan with an unguarded Pearl Harbor signally failed to produce evidence to support their claim. And no straining of interpretation could make Cordell Hull rather than Hideki Tojo the aggressor.

The inquiry has brought to light the fact that Washington shared—as did the whole country—the mental unpreparedness for which the field commanders were blamed. And in some degree it has justified the charge that Washington should have done more to alert the field commanders.

One point that deserves much more study and discussion is Representative KEEFE's statement that the American people and even the commanders were not aware of the lengths to which American diplomacy had gone. He says that since Tokyo and London had both been assured that the United States would go to war if Japan attacked Malaya or the Dutch Indies, Americans also should have known. But even those who did were surprised.

For from a political standpoint—if not also militarily in the long run—Pearl Harbor was a Japanese blunder. Anyone who can recall the temper of American opinion in 1941—far more aroused against the Nazis than against the Japanese—realizes that it would have been a long and difficult process to have united the American people to go to war in support of Britain or the Dutch in the Pacific. How many Americans considered Malaya or the Indies worth a war?

If it was necessary quickly to unite Americans to fight, Pearl Harbor was indispensable. But those who claimed that because of that fact President Roosevelt plotted it, could not distort the very evident surprise of the President and his military advisers. It was precisely because there had been so little provocation that they were surprised. Because they expected Japan to be sane and avoid as long as possible a clash with America they were unprepared. It was because Pearl Harbor was an irrational blunder that it succeeded temporarily. But basically it was a Japanese, not an American, blunder.

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Placing the Blame," published in the Wilmington (Del.) News of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLACING THE BLAME

The congressional committee investigating the attack on Pearl Harbor has wound up its labors by filing two sets of findings—a 250,000-word majority report signed by six Democrats and two Republicans, and a 45,000-word minority report by two Republicans. The bipartisan majority places the blame for America's worst military disaster on General Short and Admiral Kimmel and absolves the late President Roosevelt and his Cabinet of responsibility. The dissenting Republicans insist that these high officials in Washington must share the blame for the fact that Hawaii was not sufficiently alerted to the danger.

This is perhaps as close as we shall ever come to final agreement on the allocation of responsibility. As the responsible commanders in charge, Kimmel and Short must invariably shoulder the chief blame. But partisanship aside—and partisan feelings unquestionably colored to some extent these findings—many Americans will remain unconvinced that these commanders were as fully informed of the situation as they should have been.

One unwarranted and unjustified accusation has been firmly disposed of. The committee reports it found no evidence to support the charge that the President and his chief aides tricked and provoked the Japanese into attacking Pearl Harbor. This was absurd on its face and we trust it is now buried once and for all.

At this stage in our history the committee's recommendations for avoiding similar disasters in the future are far more important than its distribution of blame. It urges a single command of all military and naval outposts, a complete integration of Army and Navy intelligence, and corrective legislation to prevent our own laws from hampering military intelligence in the field of wire tapping.

To these proposals Congress and the armed services should give prompt and serious consideration. Pearl Harbor is behind us. Our job now is to take every precaution to prevent another such disaster.

The Pearl Harbor Report—Editorial From Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "An Unproductive Report for Memory Maligners," published in the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN UNPRODUCTIVE REPORT FOR MEMORY MALIGNERS

Months of congressional investigation and millions of words of testimony have led at last to the close of the Pearl Harbor case. The joint investigating committee's majority report, signed by Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY and seven colleagues, comes to the incontrovertible conclusion that the United States was caught unprepared at Pearl Harbor.

A minority report, signed only by Republican Senators OWEN BREWSTER and HOMER FERGUSON, clings to the assumption that President Roosevelt was chiefly to blame, with Secretaries Stimson and Knox, General Marshall, Admiral Stark, Major General Gerow and, of course, Major General Short and Rear Admiral Kimmel as accessories. Since this premise was the one with which Senators BREWSTER and FERGUSON entered the investigation, it is not amazing that it is the premise with which they emerge from it.

The investigation has been laborious. The majority report is a conscientious document which examines minutely the circumstances out of which the Pearl Harbor disaster grew. It specifically exonerates the President, Secretary Hull, and high governmental officials of blame in connection with the surprise defeat and charges the Hawaiian commanders, Kimmel and Short, with "errors of judgment and not dereliction of duty."

The roots of the disaster, the committee finds, were in the simple fact that Army and Navy personnel were still indulging in peacetime thinking not unlike the complacence which beset civilians before December 7.

The committee recommends as future national policy, unity of command in all military and naval outposts; and integration of Army and Navy intelligence agencies.

The report stresses heavily the necessity for able intelligence services, and some of its findings, however trite, may well become the Bible of intelligence agencies in the future: "There is no substitute for imagination and resourcefulness," "the unapproachable or superior attitude of officials is fatal," "complacency and procrastination are out of place where sudden and decisive action are of the essence," "the security of the Nation can be insured only through continuity of service and centralization of responsibility in those charged with handling intelligence."

In this respect the report may perform a service. If it leads to a greater realization of the necessity for a really effective intelligence agency in peace as in war, the committee will have been worth while.

But from the standpoint of those who sought to malign the memory of a dead President, or to disgrace his advisers in the Cabinet and the armed forces, it has been singularly unproductive. From its mountainous pile of evidence it has brought forth a rather tired mouse.

The Pearl Harbor Report—Article by Roscoe Drummond

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article on the Pearl Harbor report, written by Roscoe Drummond, and published in the Christian Science Monitor of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF THE NATION

(By Roscoe Drummond, chief of the Washington bureau of the Christian Science Monitor)

WASHINGTON.—The Pearl Harbor Committee has yielded a much better report on how it happened—on how we got caught so off guard—than its frequent hearing-room partisanship gave promise of producing.

The Democratic tendency to whitewash all Washington and the Republican urge to hang something on President Roosevelt are both detectable. But, on balance, it is fair and competent. It faces the main questions and gives persuasive answers.

No Government document of some 250,000 words, with appendices, footnotes, and charts, is going to be read in full by many Americans; and it is the more important, therefore, that any appraisal of it be absolutely faithful to its contents.

There are no disclosures and no conclusions in the report which have not been obvious in Washington for a long time. Its greatest merit is that it rejects totally the isolationist effort to use the Pearl Harbor disaster as a means of insinuating into the mind of the Nation that the United States was tricked into war, and that if we had only been a little sweeter with the Japanese it need never have happened.

The most significant facts which emerge from the report are these:

1. Its main conclusions are accepted by a decisive majority of the congressional House-Senate committee, 8 to 2. The majority conclusions are bipartisan, not partisan, since they are supported by six Democratic and two Republican members of the committee. Such bipartisanship gives the report strength and credibility.

2. The very heart of the majority bipartisan report is that it was not American diplomatic policies and actions which led to Pearl Harbor but Japan's spreading aggressions in the Pacific which led to Pearl Harbor.

The committee concluded that the policies of the United States Government "provided no justifiable provocation whatever for the attack by Japan."

It found "no evidence to support the charges, made before and during the hearings, that the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of Navy tricked, provoked, incited, cajoled, or coerced Japan into attacking this Nation in order that a declaration of war might be more easily obtained from Congress."

It agreed that "the President, the Secretary of State, and high Government officials made every possible effort, without sacrificing our national honor and endangering our security, to avert war with Japan."

3. The report brings it sharply into focus that every high civilian and military official, including the President, the Secretaries of War and Navy, and the Chiefs of Staff, were at one in misjudging where Japan would likely attack. By December 1941 all were convinced that Japan would soon hit at the United States, and all were convinced that it would strike anywhere but at Pearl Harbor. This was the major and unanimous military miscalculation.

4. There were lesser misjudgments—technical military and administrative inefficiencies which contributed to leaving Pearl Harbor exposed. Primarily, they were these:

That a war alert which was sent to Admiral Kimmel and General Short at Pearl Harbor was not followed up when it became clear in Washington that the commanders were inadequately construing the alert.

That the Pearl Harbor commanders were protecting against sabotage and were not protecting against other forms of attack—and Washington did nothing about it.

That useful information intercepted from the Japanese was not adequately made available to those who must act upon it. The report shrewdly points out that the military held its intercepted intelligence so closely that it appeared more concerned to keep secret the fact it had broken the Japanese code than in using the information it obtained.

It seems to me that the majority report, except for the additional views of Representative FRANK B. KEEFE, Republican, of Wisconsin, is excessively soft on Washington's share of responsibility for the military inalertness at Pearl Harbor.

On the other hand, the two-man minority report of Senators HOMER FERGUSON, Republican, of Michigan, and OWEN BREWSTER, Republican, of Maine, seeks to tie in President Roosevelt with technical military administration which few would count the duty of the civilian Commander in Chief.

But at no point does either majority or minority report suggest that any official of the United States Government was trying to get the United States into the war.

Japan did that—and that was its great mistake.

SQUEEZED DRY

Congress' very own Pearl Harbor investigation is wound up at last; its evidence, a carload of it neatly printed and bound, will be stored somewhere no doubt; its conclusion, the same that has been reached many times before, that the Army and Navy commanders were asleep at the switch, will be accepted by practically all Americans, since practically all Americans accepted that conclusion long ago.

Two members of the committee, Republican Senators from Maine and Michigan, still are not satisfied—never could have been unless, somehow blame could have been attached to the late President Roosevelt. But even these, we predict, though now they dissent, will in time leave Pearl Harbor in the discard. They have squeezed their turnip for all it was worth. They'll hardly continue to press the husks for the drop of poison they hoped to find in the pulp.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Pearl Harbor Report Ends a Lie," published in the Chicago Sun of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEARL HARBOR REPORT ENDS A LIE

If the Pearl Harbor report comes almost as an anticlimax that is because the schemes and plots of the Roosevelt haters were long ago blown out of the water.

What was the purpose of Republican committee members, egged on by embittered isolationists, when hearings began last November? It was to prove that the United States, and not Japan, was the war aggressor. It was to prove that Mr. Roosevelt had advance knowledge of Japanese plans, that he deliberately exposed our flank to invite attack and get us into war, that he deceived the field commanders, and that the Pearl Harbor dead were a sacrifice to this design.

And what remains of the infamous lie? The majority report refutes it—and by no means all the majority members, either Democratic or Republican, were friends of Mr. Roosevelt. The minority report submitted by Senators FERGUSON and BREWSTER does not dare repeat the fantasy even by indirection. The "east winds rain" sensationalism is utterly debunked. Representative GEARHART, a Republican, who last November charged that the Japanese in 1941 had been "doing everything in their power to get an acceptable agreement," recanted and signed the majority report vindicating Mr. Roosevelt and his top advisers. So did Representative KEEFE, another Republican, though he added a separate statement saying that secret diplomacy and the Washington leadership shared responsibility for the disaster.

There will be another story of Pearl Harbor when the verdict of time is in, written by objective historians and not by politicians working under the pressures of the moment. Even before the latest political inquiry, most Americans were satisfied that the enormity of the disaster was due to errors of military judgment in Hawaii, in Washington, in all branches of the service.

There were errors due to the assumption that further Japanese aggression would move southwardly, and failure to analyze intelligence reports accurately. There were errors due to the problems of the administration in preparing us for self-defense even while beating off snarling attacks by Americans blind to the menace of a German triumph in Europe and a Japanese conquest of Asia. There were errors on the field, committed by Pearl Harbor commanders trapped by Army-Navy jealousies and lack of coordination.

Even a political investigation such as this one was beneficial in bringing out facts to which the country was entitled. It will be more substantially beneficial if the recommendations of the committee majority, for tightening Army-Navy cooperation and intelligence, are promptly put in effect.

It is unlikely that there will be a parallel benefit to the McCormick-Patterson-Hearst newspaper axis which fomented the lies the investigation disproved. True to form, these newspapers throughout the inquiry printed their inventions and distortions on page 1 and buried the truth, later on, on the inside pages.

But the people can see what the inquiry finally revealed. A partisan, spiteful set of enemies, which had opposed Mr. Roosevelt, scoffed at any war danger and thus helped leave the country ill-prepared, tried to transfer the blame to the dead President himself. The attempted hoax was colossal but it failed.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEARL HARBOR REPORT

There was nothing unexpected in the Pearl Harbor Committee findings. The majority report, signed by six Democrats and two Republicans, places responsibility for surprise when the Japanese attacked on the military and naval commanders, Admiral Kimmel and General Short. The minority, Senators FERGUSON of Michigan and BREWSTER of Maine, places blame primarily on the late President Roosevelt and his Cabinet, and General Marshall, then Chief of Staff.

In the majority report are recommendations that there be unity of control of military and naval outposts, that the intelligence services of the Army and Navy be integrated, and other safeguards be taken.

From the evidence that was brought out during the protracted hearings the public must agree with the majority. There was nothing in the testimony to show any lack of alertness by the late President, General Marshall or members of the Cabinet as to the critical nature of negotiations with the Japanese ministers, or lack of warnings to Short and Kimmel, which amounted to a dereliction of duty. Senators FERGUSON and BREWSTER object that they were unable to get all the evidence because of refusals to furnish other than selected parts of the President's papers. They put blame on former Secretaries Stimson and Knox, also on the Washington military and naval leaders as well as on Short and Kimmel.

Pearl Harbor will be remembered as the most tragic incident in the military history of the United States. That there was a condition bordering on negligence at the naval base is acknowledged. But there was nothing scandalous, according to the evidence. From the political standpoint, nothing was brought out to reduce the respect in which the Nation held and still holds the former President and those in Washington upon whom he had to depend for advice and guidance.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Pearl Harbor Probe Report Is a Historic Document," published in the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger of July 23, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEARL HARBOR PROBE REPORT IS A HISTORIC DOCUMENT

The long-awaited formal report by the special congressional committee investigating responsibility for the manner in which the Japanese caught the Americans by surprise at Pearl Harbor was filed Saturday, and it verifies earlier reports and predictions regarding the essential findings.

Primary blame is placed upon Lt. Gen. Walter C. Short and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, the Army and Navy commanders at Pearl Harbor at the time of the attack, the report charging these two officers with seven specific failures in performance of their duties.

The six Democratic members of the committee and two of its four Republican members signed the majority report wholly absolving the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his Cabinet of any blame or negligence in connection with this disaster, but two Republican members filed a minority report contending that Roosevelt and his Cabinet must share the blame.

The majority reported, with regard to charges that President Roosevelt and his Cabinet "tricked, provoked, incited, cajoled, or coerced Japan into attacking this Nation in order that a declaration of war might be more easily obtained from Congress," that, on the contrary, "all evidence conclusively points to the fact that they discharged their responsibilities with distinction, ability, and foresight, and in keeping with the highest traditions of our fundamental foreign policy."

These were charges preferred by some Republicans who contended that President Roosevelt had been trying for months to force the United States into war as Britain's ally and that he deliberately provoked Japan into attacking the United States in order to put the Nation into the war.

This investigating committee's report probably will not be the final answer, the last word on the subject of responsibility for the Pearl Harbor defeat, nor the final decision on Franklin D. Roosevelt's foreign policy. The final decision will be written by some unbiased and competent historian; however, the committee's report will be accepted by most citizens and Congressmen as authoritative and as sufficient refutation of the partisan charges against Roosevelt.

Politics admittedly influenced this investigation. That was both regrettable and inevitable. The committee frequently divided along party lines, six Democrats to four Republicans. But the fact that half of the Republican members joined with all of the Democrats in signing the final report is evidence that, despite political pressure and tendencies, the essential facts were developed and reported.

The investigation was so prolonged, and so much extraneous and conflicting testimony was developed during 70 days of public hearings, that the average newspaper reader—and editor—became confused and did not have a clear picture at the end of the hearings. This, perhaps, also was largely unavoidable, though regrettable.

So far as the Nation's welfare and security are concerned, however, the committee's recommendations embodied in this report are tragedy of December 7, 1941. These recommendations command, and should receive, careful and complete study by Congress, the President, the War and Navy Departments, and intelligent citizens.

Preventing any future repetition of the Pearl Harbor disaster is more important than placing blame for that "day of infamy." And the committee's major recommendations include: Unity of command at military and naval outposts; integration of Army and Navy intelligence agencies; tighter laws against spies, and revision of Army and Navy administrative machinery.

PEARL HARBOR—LAST PHASE

Time and sober thought generally serve the cause of sane and tempered judgment on a question as momentous as that of Pearl Harbor. The report of the congressional committee which has been studying this matter for many long months will be accepted by the majority of the public as expressive of an impartial effort to seek the truth and to deduce conclusions which may be expected to aid in preventing any similar misfortune.

It is of the highest significance that the large majority of the committee—8 out of 10 members participating—is a bipartisan majority. This means that the members resolutely set their sights on truth and common sense, regardless of any tug of political partisanship. They are to be congratulated on the result.

With the finding that the disaster was occasioned by no neglect of duty or function on the part of the late President Roosevelt and his advisers in the War, State, and Navy Departments, most people will agree. That was the impression left by the hearings. As for the two commanders at Pearl Harbor at the time, the findings are equally sane. The disaster resulted from poor judgment on the part of both; and their deplorable errors were produced by an overaddiction to routine thinking. In this respect, it may be noted, these two men had plenty of company in the British and Dutch Armies, as well as in our own, during the earlier months of the war.

The committee deserves especial praise for urging unification of command at defense outposts in the two great oceans at once. Perhaps a move of this sort, rather than a wholesale attempt to merge the three defense services in toto, is the wise solution to our problem of a smoothly functioning defense set-up.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The System at Fault," published in the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer of July 24, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SYSTEM AT FAULT

If the chief purpose of the report on the Pearl Harbor investigation was to let the country know who was responsible for the disaster of December 7, 1941, it was a miserable failure because it revealed nothing in that connnection that was not already known.

Only the most rabid Roosevelt haters ever swallowed the charge that the President, in connivance with Secretary Hull, tricked the Japanese into attacking us so that a declaration of war could be easily obtained from Congress. Of that ridiculous charge both Roosevelt and Hull were completely cleared.

Neither was it widely believed that General Marshall and Admiral Stark had failed to give the commanders in the outposts adequate information on the necessity for an alert.

"That Admiral Kimmel and General Short," says the report, "were supplied enough information as reasonably to justify the expectation that Hawaiian defenses would be alerted to any military contingency is irrefutable."

As to fixing the responsibility, therefore, the report lamely and somewhat comically concludes by declaring: "The ultimate responsibility for the attack and its results rests upon Japan."

If any benefit is to be derived from this book-length report, therefore, it must be found in the recommendations made for preventing a repetition of such a disaster.

The committee finds itself intrigued as to why, "with some of the finest intelligence available in our history, with almost certain knowledge that war was at hand * * * why was it possible for Pearl Harbor to occur?"

The rest of the country is likewise intrigued as to why everybody from generals and admirals down who was in any way responsible for alerting the command—all were simultaneously caught napping. Surely, somebody in all that line of authority should have had at least a hunch that danger was at hand.

But only one obscure sergeant, who was not even mentioned in the report, thought he heard the sound of approaching airplanes while he was practicing with the listening device. When he reported to a lieutenant, he was pooh-poohed, and the next thing anybody knew the Jap planes were over Pearl Harbor.

This apparent lack of alertness on the part of everybody concerned suggests that the responsibility cannot be pinned on any particular person or persons, but belongs rather to a slipshod system that prevented accurate evaluation of the information at hand and made it impossible to execute orders with the precision and dispatch required in emergencies.

To correct this looseness of organization, the committee recommends that the whole system of intelligence, delegation of authority, and divided command be worked over to provide a single, smooth-working machine that will not be thrown out of gear by the general attitude of "let George do it."

The report finds that unity of command in all military and naval outposts is the most urgent of these reforms. It points out that General Short depended on Admiral Kimmel for patrolling the waters around Pearl Harbor and for information that he never received. A single outpost command with wholly integrated intelligence agencies is suggested as a remedy for this defect.

General Gerow of the War Plans Division was absolved of personal blame, but it was revealed that his subordinates lacked a sense of responsibility for such details as directing General Short to take broader measures of defense and seeing that orders sent from Washington were understood and carried out by commanders in Hawaii.

To supplement its recommendation for unity of command and integration of intelligence services, the committee then outlines 25 principles of supervision, organization, and administration designed to deepen the sense of individual responsibility and to foster greater initiative and resourcefulness on the part of all units of all commands.

Mr. LUCAS Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Pearl Harbor," published in the Lexington (Ky.) Herald, of July 23, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEARL HARBOR

The final report of an investigating committee of 10 Members of Congress on the result of the Pearl Harbor inquiry has been made public. The majority report is signed by Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, as chairman; Congressman JERE COOPER, of Tennessee, as vice chairman; Senators WALTER F. GEORGE and SCOTT LUCAS, and Congressmen J. BAYARD CLARK, JOHN W. MURPHY, BERTRAND W. GEARHART, and FRANK B. KEEFE. A minority report reiterating charges that President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, and others failed to alert the Nation and the armed forces properly to the crucial danger and imminent approach of war was filed by Senators HOMER FERGUSON and OWEN BREWSTER. Congressman KEEFE, though signing the majority report, appended additional personal views. The congressional committee held 70 days of public hearings, heard 44 witnesses give more than a million words of testimony, and received written exhibits of 6,000,000 words. The reports totaled more than 250,000 words and were based on a 10-month study of the events leading to the tragedy of Pearl Harbor.

Members of Congress acted correctly in assuming the responsibility for making this study and for drafting the final conclusions based on the many investigations that already have been made. The Members of Congress are the duly elected and officially empowered representatives of the people and before them will come most of the steps that are necessary to prevent a recurrence of an event that will always bring shame to the American people.

The conclusion of the committee, in its majority report, is that the diplomatic actions of the United States provided no provocation whatever for the attack by Japan and that the Secretary of State fully informed both the Navy and War Departments of the diplomatic developments. The failure at Pearl Harbor is attributed both to the surprise of the attack and the failure of the armed forces to make their fight with the full equipment at hand.

It is also pointed out that there was a complete failure in Hawaii of effective Army-Navy liaison during the critical period, November 27 to December 7. The report continues by saying that it is irrefutable that both Admiral Kimmel and General Short "were supplied enough information as reasonably to justify the expectation that Hawaiian defenses would be alerted to any military contingency." It also is declared that intercepts of Japanese diplomatic messages did not reasonably indicate an attack on Pearl Harbor and that this country was not provoking or planning war against Japan in the event of an attack by or on the British or Dutch.

The report also says that it was impossible during the war, without disclosing important secrets, to conduct the inquiry. It now declares that there should be a complete integration of Army and Navy intelligence agencies, clearly essential. The report does not say so but it appears that there should be coordination, also, of military with diplomatic and all other intelligence. All, also, should be strengthened.

Twenty-five points involving procedural recommendations for the Army and Navy were made, including sending adequate instructions to subordinates to see to it that instructions are carried out.

Personal jealousies among officers and between branches of the Government and armed forces, lack of keen appreciation of the danger and many other factors combined to make Pearl Harbor's dastardly crime possible.

The value of raking over the coals is that every barrier to well-informed cooperation and quick action must be removed from the defense program and this Nation must, in a day of atomic warfare, keep on the alert at all times not only at its outlying fortifications but in every walk of citizenship and every position of responsibility.

THE PEARL HARBOR REPORT

The results of the long Pearl Harbor investigation disproves the Republican attempt to place the blame for the disaster on President Roosevelt and Cordell Hull. The report of the committee once and for all disposes of the attempt to smear the dead President and the ailing Secretary of State. Two of the four Republicans join in a minority report trying to make out a case for contrary findings, but they fail utterly. The majority holds that President Roosevelt and members of the Cabinet acted with "distinction, ability, and foresight." The Roberts committee, which went to the scene of the destruction wrought by the Japanese, properly placed the blame on the general and admiral who were in command and were on the scene. No matter what the laches might have been in Washington, it was the duty of the general and the admiral to be on the alert when everybody knew the situation was tense and war was imminent. The majority and minority reports agree that Kimmel and Short "had not measured up to the responsibilities given them; their commands were acknowledged not to have been on the alert," but they rejected the finding of "dereliction of duty" found by the Roberts committee. The majority mentions no names of military men who fell short of their duty, but the other reports put blame on the heads of the Army and Navy Intelligence Service and heads of the Army and Navy and civilian officials in Washington.

The reports fall short of demanding punishment of anybody for the known dereliction of duty, though the disaster could not have occurred if the men responsible had not been asleep at the switch in Hawaii and lacking in alertness in the War and Navy Departments. It is another case of proven guilt without praying for judgment.

The investigation was worth all it cost for the clearing up of the attempt to smear Roosevelt and Hull and for giving additional reason for abolishing the War and Navy Departments and having one Secretary of National Defense. To be sure, the reports make no mention of the proposed joinder, but what they say speaks even more strongly for unity of command and preparation. The report shows need for:

1. Unity of command at military and naval outposts.

2. Integration of Army and Navy intelligence agencies.

If these two things are shown to be necessary, it stands to reason that they and other evils in two separate military establishments, duplicating plans and often working at cross purposes in the preparations, show that the military efficiency demands one Department of National Defense. The committee added 24 principles of which they said should be studied to avoid a repetition of Pearl Harbor. They point conclusively to the need for uniting all military agencies and preparedness for war and for winning victory. Nothing short of one Department of National Defense will make possible effective preparedness and unity in war.

It has been a long and expensive investigation. The committee gathered 15,000 typed pages of testimony, aggregating 10,000,000 words, from 318 witnesses, plus 469 exhibits in hearings consuming 70 days.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Pearl Harbor Finale," published in the Watertown (N. Y.) Times of July 16, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEARL HARBOR FINALE

The Pearl Harbor investigation is over and the report has been prepared. Ten out of the 12 members of the investigating committee have signed that report. Major blame for the disaster has been placed where most people from the first thought it should be, on the two commanders at Pearl Harbor, Admiral Kimmel and General Short. There is mild censure for the War Department and for the Navy Department. But there is nothing but praise for the diplomatic efforts of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull.

The Pearl Harbor investigation started out to be a trial of the late President Roosevelt. It ends up by not only exonerating him completely but also by lauding his efforts to prevent war and the steps he took to prepare for one should it come. Roosevelt haters thought they saw a chance in this inquiry to put the blame for the Pearl Harbor attack on Roosevelt rather than on Japan. The isolationists saw an opportunity to justify their prewar course. They failed, of course, as they were destined to from the first.

It is interesting in the light of this report, soon to be made public in detail, the fantastic charges made early in the inquiry. Roosevelt, we are told, left the Japanese no alternative but to make war on us. It was all a Roosevelt plot, this Pearl Harbor disaster. He put the fleet there as a lure to the Japs so that they would be left no alternative but to attack it.

What were the facts as they were revealed in the inquiry? Both Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull made every effort, consistent with national dignity, to reach an agreement with the Japs that would prevent war. At the same time they appreciated that, despite all their efforts, such a war might occur and steps were taken to prepare the country for such an eventuality.

General Short and Admiral Kimmel knew that the situation was hazardous. They might not have had all the information that the Government possessed but they had enough to put them on the alert. Men, charged with their responsibility, should have exercised every precaution. They should have been ready for anything that might come. Instead, they were guilty of negligence and, as a result, America suffered one of its worst military disasters.

True, the Japs had our high command fooled. General Marshall admitted it frankly. He and his associates thought the attack would come in the Southwest Pacific, possibly against the Philippines. He did not think, nor did his associates, that the Japs would take the risk of attacking Pearl Harbor.

Our military and naval leaders were guilty of making the wrong guess. There was also negligence in failing to take full advantage of our success in "cracking" the secret Japanese code. But if there was contributory negligence on the part of Washington, the main responsibility rests with the men charged with the responsibility of defending our main Pacific base. So this newspaper has said repeatedly and so 10 out of the 12 members of the investigating committee has now found.

We questioned, when this investigation was proposed, the motives of some of those who were urging it so strongly. We still question those motives. Yet it is a salutary thing that the investiagtion was held. It has cut the ground from under the isolationists who did so much to try to prevent prewar preparation. It has answered for all time the fantastic charge that Roosevelt forced us into war. It has cleared the record and placed the blame where it should be.

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 194

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Post Mortem Is Finished," published in the Cincinnati Enquirer of July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POST MORTEM IS FINISHED

Nearly 5 years after the crushing Japanese attack on our battleship force at Pearl Harbor, a joint Senate-House committee has given its verdict, meantime having heard thousands of pages of testimony. The report is free from sensations or new revelations. If it provides any surprise, this lies in the fact that the committee did not split on party lines.

The majority report, signed by six Democrats and two Republicans, may be accepted as a genuine bipartisan report, as free of partisan rancor as could conceivably be expected. The minority report, signed by two Republicans, will be of interest, but cannot be expected to carry much weight.

In broad terms, the report exonerates President Roosevelt and the Cabinet personnel concerned—Knox, Hull, and Stimson. It focuses primary responsibility for the debacle on military commanders at Hawaii and in Washington. But they are charged with "errors of judgment," and not "derelictions of duty." It may therefore be inferred that Admiral Kimmel and General Short are headed for reprimand, not for court martial.

The whole issue centers on whether responsible military commanders were adequately informed of the imminence of war. The committee concludes that they were, and that they failed to effect an appropriate state of readiness, failed to maintain proper reconnaissance, and failed to cooperate in their intelligence operations.

The question whether the Japanese attack was unprovoked would seem to be an obvious one. The committee examined it in some detail, however, since any evidence that we had provoked the onslaught at Pearl Harbor would at once incriminate the President, the Secretary of State, and other high civilian officials. That some on the committee wanted to absolve the Japanese from the charge of unprovoked aggression, in order to discredit the Roosevelt administration, was indicated during the hearings.

The bulk of the committee, fortunately, sensed that their task was to investigate the failure to detect and repel the Japanese military attack—not to decide whether the American Government or the Japanese was the aggressor.

The most useful part of the Pearl Harbor report, undoubtedly, will be the section criticizing the shortcomings of the War and Navy Departments, in respect to their liaison and cooperation. The report concretely proposes unity of command in the field, integration of Army-Navy intelligence services, and abolition of laws handicapping American intelligence work. A good beginning already has been made toward implementing these obvious but highly important reforms in our defense establishment.

The report may seem anticlimactic, after all these months of inquiry and recrimination. But it should have been apparent, throughout the investigation, (1) that Japan, not the United States started the war, (2) that Army and Navy commanders in Washington and Hawaii were not sufficiently alert, and (3) that much closer integration of the armed services is desirable. And that is substantially what the committee concluded.

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Pearl Harbor Report," published in the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch of July 17, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEARL HARBOR REPORT

The report of the congressional committee which investigated the Pearl Harbor attack is not expected to be made public until later this week, but accounts of its principal conclusions have been published. The majority report—a 112,000-word document—absolves President Roosevelt and former Secretary of State Cordell Hull of any direct responsibility for the disaster which befell our Pacific fleet at Pearl Harbor. According to advance information, it places the blame for the failure to anticipate the Japanese attack on Washington military officials and on the commanders at Pearl Harbor, Maj. Gen. Walter Short and Admiral Husband E. Kimmel. In the reported view of the committee majority, however, Kimmel and Short were not as specifically informed about the situation in the Pacific as they should have been.

These conclusions are about what the publice might have expected from the information disclosed during the long Pearl Harbor investigation and in previous accounts of the circumstances of the surprise attack. They are the conclusions which most Americans reached long ago.

There will still be some, no doubt, who will cling to the fantastic belief that President Roosevelt and Mr. Hull deliberately planned things so that the Japanese would attack us, in order to get this country into the war. But most people, even among those who may have had some doubts about the responsibility for the state of unpreparedness in which our forces at Pearl Harbor were caught, will probably accept the major conclusions of the committee majority as sound and proper.

The fact that the majority report was signed by 8 of the 10 committee members, including 2 Republicans, is evidence of the nonpartisan nature of their findings.

Many persons felt that a congressional investigation of Pearl Harbor was unnecessary, after the reports by the commission of inquiry headed by Owen J. Roberts, then a Supreme Court Justice, and by the Army and Navy boards. But the committee is reported to have made 25 recommendations for administrative changes in Army and Navy procedure as a result of its findings, and if they serve to remedy the manifest defects which contributed to the Pearl Harbor disaster, the inquiry may prove worth while.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Blame for Pearl Harbor," published in the Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald of July 17, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BLAME FOR PEARL HARBOR

The Joint Congressional Pearl Harbor Committee is expected to make its formal report to Congress later this week. Enough has been learned about the report, however, to indicate that the conferees will seek to put the blame on top military and naval commanders in Washington and Hawaii, exonerating both President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull. The committee will not, it seems, seek to sidestep blame fixing by general criticism of public apathy.

The task of the committee has been difficult. It held hearings from November 15, last, to February 20 of this year. Congress first ordered the report to be ready by June 1, but the job of analyzing the 15,000 pages of testimony and preparing the findings made a delay unavoidable. It may be that the hearings could have been speeded up. The committee lost the services of some of its counsel who resigned because of the slow pace of the investigation. However, the job now appears completed, and the slowness with which it was done justifies the belief that it was thoroughly and impartially done.

Another comforting fact is that the report represents the conclusions of 8 of the 10 committee members. Two Republicans are filing separate judgments. The committee appears to have reached its decisions on a nonpartisan basis. The exoneration of Messrs. Roosevelt and Hull is particularly acceptable. Attempts to smear them represented a low order of politics. Apart from the consideration that top executives must technically bear some measure of responsibility for the errors of their subordinates, it has never appeared that the President and Secretary of State deserved to be charged with the failure of Pearl Harbor commanders to heed the warnings of a Japanese attack.

It is understood that the committee is preparing recommendations for administrative changes in Army and Navy procedure. Perhaps the lessons learned will be sufficient to meet the high price the Nation had to pay at Pearl Harbor and in the Philippines.

The Pearl Harbor Report—Editorial From the Christian Science Monitor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "No One Betrayed America," published in the Christian Science Monitor, of July 17, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO ONE BETRAYED AMERICA

There have been from the outset two distinct, though related, questions before the Congressional Pearl Harbor Investigating Committee:

First, did the Army and Navy, from the top down to the local commanders, do all that experienced officers could be expected to do toward keeping the Hawaiian defenses in a state of alert preparedness, within the resources of men and equipment, directives from above, and pertinent information available to them?

Second, was the administration's Japanese policy so unwise, the diplomacy so inept, and the liaison with the War and Navy Departments so inadequate, that such a state of preparedness could not have been expected from the armed forces?

In placing the weight of responsibility on the Army and Navy and in particular on the local commanders, Admiral Kimmel and General Short, the committee's majority report agrees substantially with the findings of all previous inquiries. The fact that two Republicans joined six Democrats in a verdict which largely absolves the late President Roosevelt, relieves this report somewhat from charges of partisanship.

The contrary fact that the only dissenters, Senators FERGUSON, of Michigan, and BREWSTER, of Maine, are both Republicans weakens their minority report inescapably, regardless of how sincere and ably argued it may be.

So far, only an "unofficial" preview of the committee's findings is available. The full texts may alter the picture, but only in detail. The major outlines of the two reports and the division of the committee could have been predicted pretty accurately.

On an issue so fraught with political implications and centering about so controversial a figure, no committee could be expected to produce a unanimous report or one completely free from partisanship. Taking this into account, Americans should know by now what led to the disastrous surprise at Pearl Harbor: That there was confusion, lack of contact, and laek of foresight, but that no one betrayed America.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Pearl Harbor Blame," published in the Newark (N. J.) Star-Ledger, of July 21, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEARL HARBOR BLAME

Was President Roosevelt to blame in any degree for the disaster at Pearl Harbor? Was his Cabinet to blame? Was the high command to blame? Or were only the commanders at Hawaii at fault?

A joint committee of Congress has been seeking the answers to these gravely disturbing questions. Now the answers are offered the American people. They should be read and pondered by all thoughtful citizens.

The majority report vindicates the President and his Cabinet completely and praises them for distinction, ability, and foresight. If the cynical may suspect this to be a whitewash by Democratic partisans, who constitute the majority of the committee, they will be puzzled by the fact that two of the four Republican members go along with the wholehearted exoneration of the President and his administration; while the other two Republicans go along with the majority in fixing the major blame on the commanders at Hawaii, although criticizing the high command and the administration.

Nothing in the report, either in the minority or majority versions, indicates the slightest justification for the least suspicion that Admiral Kimmel or General Short have been "railroaded" or unjustly blamed, although this report accuses them of faulty judgment rather than the graver charge made by a Presidential commission headed by the then Supreme Court Justice Roberts.

The report suggests specific steps to guard against a repetition of the Pearl Harbor disaster. It should not be complacently assumed that such disasters can occur only once. The recommendations should be considered in the light of the failure of the world to secure the peace as yet. The flaws in our security should be mended by Congress, and every citizen owes it to his country and his loved ones to consider the recommendations and advise his representatives in Congress of his views.

Alaska Native Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. L. BARTLETT

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the Alaska Native Service, which is a division of the Federal Office of Indian Affairs, started a new fiscal year on July 1 with a larger appropriation than ever had been granted it before by Congress. In all, a total of $3,429,008 was appropriated for the various activities of the Alaska Native Service. This figure includes money for education, for medical relief, and for the reindeer service. In addition, Navy and Army facilities adjacent to Sitka, having a total value of more than $50,000,000, were transferred without cost to the ANS. These facilities will be used in the construction of a modern tuberculosis sanatorium and a 600-pupil boarding school. Of the total ANS appropriation, $1,319,700 has been earmarked for the Sitka work, and in addition funds were made available for operational purposes there.

Mr. Speaker, the work of the Alaska Native Service extends to almost every last community in Alaska. Our total Indian, Eskimo, and Aleut population is over 30,000 people who are spread over close to 600,000 square miles of territory. The ANS is closely concerned with the daily lives of all these people. In large measure the success of an administrative agency is in direct ratio to the quality of its personnel, and in this respect, we in Alaska, in my judgment, are indeed fortunate. In the person of Don C. Foster, General Superintendent of the ANS, we have a man of intelligence, drive, and determination, who has, since he came to the Territory from Nevada, done an outstandingly good job. Likewise deserving of praise are his principal assistants—Fred R. Geeslin, assistant superintendent; Reinholt Brust, chief clerk; Mabel L. Morgan, consultant in nursing; Dr. George A. Dale, director of education; Dr. Evelyn I. Butler, supervisor of social welfare; Louis C. Peters, director of native resources; Raymond L. Wolf, credit agent, and Ralph W. Mize, construction engineer. Until July 1 Dr. Edgar W. Norris was medical director of the ANS, and I should be remiss if I did not mention here his name. He did splendid work.

Of all these officials it can rightfully be said that they are doing their best to work themselves out of jobs. They realize that basically the task of the Indian Service is to bring the native people as speedily as possible to a point where Federal assistance and Federal aid will no longer be required and these people may become part of the general community in every sense of the word.

Already they have marched a long distance toward the goal. It is true that in some sections much remains to be done, but it is likewise true that really notable progress has been made, taking the Territory as a whole. With every advance in the economic betterment of the native people, there is bound to be, and is, betterment for all citizens, and the improvements which have been registered with respect to educational standards and to health standards among the native people can be compared to the ripples caused by a rock thrown into a pond—the circle constantly expands until it reaches far out from its center. I have always believed, and now believe, that it is scarcely less advantageous to the white people than to the native people that progress be recorded among the latter. Mr. Speaker, concrete evidence of the manner in which Alaskans, although of different races, get along together is shown by the fact that two of the distinguished members of the present Territorial legislature—my good friends, Frank Peratrovich, of Klawock, and Andrew Hope, of Sitka—are Indians. Their records in the legislature stand as permanent testimonials to their ability.

This Congress made possible the establishment of field divisions within the Alaska Native Service which are expected to improve notably the quality of administration in the sparsely settled districts of the Territory. Five district or subregional offices will be established. These will be in charge of administrative assistants with headquarters at Bethel, Nome, Kotzebue, Fairbanks, and Anchorage. Southeastern Alaska will continue to be handled from the central office in Juneau. The new administrative assistants will be responsible, in their respective districts, for coordinating the work of all ANS activities—education, health, welfare, and native resources, including reindeer, arts and crafts, and credit matters; also, they will be responsible for the encouragement and development of local self-government. They will seek to combat the excessive use of liquor among the natives. They will be charged with the responsibility of assisting all new field personnel in becoming established at their respective stations—familiarizing them with their duties, field and office procedures, field relationships between activities, and the relationship between natives and the white public. There is abundant evidence that an actively promoted liquor traffic and inadequate control of liquor contribute to the demoralization of certain communities. Congress took cognizance of this when in the Interior Department appropriation bill it authorized the employment of two special officers whose main concern will be in controlling the liquor traffic. These officers will have their headquarters at Juneau and Fairbanks.

EDUCATION

Schools which will be operated by the ANS during the fiscal year 1947 will include Eklutna Vocational School at Seward; White Mountain Vocational School at White Mountain, Alaska; Wrangell Institute at Wrangell, Alaska, and a new boarding school to be opened on the site of the Navy base at Sitka.

Wrangell Institute is accredited by the Northwest Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges and prepares native young men and women for admission to college as well as giving them vocational training. Negotiations are, at present, under way to secure the transfer of a boat to the institute which will serve as a training ship to train the young men of this seafaring economy in navigation and steamship. This training is of particular importance in view of the fact that most of these people make their living by fishing.

The school which is to be established at Sitka will offer a wide range of opportunities for vocational training, including steamship navigation, carpentry and painting, plumbing, sheet metal, electrical, tannery and craft program, home economics, child care, essential training in typing, boat building and maintenance and machine-shop practice. It will also prepare students for admission to college. The excellent facilities which will be made available by transfer of this Navy base to the Alaska Native Service will enable the school at Sitka to serve as a cultural and recreational center for the entire southeast Alaska area.

The Sitka school will also operate at the elementary level, providing not only school but a home for many neglected children for whom facilities are not yet available. There are several hundred small children for whom care is required. A nursery school will be established for them and an admission policy established which will make it possible to rescue these children from extreme neglect, abuses due to parental delinquency and other extremely undesirable social conditions which they now face.

Day schools will be operated in the following villages and towns during the 1947 fiscal year: Afognak, Akiak, Akiakchak, Akutan, Alitak, Anchorage Bay, Angoon, Atka, Barrow, Beaver, Belkofski, Bethel, Chaniliut, Chenega, Chitina, Circle, Copper Center, Cordova, Deering, Diomede, Eek, Egegik, Ekwok, Elephant Point, Elim, Fishhook, Fort Yukon, Galena, Gambell, Golovin, Haines, Holikachuk, Hoonah, Hooper Bay, Hydaburg, Igloo, Juneau, Kake, Kalskag, Kaltag, Kanakanak, Karluk, Kasaan, Ketchikan, Kiana, King Cove, King Island, Kipnuk, Kivalina, Klawock, Klukwan, Kokrines, Kotzebue, Koyuk, Koyukuk, Kwethluk, Kwigillingok, Kwinhagak, Levelock, Longwood, Mekoryuk, Metlakatla, Minto, Mountain Village, Napakiak, Napaskiak, Newhalen, Nikolski, Noatak, Nome, Nondalton, Noorvik, Northway, Nunachuk, Nunapitchuk, Old Harbor, Ouzinkie, Perryville, Pilot Point, Pimute, Point Hope, Point Lay, Port Graham, Rampart, St. Michael, Scammon Bay, Selawik, Sevoonga, Shageluk, Shaktolik, Shishmaref, Shungnak, Sitka, Sleitmut, Solomon, Squaw Harbor, Stebbins, Stevens Village, Tanacross, Tanana, Tanunak, Tatitlek, Teller Mission, Tetlin, Tuluksak, Tyonek, Unalakleet, Venetie, Wainwright, Wales, Yakutat, Wrangell Institute.

The schools in these isolated villages serve not only as schools but as community libraries, school shops, recreation centers. They provide communication service through their radio phones with the nearest Army Signal Corps stations. This service is frequently called upon to secure transportation for the sick or injured and to make other emergency calls. The teachers not only serve as school teachers, but do the local welfare work for the Alaska Native Service Welfare Division, as well as assist the Territory with old-age-assistance investigations and similar welfare work. In many communities where there are native stores they assist the native store managers in preparing their orders, keeping stock accounts, and other routines of store management. They carry on extensive programs of community work, working through the native councils to secure better housing, improved sanitary conditions, develop economic projects, and many other activities.

In keeping with the present trend of Government aid in support of school lunches, $40,000 was appropriated and earmarked for the fiscal year.

Through these day and boarding schools the Government of the United States will provide school facilities to 5,489 children for whom school facilities would not otherwise be available. Many of those who are attending boarding schools have not only a school but a home, as they are orphans neglected or abandoned or come from homes where excessive use of liquor and other forms of parental delinquency make it necessary that they be removed from the homes.

A significant part of the educational program is the provision of loans for worthy and qualified young native men and women who wish to secure college training. To date 74 students have been beneficiaries of these loans. Many of them have returned to positions in the Indian Service. Many of our most successful employees are Indians who have availed themselves of this training. The repayment plan is very easy, and less than 2 percent of the amount loaned has not been collected. There are only three "bad accounts." Other failures to repay loans have been due to death of the recipient. At the present there are 11 loan applications being processed. It is hoped that young native people will take increasing advantage of this loan opportunity so that they may become trained to higher-bracket positions which may be available.

SOCIAL WELFARE

The social-welfare program of the Alaska Native Service is aimed primarily to take care of dependent native children. During the fiscal year of 1946 approximately half of the total appropriation of $120,250 was expended for dependent children in foster homes and institutions. Approximately 350 children, including orphans, neglected and delinquent children were assisted. Of this number, less than 100 were maintained in boarding homes, while over 250 were placed in mission homes, special institutions or Government boarding schools.

Mothers' allowances were granted to 230 families, assisting more than 650 children who could be cared for in their own homes. Approximately one-third of $40,000 of the total appropriation was obligated for these mothers, including widows, unmarried mothers, and several families in which the father was disabled or away from the family—hospitalized, deserted, or in penal institutions. Several of these families receive aid to dependent children under the Territorial program recently adopted, but because the maximum grant allowable is insufficient, and native women are still ineligible for general relief from the Territorial Department of Public Welfare, the Alaska Native Service must provide supplementary grants to enable the families to meet minimum budgetary needs.

Approximately $15,000 is spent for handicapped persons, including cripples, aged, and otherwise disabled persons who are incapable of self-support. Able-bodied adults, without dependents are not granted assistance from welfare funds.

MEDICAL DIVISION

According to the latest official census there are 32,458 natives residing in the Territory of Alaska. Medical care is provided this group, within the limits of the funds appropriated by Congress and the facilities available, by the Medical Division of the Alaska Native Service.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1946, a medical relief program was administered by a staff of 162 full-time employees, including administrative, clerical, hospital, and field personnel. The services of the full-time staff were augmented by the professional services of seven private physicians and five private dentists employed on a part-time contract or on a fee basis. In addition the part-time services of four public health nurses were secured through cooperative contract agreements with the Territorial Department of Health.

Six general hospitals and one tuberculosis sanatorium at Skagway were in operation and filled to capacity throughout the year. One out-patient relief station with a full-time physician in charge was maintained at Ketchikan. Twenty of the 27 field nurse stations were active during the year; and, in addition, four field nurses were employed at the three boarding schools.

The appropriation for the medical relief of the natives of Alaska for the year just ending was $844,150, which amount was sadly inadequate to satisfy the great medical needs among the native people.

MEDICAL RELIEF IN HOSPITALS

Native Service hospitals: The six general hospitals have, in the aggregate, a normal bed capacity of 183. Because of the great demands on these hospitals, it has been necessary to expand so that the number of beds actually available and in use during the year was 212, 118 being for general medical and surgical cases and 94 for tuberculosis. One thousand seven hundred and forty-one beneficiaries were provided 63,062 days of hospital care in these hospitals. Two hundred and twenty-two of the cases received treatment for tuberculosis.

In addition to the hospital care, a minimum of 9,969 patients received 18,076 out-patient treatments in the dispensaries of the various hospitals. Two thousand three hundred and sixty-one immunizations against smallpox, diphtheria, typhoid fever, and pertussis were administered in the hospital dispensaries. These are minimum figures since all reports for fiscal year 1946 had not yet been received from the field at the time these data were compiled. There were no resident physicians at the Kotzebue or Kanakanak hospitals, but these hospitals received periodic coverage from the physicians stationed at Barrow and Bethel, respectively. A full-time civil-service physician was assigned permanently to the Kanakanak Hospital during the last week of June, 1946.

Skagway Sanatorium: At the beginning of the fiscal year only 50 beds were available for occupancy inasmuch as the hospital had been opened during the latter part of April, 1945; and the staffing and necessary alterations to the plant had not been completed at that time. During the year 50 additional beds were placed in service, and at the end of the fiscal year just passed the hospital had a census of 99 patients. A total of 125 patients were hospitalized in the sanatorium for a total of approximately 23,000 hospital days.

Contract hospitals within the Territory: At 13 contract hospitals in various sections of the Territory where no native service facilities are available, 496 beneficiaries received 16,445 days of hospital care. Fifty-five of these patients had been hospitalized for tuberculosis. Reports for May and June had not been received when these figures were compiled.

Children's Orthopedic Hospital, Seattle: Through the Crippled Children's Service of the Territorial Department of Health, supported by Federal funds administered by the Children's Bureau, 27 Alaska native children were admitted to the hospital between July 1, 1945, and June 30, 1946. In addition 7 older children and young adults were treated in the Swedish Hospital in Seattle. Twenty-one hospital cases and nine foster-home cases were carried over from fiscal year 1945, making a total of 55 native children who received hospital care of a total of 5,122 hospital days. Four thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven days of foster-home care were provided. Practically all of the cases came from families who are financially unable to assume any of the expenses involved; and, therefore, the Alaska Native Service provided the transportation and attendants required to transport these crippled children to the Seattle hospitals until the last quarter of the fiscal year, whereupon the health department assumed the expenses of transportation as well as hospitalization.

ACTIVITIES OF FIELD NURSES

There are 27 field nurse stations, 7 of which were inactive throughout the year because the services of qualified public health nurses were not available. In addition 4 trained field nurses were on duty at the three Native Service boarding schools, two being assigned to Eklutna Vocational School, one to Wrangell Institute, and one to the White Mountain School.

MEDICAL CARE RENDERED BY ANS TEACHERS

Reports received to date from 66 of the Alaska Native Service teachers, located throughout the Territory in isolated areas, indicate that a minimum of 21,063 medical treatments were administered by them to the natives of their villages for minor ailments. This treatment by the teachers is necessary in the absence of the services of physicians or field nurses. The medical division furnishes these teachers with medical supplies and instructions for their use in the form of a simple manual outlining the treatment for the more common afflictions.

TUBERCULOSIS

The widespread prevalence of tuberculosis among the natives continues to present the most difficult problems in providing adequate medical care. The estimate of 4,000 active cases in the Territory is still considered conservative. Four hundred and forty-six cases were officially reported for the first time to the health department during the year. One hundred and ninety-seven of these, which had not been previously reported, appeared on death certificates. According to the Territorial Department of Health, 254 native deaths from tuberculosis were reported.

CONCLUSIONS

The amount of medical care provided the natives of Alaska increased considerably during the past year over the previous years, in spite of the continued shortage of personnel and the limited funds appropriated. It is believed that with the termination of war conditions the services of qualified personnel will become available, and the program for the improvement of health conditions among the natives of Alaska may be expanded and more effectively carried out.

One of the most important defects in the medical-care program, namely, the lack of an adequate number of beds to isolate and treat persons suffering with infectious cases of tuberculosis, will be partially corrected upon completion of the new hospital facilities at Sitka.

CONSTRUCTION

The Alaska appropriation for this year includes funds for the following projects:

School and quarters building at Yakutat	$27,000
School and quarters building at Sevoonga	40,000
Nurse and physician quarters building at Barrow	35,000
Refrigeration unit for Kanakanak Hospital	3,500
Refrigeration unit for Tanana Hospital	3,500
200-bed tuberculosis hospital at Sitka	[1] 1,450,000
Alterations and remodeling school and hospital buildings at Sitka	215,000

[1] Approximate.

NATIVE RESOURCES—REINDEER

The policy of returning reindeer back to individual ownership has progressed. To date there are 12 individual herds, 9 association herds, and 8 Government herds. The Government's Nunivak Island reindeer herd was estimated at 28,000 in 1945. It has been determined that the range on the island could only maintain a maximum of 10,000 deer. During the summer of 1945 an active reduction project was carried out. Four thousand eight hundred and seventy-four animals—two thousand two hundred and thirteen fawn and two thousand six hundred and sixty-one adults—were butchered, frozen, and processed through the new cold-storage plant.

CANNERIES

At present there are two native cooperative salmon canneries, located at Metlakatla and Hydaburg, Alaska The latter is being financed by credit loan funds. The Angoon Community Association has applied for a credit loan to finance a clam and crab cannery. This is the first venture into this field.

CREDIT

Under the Indian Reorganization Act the following loans have been approved between the United States and Indian chartered corporations. Their status as of July 1, 1946, is as follows:

Corporations	Amount committed	Amount repaid
Hydaburg Cooperative Association:
Construct and equip salmon cannery	$142,000	$57,000
Finance cannery, 1944	280,000	280,000
Equip cannery	12,800	12,800
Finance cannery, 1945 and boat loans	305,000	283,000
Finance cannery 1946	280,000	----------
Angoon Community Asscciation (for individual boat loans)	40,600	25,000
Craig Community Association (for individual boat loans)	30,000	20,000
Hoonah Indian Association (for individual boat loans)	61,000	25,000
Organized village of Kasaan:
For individual boat loans	11,200	8,000
Do	6,400	5,400
Ketchikan Indian Corp. (for individual boat loans and boat shop)	50,250	5,250
Sitka Community Association:
For individual boat loans and boat shops	60,000	44,000
For individual boat loans	50,000	5,000
Total	1,328,650	770,450
FOR NATIVE COOPERATIVE STORES
Native village of Nikolski	7,000	7,000
Native village of White Mountain	13,500	13,500
Native village of Tetlin	19,000	8,000
Stebbins Community Asscciation	4,000	4,000
Native village of Mekoryuk	5,000	----------
Native village of Chanega	6,000	2,400
Native village of Atka	7,000	6,200
Native village of Elim	4,500	4,500
Native village of Kwethluk	4,000	2,000
Native village of Shismaref	4,000	4,000
King Island native community	2,000	1,600
Total (plus corporations above)	1,404,650	823,650

All of the above corporate loans are current and there are no delinquencies.

The following loan applications have been forwarded to the Chicago office. The first two have already been approved:

Native village of Unalakleet (for cooperative native store)	$25,000
Hoonah Indian Association (for initial payment Hoonah housing)	20,000
Angoon Community Association (clam and crab cannery)	75,000
For native cooperative stores:
Native village of Point Lay	12,000
Native village of Point Hope	35,000
Native village of Tyonek	18,000
Total	185,000

Plans are under way to forward native cooperative store loan applications for the following villages, totaling approximately $180,000: Kivalina, Napakiak, King Island, Chanega, Elim, Kwethluk, Buckland, Nikolski, Noatak, Shaktolik, White Mountain, Tanacross, Koyuk, Shungnak, Tatitlek.

A loan for $280,000 will be required to finance the Hydaburg Cooperative Association Salmon Cannery for 1947 season's operations.

An application for $300,000 is anticipated for financing a central buying and selling association for Alaska native cooperative stores.

ARTS AND CRAFTS

The calendar year 1945 showed a total of $248,512 in craft merchandise sold through the arts and crafts clearing houses at Juneau and Nome. Of this total, skin sewing made up 50 percent, ivory carving 37 percent, and wood carving, blanketry, basketry, models, art, and miscellaneous items constituted the remaining 13 percent. In addition to the goods sold for the native craftsmen, a large amount is sold them locally or used in their livelihood which amount would bring the total craft produced in the Territory to over a half million dollars.

Approximately 50 of the leading native caftsmen throughout the Territory are employed as assistant instructors in the schools to encourage a continuation of the crafts, as well as encourage an improved quality product.

The Nome Skin Sewers Cooperative Association serves as a clearing house for skin products of the Eskimo country and the Juneau office clears such craft as ivory carving, wood carving, model construction, and southeastern skin products.

In addition to the commercial and highly physical aspects of procuring and disposing of Alaskan native-made craft, the native arts and crafts division of the Alaska native service regard as vital such functions as the study of economic trends, the delving into records of ethnological and anthropological note to secure bases which may be reapplied to current production, the revitalization of stagnating workmanship, and the recording of date which as a source may be utilized in evaluating or summarizing the development and growth of arts and crafts in the Territory of Alaska.

These are the accomplishments of the Alaska Native Service, Mr. Speaker—these are its programs. I submit that they are calculated to be of great benefit to the native people. If the educational processes are continued, if the medical work is carried on, if social-welfare activities continue to be developed, if in his economic life the native is given a lift, if all these things continue to be done then the day is not far distant when the Indian, the Eskimo and the Aleut will be well equipped to stand alone on his own feet in the present-day world.

Courage—Our National Heritage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio talk by Henry J. Taylor:

COURAGE—OUR NATIONAL HERITAGE

There is a valley in Virginia, remote from greed and fear.

There the presence of a great American—dead for a hundred years—tells a helpful story, to you and me ,and especially to those now serving in our Government.

Go sometime to Charlottesville, Va.

See the lovely lawn and the structures of the University of Virginia, founded and built by Thomas Jefferson and described by many authorities as perhaps the most beautiful group of academic buildings in the whole world.

Mount the winding road to Monticello, Jefferson's home. Stop halfway up the hill. Stand by his grave. Read the epitaph chiseled in the simple gray stone.

It's that epitaph I intend to talk about tonight.

Now, Jefferson wrote his own epitaph and gave it to his daughter, Martha Randolph, 2 days before he died. He told her that exactly this inscription and not a word more was to mark his resting place.

These are Jefferson's words: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of American Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia."

Now the question. Do you notice something very extraordinary about this recording by Jefferson of his own life, his place among men?

Remember, Jefferson was a Governor of Virginia. He does not mention it.

Jefferson was sent to Congress. He doesn't mention being a Congressman.

Jefferson was appointed Minister to France and, later, he was Secretary of State. Not a word.

Jefferson was elected Vice President.

And, finally, Jefferson was President of the United States, twice elected. He does not mention it.

Why? Jefferson himself gave the answer. He told his daughter why he referred to the Declaration of Independence, his authorship of the religious statute, and his founding of the university, and why he omitted any reference to the Presidency or any other public office.

And because I am a son of the University of Virginia, I naturally have a warm spot in my heart for my alma mater's founding father's answer to the question.

This is what Jefferson said:

"The things in this inscription," he stated, "are things I did for the people. The other things not in it are things which the people did for me."

My, my, if we could just recapture today in many of our public servants some of Jefferson's spirit, some small portion of his frame of mind, some little indication that many officeholders do not believe that their whole lives and bodies and souls depend on being reelected, on getting themselves elected again, getting somebody's vote, staying in office—compromising this, compromising that, and lending a murkiness to our Nation's entire atmosphere.

Jefferson is an American immortal, a universal hero of enlightened liberal mankind in every country of the world, now and forever.

Was he a political failure?

How can it be that the lessons taught by his character, his spirit, his intelligence—so indelible in history—are nevertheless so unimpressive to many leaders today that they do not believe that they can afford to adopt them?

SMART POLITICS VERSUS SPIRIT OF SERVICE

Courage, independence, the willingness to stand upright for justice to all and favors to none—cost what it may in votes—are these qualities so politically dangerous, so unappealing and unpopular that smart politics and low-political morals must often take their place now in as critical a time as our Nation ever faced?

Why is it that there is such widespread blindness to simple honesty, moral stamina, and ordinary political duty? Why the infatuation instead with smart politics and mere vote getting as the best political course to follow? Is it such a wonderful thing to exercise little temporary powers and have official privileges that come as the reward for cleverness at the polls, obedience to pressure groups, and from writing laws with one eye always cocked on the ballot box?

What a mockery to the spirit of service in any public office, high or low—what a poor epitaph in the making, if the inscription is to be "I got myself reelected." How lightly the epitaph would be etched on the stone of immortality.

At a time like this it seems so natural that our wonderful country would yearn for an abundance of superior men. For our country is beginning to see that the wealth of a nation consists more than in anything else in the number of superior men that it harbors.

But the thing that is mysterious, at least to me, and difficult to understand, is why the men we have do not seem to yearn to be superior.

OPPORTUNITY FOR GREATNESS EXISTS TODAY

Certainly the opportunity for greatness is present today. Jefferson, Washington, Adams, Calhoun, Patrick Henry, Lincoln—the entire roster of independently minded, courageous American men—can be called out against the background of their times, and not one of them lived in a period of greater national importance to more people than today. But were their lives tied up with being reelected? No; they were not. And that's one reason why they were great.

Listen a moment and hear two of them speak.

Washington: "The period for a new election being not far distant * * * it appears to me proper * * * to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom the choice is to be made."

Jefferson, in refusing a third term as President: "The whole art of government consists in the art of being honest. Only aim to do your duty and mankind will give you credit where you fail. * * * I have felt it a duty to withdraw at the close of my present term of office and (in this way) to strenghen by practice a principle which I deem salutary (for the public welfare)."

From these spirits and from those of countless other self-sacrificing men who have passed in the current of American public life, the only worth-while epitaphs in our land have been written.

For the weather in the realm of immortality is harsh, the wind of history blows hard, and the inscription, "I got myself reelected," vanishes even before there is time for the weather to wear the meaningless fact away and wash a man's name into oblivion.

TWO FACTORS PACE PROGRESS

True progress among our people must depend on two interwoven factors. One is the individual American bearing the power of initiative, intelligence, and industriousness in his nature. The other is the quality of the government under which we live, with its power of stimulating or retarding individual progress and its power of adopting or rejecting sound legislation for the good of all. Both factors—the individual and the government leadership—are essential one to the other. The government stagnates without the good development of the individual. The individual stagnates without the development of good impartial government.

It is not too much for the people in our land to ask for the highest morality in governmental affairs, for the absolutely impartial treatment of every citizen or group of citizens regardless of how little power or influence they have at the polls.

We have the right to expect such government under a constitution which every officeholder is required to swear to uphold.

But if these are the real needs of this Republic, we must find a way to have it known to officeholders in every nook and cranny of our land that those who urge public officials to do them favors in order to stay in office need not be listened to.

That is the fact. But pressure groups hide the fact, and countless politicians do not realize that they can afford to be independent. In this respect many political minds remain chained to the demands of pressure groups in the way an elephant I saw in the Bronx Zoo remained chained to a stake after the chain was gone.

For years the elephant was confined to one spot in his enclosure. When the keeper took off the chain the elephant did not move. The habit of slavery had become too strong. The poor beast just stood still there by the stake to his last living days—bound by his imagination, a prisoner of his own ignorance, a victim of his own surrender, sadly swaying his heavy head, not recognizing the freedom of action that had come to him.

Yes, public sentiment against pressure groups of all kinds, in our land today, has taken the chain off many of our public servants. Most of them are free to act solely for the people now if they only realized it and were no longer afraid of threats by anybody about anything.

We're all put here to do the best we can, to control ourselves and help others, to use wisely the knowledge and substance that we inherit from our predecessors, and try to add to both. Knowledge of this, and sentiment for it, is growing—not receding.

FUTURE HOLDS PROMISE

Take heart. It is not true that this country, the wonderland of the world, is falling to pieces. This Nation is turning on a great pivot toward better times, toward a redressing of the factors which are so evidently out of balance in our country.

For the nation blest above all nations is she in whom the civic conscience of the people does the saving of the country day by day; by demanding new and better balances when things are out of teeter; by speaking, writing and voting reasonably; by the people knowing true men when they see them and preferring them to plug-uglies, to partisans, or to empty quacks.

The thing for us to do is to remember that great progress and a great future are ahead of us and do all we can to prepare for the future and hurry it along.

We should study and work to control ourselves, limit the power of greedy men, clip the wings and pull the teeth of pressure groups, and spend every ounce of energy we can in supplying courage to our representatives in this Republic.

"Let common sense and honesty have fair play and they will soon set things to rights," said Jefferson.

"Conscience is the only cue which will eternally guide a man clear of all doubts and inconsistencies," said Jefferson.

"When a man assumes a public trust he should consider himself a public property," said Jefferson.

Think of this great man's principles and you will realize that this is no time to be discouraged about our country. For the obvious fact is that from one end of this Nation to the other the moral attitude, the principles and the elevation of common justice represented by Jefferson himself are not unpopular. They just seem unpopular because we so seldom see them displayed. But they are the things which would have the most appeal today, if many of our leaders would only have the courage to supply them. They are exactly the things which, it seems clear, the majority of ordinary Americans, who after all represent the overwhelming body of people, are just aching to see put into practice at this very time in your land and mine.

OPA and Union Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the country can well recognize its indebtedness to David Lawrence for his forthright articles dealing with the question of OPA and union labor itself.

The time is at hand for the country to have a clear-cut understanding of what labor's demands are and to finally recognize that labor, regardless of its contribution to the country, its wages must become a part of the cost of any commodity.

There has been a dishonest endeavor to hide this fact from the people of the Nation. It is regrettable indeed that there appears to exist today, with this administration as was the case with the one preceding it, a condition of collusion between union labor and any Government agency to abrogate and suspend its normal processes.

Every intelligent person wants labor to get a square deal, but the square deal is not the issue here. The issue is party politics, of which labor is a big contributor, and the administration is the recipient.

In the Midwest today those of us who represent farm areas are receiving daily barrages of mail because the Allis-Chalmers plants, the J. I. Case plants, and others manufacturing farm machinery are still on strike. Again and again we are being requested to induce the President to take over the plants. All of us remember that when the administration takes over a plant, labor wins all the battles. The owner almost loses control of his stock.

Another great crop is being harvested in the great farm areas and the world waits anxiously for the harvesting of this crop. The world is hungry, and yet this administration sits idly by, first with one expression asking that we feed Europe and then refusing to take a hand in helping the Midwest farmers to obtain machinery to harvest their crop, a crop so needed throughout the civilized world.

The reasons for this inactivity are understandable. They are part and parcel of the New Deal alliance made with labor at the beginning of the Roosevelt administration. The administration is more concerned with labor's votes than it is with feeding starving Europe and giving justice to these great Midwestern farmers by helping them to obtain machinery and machinery parts to harvest another great crop.

Under unanimous consent, I include a very well-written article by David Lawrence, who has constantly written intelligently on this disturbing subject:

LABOR POLITICIANS FACE CRISIS ON OPA—VICIOUS CIRCLE OF PRICES AND COSTS NEAR PEAK

(By David Lawrence)

Labor union politicians are not happy over the price increases just announced by the restored OPA. This is because many labor union chiefs have forced costs upward and the OPA has no choice now but to add those costs when authorizing the new prices.

A deliberate effort has been made to hide from the country the true cause of the present inflation and the considerable part that union labor leaders have played, through their strikes and wage demands, in sending prices upward.

Before the present OPA controversy—that is, before June 30—there were 13,743 price increases granted by the OPA to individual companies in the first half of 1946. Of these, 4,318 were granted in the first quarter and 9,425 in the second quarter.

FIVE HUNDRED AND NINETY-TWO INDUSTRY-WIDE BOOSTS

The extent of these increases in prices can be best understood when it is noted that there were 592 industry-wide increases with the approval of OPA between January 1 and June 30 of this year.

The new wage-price policy was announced on February 14 by the administration to help absorb the high wage increases forced on the country by the major strikes. This policy didn't get under way from an operational standpoint in OPA until April, and that is why the second quarter of this year shows so many price increases as compared with the first quarter.

As soon as the revived OPA began functioning again last week, announcement was made of many increases in prices. Higher prices authorized for coal and solid fuels were significant. The OPA itself explained that the boost in coal prices was attributed chiefly to increases in freight rates and shipping costs, which, in turn, were due to the increased prices the railroads had to pay for coal as a result of the President's grant of increases in wages to the coal miners and rail workers.

In many of the price increases ordered, such as for lumber, paper board, fiber board, insulation products, and various materials used in construction, the raises resulted in large part from labor costs.

CIO ATTACKS OPA

It is quite natural to find the CIO crying out that the OPA is increasing prices when it should be holding them down. But the OPA is compelled to take into account labor costs, and prices must necessarily rise. What is happening, of course, is a vicious circle. Labor became panicky after VJ-day and didn't wait for production to attain normal levels but insisted on a 30-percent increase in pay at once to make it possible for wartime take-home pay to be retained. Then President Truman enunciated a labor program encouraging 18-cent-an-hour increases. The result was an inflationary trend which really forced the whole OPA crisis.

Manufacturers simply could not get production going unless they had a margin above expenses. The OPA was trying to squeeze out the profits but in numerous instances was unable to do so. Labor union politicians clamored for the profit squeeze because the left wing is not interested in the profit system, being eager to produce the chaotic conditions that bring on State socialism or nationalization of industries.

Today the left wing is starting a new campaign. It is an attempt to hold OPA responsible for the price increases. The OPA is merely carrying out the mandate of the President and the Congress, who agreed that the private enterprise system was not to be sabotaged by allowing wage increases which manufacturers could not include in their costs.

More will be heard from the left wing labor groups, but actaully they will be disappointed eventually in the results of their crusade. In due time, production will catch up with demand in food products and prices will come down, and the excuse of cost-of-living increases will no longer be available as a means of reopening labor contracts.

What the union politicians conveniently forget is what the OPA has been doing since February 14 while the old law was in effect. The wage-cost item has been pyramiding rapidly and, in the end, the workers of the country may find their cost of food is down to reasonable levels but the price of manufactured articles needed for construction or repairs or for transportation or other nonfood necessities will steadily go upward, thus diminishing the purchasing power of the dollar.

The vicious circle will continue until labor leaders concede that increases in wages must be accompanied by corresponding increases in output or depressions and unemployment become inevitable.

State Department Information and Propaganda Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, originally at the request of the State Department a bill was introduced before the Foreign Affairs Committee to authorize a new information and cultural relations program all over the world. It proposed to establish a program in the broadest possible terms for the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills but the language used in the bill was so general in character it was almost incapable of definition. It almost amounted to a legislative monstrosity.

It was soon apparent there was so much dissatisfaction with this measure that there was need for a more specific bill so the original bill was abandoned and H. R. 4982 was substituted in its place. This measure was rushed through the Foreign Affairs Committee, in my opinion without adequate hearings, and immediately sent to the Rules Committee.

To prove this was the case, after the original hearings were closed objections were raised on the part of the United Press and Associated Press to portions of the bill. The Rules Committee also was not satisfied and insisted, before they would vote out a rule, that some ten amendments, which they suggested, must be adopted by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Hearings were therefore reopened and the amendments suggested by the Rules Committee were adopted.

One of the amendments was the elimination of the time limit of 2 years at the period of authorization. The majority of the committee supinely accepted this amendment which would take away forever the right of this committee to review the activities of this program.

I presented three amendments which would have prevented the State Department from paying the expenses of attendance at meetings or conventions of societies and associations brought here from any place in the world; and which would also have prohibited the furnishing for subjects of other countries such entertainment, without limitation, as the Secretary determines to be advisable.

I also presented an amendment which would have stricken out language permitting the State Department to make grants of money both in this country and other countries for technical projects. I discussed this situation on the floor of the House last February 13, when I used this language:

What is meant by technical projects? I am unable to state. I hope we are not to judge the future by the past. Under a program undertaken by the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs such programs as providing a technical basis for planning was undertaken in Paraguay at a cost of $105,500; a program to improve agricultural technique in Peru costing $101,701; to introduce ideas and techniques designed to effect an increase in production of food products in Venezuela, costing $40,000; public baths and lodgings in Chile at a cost of $185,000; water supply system in Honduras at a cost of $41,282; sewerage system in Ecuador at a cost of $36,496; and a road project in Honduras of $1,222,000.

Unfortunately, this bill was brought up under suspension of the rules, so no amendments could be offered on the floor to the bill and the debate was confined to 40 minutes. Therefore I take this method of calling them to the attention of the House.

There was, however, one vital change made in this bill. An amendment was accepted by the committee which prohibits the Department of State from creating a monopoly in the production or sponsorship on the air of short-wave broadcasting programs, or monopoly in any other media of information.

This amendment also provided that the State Department should invite outstanding private American leaders in the cultural and information fields to review and advise on the Government's international information activities. It also provided that all printed matter, broadcasts, films, and other material in the fields of mass media, when disseminated by the Government, should be identified as to Government or private source.

This amendment was accepted by the committee only after the indefatigable efforts of the distinquished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS], who single handed and by his persistent efforts brought to a successful conclusion the proper safeguarding of this measure.

This was a great victory in behalf of private enterprise and against monopolistic practices and regulations by the Government. In my opinion this amendment, secured by Mr. VORY'S efforts, improved the bill. He should be highly commended for his fine work.

I had called attention to the need for correction of this situation as early as February 13 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD pp. 1285–1287), when I said:

The State Department was so anxious to have this bill pass the Congress before the last session expired it was pushed through our committee, in my opinion, without adequate hearings. That this was the case became apparent when the Rules Committee refused to grant a rule on this measure even though there appeared before it bipartisan proponents of the bill.

It is also apparent there is dissatisfaction with this measure from sources outside of Congress, because after the Foreign Affairs Committee had approved it both the AP and UP news syndicates publicly notified the State Department of their refusal to cooperate in such a program. If the reports in the press are correct, opposition was also encountered from the school of journalism in New York City.

Before Congress acts upon this bill I believe there should be further hearings upon it by the Foreign Affairs Committee so these interested parties can be heard. If such an opportunity is not afforded, I believe the proper action for this House would be, when this bill is presented, to recommit it to the committee for further consideration.

* * * * *

But if it should be the case, instead of propaganda being sent out as information from this country that only factual information is used, are we not invading the legitimate field of the regularly established news agencies by setting up such an information service? Certainly we should not sponsor any agency which would enter into direct competition in this field.

What is there in this bill which limits such service so there would be assurance it would be facilitative and supplemental to the normal currents of private interchange through the medium of the press, radio, camera, and screen?

While I believe there are certain legitimate programs in the international field in which this country should engage so it could properly carry out its responsibilities in the postwar years, yet I am convinced that in authorizing such programs there should be very definite limitations and conditions which would prevent our Government from competing with privately established institutions, industries, and other enterprises.

Public Housing—The Foundation of State Socialism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN S. GIBSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Joseph H. Deckman:

PUBLIC HOUSING—THE FOUNDATION OF STATE SOCIALISM

(By Joseph H. Deckman, executive committee, National Home and Property Owners' Foundation)

The parallel between public housing and state socialism becomes so apparent to the student of political science that it looks suspiciously as though the advocates of public housing are interested in something far more than slum clearance or the housing of the indigent.

Public ownership of the home is the rock-bed foundation of any form of state socialism, be it communism, fascism, or nazism.

In America there exists no greater menace to our traditional way of life than the spread of public housing. The only excuse for the existence of public housing is the claim that it is necessary to house the low-income groups and to exercise the powers of eminent domain in rehabilitating slums and blighted areas.

At first blush one is led to believe that only a public agency can accomplish all the desired results needed in clearing outmoded areas and the housing of the indigent. However, when a thorough study is made of the problem, it is found that a public agency is only needed to clear slums and blighted areas by exercising the power of eminent domain.

In Washington a plan of slum clearance through the use of a public agency and private enterprise has been formulated. Under this plan, the Public Land Agency, after clearing a blighted or slum area, sells the cleared land to private enterprise at a fair appraisal value based on its redevelopment use. Under the sales terms, maximum rents are specified for low-cost housing so that the public interest is safeguarded against exploitation.

It is a proven fact that private enterprise can construct and manage housing and existing public welfare agencies can render assistance to the indigent, at a much less cost to the taxpayer than the Socialist plan of using public housing to perform these functions.

It has been proven before the Burton Senate Subcommittee Investigating Public Housing in Washington that private enterprise can build at a cost from 25 to 40 percent less than public housers. Furthermore, on the basis of comparable constructed housing, private enterprise can rent low enough to compete with the so-called economic rents of public housing and still pay all taxes, interest, and amortization.

Comparing this situation to public housing, it is found that the permanent public projects do not pay taxes of any description and no interest or payments on the principal are made for public funds used in constructing the housing. The rents received from tenants are not sufficient to pay more than the overhead and operating expenses of the projects.

Permanent public housing constructed under the United States Housing Act of 1937 is even subsidized to the extent of an annual subsidy amounting to a sum equal to the interest and amortization of the money used for construction.

This money is not used to pay the interest and principal of the construction cost, but is used to write down the rents of the indigents that are housed in the project.

This procedure is one of the greatest falsehoods ever perpetrated on the American public, as the annual subsidy, over and above the tax exemption and the gift of the original cost of the project, is used to write down rents.

The writing down of the rents for the needy is the whole basis for the support given public housing by the general public.

It is these enormously subsidized low rents that public housers use in comparison with legitimate full rents charged by private enterprise. Private rents not being subsidized must reflect taxes of all description, interest on construction money, and payment of the principal in a reasonable length of time. Compared to this, public housing does not pay any taxes, no interest, and no amortization. Besides the rents for operating expenses are figured on a basis of a 60-year life for all permanent housing.

As stated before, private enterprise on comparable housing can meet the economic rent charged for public housing, and still pay all costs if the land is made available for development. The only remaining problem is that of providing rent assistance for the needy.

No subject is more controversial than that of providing tenant rent relief. The reason being that should the general public realize, which it is beginning to, that public welfare is the logical and least expensive method of administering rent assistance, then there will be no excuse for public housing.

When it is considered that no one, either public or private, can build housing to rent to the man who can't afford to pay the lowest economic rent, then under our present social thinking some public agency must render to the tenant a rent subsidy. The only logical agency to render a rent subsidy is public welfare, which provides food, clothing, fuel, and other needs of the indigent.

When food and clothing are needed for the poor, the general public does not think that it is necessary for a public agency to operate the corner grocery store or the local haberdashery. It becomes difficult to understand why public housing is declared necessary to house people to whom public welfare is already supplying all their other wants.

With the continual urging of more public housing by its advocates after the Washington plan of slum clearance by private enterprise has been introduced, one's suspicions are aroused that perhaps more than slum clearance and housing for low-income groups is desired. These suspicions are justified when the writings and policies of public housers are examined. The first noticeable policy is found in the rule that not more than 25 percent of the tenants of a project can be of the indigent class. The reason for this policy is that 75 percent of the tenants must pay so-called economic rents in order for the project to pay its operating expenses. In other words, the enormous subsidies are only enough to write down the rents of 25 percent of the tenants. This condition results from the high-construction maintenance and management costs of the projects.

Nathan Strauss, foremost public houser in the country and one of the authors of the United States Housing Act of 1937, states in his book, The Seven Wonders of Housing, that public housers propose to house the lower third of the population in public housing. He then draws the very correct conclusion that after this one-third is housed that the middle third will not be able to bear the burden and that they too will have to be housed.

With two-thirds of the population in public housing it doesn't take much stretch of the imagination to see where the American democratic way of life will go.

Strauss is not alone in his thinking, as the National Capitol Housing Authority in Washington in a report to Congress implied in positive language that it proposed to house all citizens receiving salaries of $2,000 per year or less. Before World War II this classification would embrace approximately 70 percent of the citizens of the District of Columbia.

The war housing built in Washington by Defense Home Corporation, a tax-exempt Government housing agency, specified a salary limit of $2,600, which was later lifted.

Individuals making $2,600, or $2,000, or even $1,800, as specified for USHA properties, are certainly not indigents and can well afford to pay tax-bearing private enterprise rents.

In reviewing the public-housing program there is only one final conclusion to draw, and that is the socialistic schemers in America are planning to throw our great democratic Republic into state socialism through the back door of public housing.

Housing the Needy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article by Clarke Daniel, National Secretary of the National Home and Property Owners Foundation, entitled "Housing the Needy":

HOUSING THE NEEDY

(By Clarke Daniel, National Secretary, National Home and Property Owners Foundation)

Back in early history, if you wanted something you went out and got it or did without. As history progressed, the strong-arm method was replaced by barter. Barter was superseded by widespread trading and commerce with the advent of money. Competition resulted in the development of new markets. When these markets reached sufficient volume so as to result in distributing comfortable living conditions to a great segment of civilization, concern was eventually shown about the less fortunate, who had always brought up the rear. The first concern was to feed and clothe the poor, then to provide medical assistance. Now our social thinking has progressed to the point where proper housing of the needy is considered necessary for the common good.

Our present discussion is concerned with the best and more efficient administration of "municipal shelter assistance"; to see that this money goes as far and does as much good for the needy as is possible.

The difference in cost of these items—clothing, food, medicine, shelter—and what the needy can pay for them, must be borne by society in the form of charity and public welfare. Since charity is usually a private program, the way it is distributed is the prerogative of those who administer it, and rightly so. But when charity is a public function, using public funds, it becomes the public's affair. This public welfare is paid for by taxes and it is everyone's duty and responsibility to see that the money goes as far and does as much good as possible.

In the field of housing, the objective is to have adequate healthful and sanitary shelter to meet the needs of decent living conditions in a given area. This housing naturally should be supplied as rapidly and as efficiently as possible. This should first be done through strict enforcement of existing sanitary and building laws that are now in effect. The existing laws where found inadequate should be amended to secure results. That will force existing substandard structures to either be brought up to standard through renovation, or to be demolished. Secondly, homes should be supplied through the construction of new housing from low-cost on up, to thoroughly supply the area's need for all types of housing. This construction should naturally be done by those who can do it best for the least, particularly the low-cost housing job, remodeled or new. It has been proved incontrovertibly that professional private enterprise builders can provide better housing for less and also manage this housing for less than Government public housing. Private builders, therefore, should be required to do the job.

Public housing is a subsidy, no matter how the public housers attempt to explain this fact away—a subsidy to the tenant and no one else. A man who lives in public housing is definitely known to all his fellow citizens as one who is enjoying a subsidy. Quite to the contrary, a man who today receives rent assistance from public welfare has his status known only to the social case worker and to the relief headquarters where these facts are not made public. But there is a psychological aspect which is far more important. An American citizen, who finds himself in unfortunate circumstances (and who hasn't) looks forward to the realization of his ambition to relieve his own circumstances just as rapidly as possible. The American way of life is based upon that fundamental factor. The man in public housing, who enjoys an advantage at the expense of his fellows, is tempted to drift along. Even if he is paying the so-called economic rent, this is known to his neighbors and his associates who are fully aware of the fact that he is being housed under a subsidy at their (the taxpayers') expense.

Is there any better way to cause a rift in our social structure, to create a feeling of inferiority on one hand and contempt on the other than to house special subsidized groups in special restricted projects?

This condition is certain to create a rupture in our society because it is a definite example of economic injustice and of class legislation.

We have finally come to the crux of the whole slum-clearance and low-rent housing situation, the question of shelter relief. The real concern of housing the needy is to determine in what way we can meet the difference between what shelter rent costs and what the poor family can pay.

Should the rent be written down or should there be a rent certificate used to make up the above-mentioned difference? This is a debatable question, but one thing is sure. Those who pass out the rent certificates, or decide how much the rent should be written down for each particular needy case, should be those who know the most about the individual families' needs. Is it a benevolent Federal construction company, or is it the local welfare agency? Do we find the welfare board planning housing projects on the edge of Washington in which the policy will be to take care of not over 25 percent of poor people lest the project become a poorhouse? The answer is "No," emphatically no! You find the welfare board working in the slums by the bedside of the sick and needy, with those whom our taxes are supposed to help.

There is surely not the slightest doubt as to the Public Welfare Board's knowing and understanding the conditions of the needy. It is certainly the logical agency to administer shelter-relief and place the various families in stimulating surroundings. It will not herd them into special Government housing institutions, and brand them in the eyes of the public with the stigma of "charges of the state," labeling them as individuals who can't make the grade. How would you and your families like living under these conditions?

In this great land of ours, we should demand that those who know the job best, are assigned to do the job.

The Wisconsin Way of Keeping the Agricultural Record Straight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the following article is from the July 25, 1946, edition of the Antigo (Wis.) Journal:

BUTTON CHARGES UNITED STATES HEALTH SERVICE IN TENNESSEE MILK BAN

MADISON.—A situation in which the United States Public Health Service "is using public funds to promote its own expansion" was charged by Milton Button, Wisconsin agriculture department director, yesterday, with being responsible for the recent ban upon the sale of Wisconsin milk in Knoxville, Tenn.

Button made the charge in a report to Gov. Walter S. Goodland on the Wisconsin investigation of the ban first announced July 7. Copies of the report were sent to Wisconsin Congressmen and Senators, and to directors of agriculture, and health departments in other States.

In a section of the report headed "The problem to be met," Button declared:

"It would appear that the Nation faces a situation where a Federal agency, the United States Public Health Service, is using public funds to promote the expansion of that agency. By holding out the bait of huge grants of Federal funds it is attempting to force municipalities to demand its inspection service and thereby create an increase in the work demand upon its personnel."

Button declared the investigation made by the three-member Wisconsin committee revealed increase in the infant mortality rate at Knoxville could in no way be traced to Wisconsin-produced milk.

Members of the committee were Dr. Henry Scott, research director of the Wisconsin alumni research foundation; Harvey Weavers, chief of the agriculture department's dairy division; and Anthony Madler, assistant attorney general and department counsel.

Dr. Scott said two findings by leading pediatricians in Tennessee revealed only 2 percent of bottle-fed children under 1 year of age were fed fluid milk. He added that 98 percent of the infants were fed evaporated milk or other formulas as distinguished from bottled milk.

The report stated also that Wisconsin dairy products were recombined with Knoxville water before distribution as fluid milk.

The Knoxville death rate per thousand live births was 51.8 in 1945, compared to 39 in 1944. But, Wisconsin officials declared, last year's average was in accordance with 52 deaths in each 1940 and 1941, and 53.3 in 1942.

In Washington, United States Public Health officials said they had no comment.

Mr. Speaker, this article indicates that forward looking States, such as Wisconsin, are not going to allow Federal bureaucracy to falsely brand the products of the State. There is a field in marketing for closer coordination between Federal and State agencies, but this Knoxville incident is not a step in that direction.

Amendments to Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STIGLER

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. STIGLER. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply disappointed in some of the provisions of the social-security bill reported out by the House Ways and Means Committee on July 15, known as H. R. 7037. Its inadequacies were frankly admitted before this body by a member of that committee, and I quote from the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin whose judgment I heartily respect:

This bill will probably, on its face, seem inadequate and probably is inadequate but was introduced because this was all that could be brought out at this time without getting into an extended controversy.

The day before the rule under which this bill was to be considered was brought before us, the many inequities and injustices of this bill were discussed. The charges made against this piece of legislation were not refuted. Nevertheless, on July 24 the vote against the previous question on the rule, which, if approved by a majority of the Congress, would have made the rule subject to amendments and thereby allowed the Congress itself to determine how we should consider our country's social-security needs, failed to obtain a majority. I recognize that we are anxious to return to our people for a number of reasons. I believe that I am just as eager to return to that beautiful and fertile section of the country that I represent as any Member, and yet my vote was cast against the previous question on the rule in order that we might give full consideration and carefully deliberate this bill.

We are here to represent the people and to enact legislation in their behalf. It is our obligation to represent our people equally and impartially. I feel that one of our greatest obligations is to our senior citizens, to our dependent children, and to those who see not the light of day. To those who have reached the twilight of their lives we owe so much for the good things we now enjoy. The national heritage of which we so proudly boast was made possible by their unceasing toil for which they were often so poorly rewarded. They look to us, these senior citizens of ours, for the fulfillment of our pledges of at least minimum assistance which will make easier the burdens of life during their few remaining years.

How, then, can one agree to the hasty consideration of admittedly inadequate and ill-conceived legislation which so vitally affects our entire social structure? It is true we have been in session for a long time and have been called upon to consider momentous and difficult legislation which has at times tried our very souls. And yet, in the closing days of this session, when we had the opportunity to consider domestic legislation of such vital concern to our people, we permitted a rule to stand which absolutely precluded either full consideration or amendment. We allowed ourselves no alternative, and for that the minds of many will, I am sure, know deep regret.

I return to my people with the knowledge that I have done my utmost. At the same time, despite the fact that I have done everything possible under the rules of this Congress to correct the wrongs of this bill, I shall leave this House with a troubled mind and shall know no peace until this grievous mistake has been rectified.

The hopes of thousands of our senior citizens, whose eyes are turned toward Washington looking for an increase in their monthly pension checks, have been dimmed and bitter disappointment now prevails. With the rising cost of living, the helping hand we extended to those people will seem empty indeed. I dare say there is not a single Member of Congress who has not advocated an increase in old-age assistance to the senior citizens of his State. I have long believed in extending assistance to our elder people. This subject is not new to me. It so happens that I was the first president of a pension organization for my home county many, many years ago. My interest is not new. It began those many years ago and it is sustained today.

I believe I know more than a little about this subject. It has occupied my time and my attention for a long time, and since being a Member of Congress I have received hundreds of letters and talked with many hundreds more of our senior citizens. They are all looking to Congress to increase Federal participation in extending further social security benefits for them.

In Hitler-Europe they found it expedient to exterminate the aged and the feeble. They called them mercy killings and justified them on the basis of the nonproductiveness of the individuals whose lives were taken. We have fought a terrible war against that kind of philosophy, and now our attention is turned to the wants and the needs of our own people. We were horrified at what was done in Nazi Germany. Is it callousness that causes us to leave our elder people to a certain want and privation? Or is it for some other reason that we fail to make adequate provisions for Federal assistance? Whatever the reason, and regardless of its merits, I say today that so long as my voice remains and I possess the strength to use it, it shall be raised in defense of the principles to which I am pledged and devoted.

If I did not raise my voice at this hour, Mr. Speaker, I would be recreant in my duty to my people who are interested in this legislation. I do not want to be a party to the death of the flame of hope in these people's hearts and turn their thoughts into bitterness and despair. I am fearful that has been done by the action which was taken. I have the utmost respect and highest regard for the membership of our great Ways and Means Committee, which has considered for many months expansion of the Social Security Act, with particular reference to old-age and survivors insurance and the problems of coverage, pensions, and taxes related thereto.

Under House Resolution 204 passed on March 26, 1945, a competent staff of experts began a study which was expected to lead to a comprehensive expansion of the program, and was to present a report early in 1946. Our purpose was made clear at that time, and there was no question regarding the mandate given to the committee. Certainly no Member objected to the assumption of the responsibility for the conduct of this study.

But what was the result? Congress waited until this late hour before it even began the consideration of such extremely important legislation. I cannot help but recall the fact that we have had time to debate loans to other countries, international obligations, UNRRA appropriations, and a host of other things intended to cure the ills of the world. Our ideals were lofty indeed, but I will not attempt to assess our successes because I for one somehow do not feel that we have accomplished too much in the affairs of the nations of the world. In any event, the debate was most lengthy and by our common agreement we, in the end, did what we thought was best.

The point I want to make was that we at least gave full consideration to those measures as they came before the House, and yet when we take up a bill so vital to our own citizens we dispose of it with little more than a bang of the gavel. I am bitterly disappointed and I cannot avoid saying so. I shall continue to say so in every way I know how until appropriate corrective action is taken, and I am confident that such action will be taken.

I cannot too strongly emphasize the unfortunate fact that Congress has not recognized more fully its responsibilities and obligations to our needy, particularly in view of the millions and millions of dollars we have appropriated to assist the starving people of Europe and Asia, and to sustain a balanced economy in England and China and other countries. My disappointment is particularly keen in view of my own personal knowledge from persons who have been overseas and are over there now that much of our contribution has been poured into the cesspool of corrupt European politics and has made black marketeers wealthy beyond belief in the far corners of the world. The poor and needy of the world have received relatively little benefit from our largess, and yet we have continued to sign the checks.

Mr. Speaker, to me my people have always come first, and they will continue to do so as long as I am in public life. That is why I this day raise my voice in condemnation of this discrimination against our own people.

This bill, H. R. 7037, as I understand it, fails to deal with the more important aspects of social security. It is wholly inadequate. And this despite the thousands of dollars and months of labor devoted to the study of the entire social security program.

I was in hopes that the rule would be amended so as to permit the offering of H. R. 6911, which I think is the more comprehensive of the two bills reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

The variable matching formula adopted by the committee in H. R. 6911 would have given additional Federal funds to 31 States. The 31 States which will lose Federal funds because of the omission from H. R. 7037 of this variable matching formula, and the Federal proportion of the amounts paid to recipients which they would have received under H. R. 6911, or so far as my own State is concerned, is 66⅔ percent.

If H. R. 6911 had been accepted as a substitute, my own State would have received $22,812,000 from the Federal Government for old-age assistance, an increase of $11,403,000.

Under H. R. 7037, which the House passed, 86 percent of the additional Federal funds for old-age assistance will go to the 10 richest States with 29 percent of the aged population, while the 10 poorest States with 14 percent of the aged population will get only 1 percent of the additional Federal funds. I wonder what kind of equity and justice is that? To my way of thinking this is the rankest kind of discrimination against the neediest States, and to me it is shocking.

Under the bill passed by the House my own State will receive an increase of only $60,000 during the coming year. Compare this if you will with the amount of $13,031,000 which California will receive. New York shall receive $2,810,000. Massachusetts shall receive $4,969,000. Washington, $2,200,000. On the other hand, States like Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, and North Carolina receive nothing.

As of April 1946, there were 84,984 senior citizens of my State receiving assistance. What will that $60,000 increase mean to those people during the coming year? They cannot possibly look for an increase of more than approximately 75 cents in their receipts for the entire year. We have appropriated money and authorized two pay increases for civil service based on the increased cost of living. Labor has obtained like increases, and justifiably so, to help defray the higher living cost. Congress also has voted to increase its salaries effective next January. As a matter of fact, if the spiral continues the increases which have been obtained under such trying conditions may well be inadequate.

But what do we do for our older people? In my State we give them less than a dollar a year increase. I emphasize that it is not just. I want my people to know that I kept faith with them and I shall continue to keep that faith until a fair measure of assistance has been granted to our senior citizens.

Radio Address Before State PMA Meeting, Marquette, Mich.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. HOOK
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me before the State PMA meeting, Marquette, Mich., broadcast over WDMJ:

I speak to you—my neighbors in Michigan—with both pleasure and regret on this particular occasion. It is a pleasure, indeed, to have an opportunity to talk to farm leaders and friends of agriculture in the State. Your interests and your problems are closely interwoven with the well-being of every community in Michigan. Until your interests are served and your problems adequately solved, there can be no basis for a prosperous State and a strong Nation. The needs of no other group deserve more careful consideration than yours. That's why I was glad to accept the invitation to speak to State and county farm leaders while you are meeting to plan for the future.

But I sincerely regret that I cannot be with you in Marquette today. I had believed earlier that Congress would be in recess by this time, and I would be free to join you. However, we are even now trying to clear up the important business still before us in Washington. And, if I am to fulfill my duties as the elected representative of the people of Michigan, it is imperative that I stay on the job during these closing days of the Seventy-ninth session of Congress. The responsibility of representing the will of more than 200,000 people of the twelfth congressional district of Michigan is not one to be accepted lightly—particularly now in this time of drastic change in our national economy.

Your congressional representative must keep before him at all times the needs and interests of the people for whom he speaks. Every vote he casts in the Halls of Congress—every decision he helps to make in congressional committees, where the really detailed work of law making is carried on—each request and comment he receives from the people he represents—before he answers, your representative must be sure he speaks in the voice of the people who depend upon him to protect their interests.

It is the duty and responsibility of your representative to know what his friends at home need and want. He must know what actions on the part of Congress will answer their problems. That's why it is no idle, empty comment to say that your representative is always ready and willing to talk over your ideas and your problems. That's the best way he can prepare hmself to do his job. He must know your situation—the difficulties you face—before he can possibly be in a position to act intelligently in your interest.

The farm programs under which you operate today were created by acts of Congress as an answer to the needs expressed by farmers all over the Nation. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, passed by Congress in 1933, provides the structure of your own program, developed by farmers, administered by your farm neighbors in each county.

In the days leading up to 1933, agriculture was dragging bottom along with all other industries. But agriculture had dragged longer. After the First World War, farmers had found themselves out on a limb—way out—with no means of getting back. They had been forced to expand their production to meet the needs of war, milking their soil of its precious fertility. When the war was over, our peacetime markets could not absorb the expanded farm production, and agricultural prices slid rapidly down the scale. Other industries were still enjoying the false glitter of boom days, while farmers were struggling along with 10-cent corn, 17-cent butter, and milk selling at 70 cents a hundred. Most of you remember too well how you and your neighbors tried expanding your production more and more in an attempt to squeeze out a bare living from the land, already dangerously worn. It wouldn't work. That was proven only too plainly by the increasing number of foreclosures in every county. Farm after farm was lost until farmers were practically wiped off the list of customers for industry. Agriculture was a rotten spot in our national economy, and that spot played its part in bringing about the decay of the whole structure. As a result, our economy came tumbling down around our ears in 1929.

As we struggled to bring order out of tangled ruins it became evident that agriculture must be given a firm footing before we could begin to build back. The "farm problem" was discussed more intelligently everywhere—on the farm, on Main Street, and in Washington. Something had to be done to protect the farm income—to build back the land—and, at the same time, to protect the price to consumers of the milk and bread and meat and eggs that every family must buy. Everywhere people talked about the need for a national farm program to help solve the tragic problems we faced.

These discussions were first crystallized into the Agricultural Adjustment Act, providing the means for farmers to work together through their own elected committees and form their own program. The fight was started. Gradually we began to make headway in the battle to save the soil—in the struggle to protect farm prices and bring farm income to a level that compared favorably with other industries.

Other measures followed in succession. The Farm Security Administration and Farm Credit Administration were created to give farmers a basis for sound credit in their business operations. The Federal Crop Insurance Corporation was authorized by Congress to give an added protection to farm income by providing insurance against crop losses from the unavoidable hazards of farming. Added strength was given to the farm-forestry programs. The Rural Electrification Administration was authorized in an attempt to raise the standard of living on farms by providing cheap electricity to rural areas.

All these programs were authorized to fill expressed needs, and they have gone a long way toward accomplishing their purpose. Agriculture had started to build a new and stronger foundation by 1941. Through the structure of the agricultural-adjustment program farmers were producing more nearly in line with the demands of their markets, both in quantity and variety of products. The ever-normal granary was a further aid in balancing production by providing for the storage of farm products in years of abundance for use in years of poor crops. Commodity loans and purchase programs were holding a steadier floor under prices.

Then came December 7, 1941, and we were at war again. Almost over night farmers were again called upon to produce for the unnatural needs of a nation at war. But this time they were not working in the dark. Through the committee-system of their farm program, all the farmers of the Nation could move almost as one man. With production goals, worked out by farmers themselves in line with the needs, agriculture did a miraculous war job. With less machinery—not enough fertilizer—crippling loss of manpower—with not enough of anything—farmers increased their production by more than one-third over what it was before the war. And they were producing what we needed to win.

The United States Government asked for increased farm production with the guaranty of a price support program to protect the farmer against loss of income if his market should rapidly shrink. With this guaranty behind him, the farmer was willing to go all-out again when the Nation was in trouble. He remembered what happened to him last time—he remembered very well indeed. But he believed in the power of his own farm program to keep him out of trouble this time. The Government had agreed to support the prices of major farm products at a level of not less than 90 percent of parity during the war and for a period of 2 years after the formal declaration of the war's ending.

That declaration has not yet been made, and the price support program is still functioning. Even today, Michigan potato farmers are depending upon the protection of price supports to prevent a disastrous loss of income. With production of potatoes running unusually high all over the Nation, market prices have been forced down to the floor. Without a price support program, almost every farmer who raises potatoes would take a loss when he markets his crop. But, in line with its promise, the United States Government through the Department of Agriculture is buying potatoes right here in Michigan at the announced level of price supports. These Government purchases are diverted into channels whereby the best possible use will be made from the crop. And the farmer still gets his price of $2 a hundred pounds.

It is such programs as these I have mentioned that helped to bring agriculture out of the depths of the depression of the last decade. With slight modifications to fit changing needs, they helped farmers to produce for war in record-breaking quantities. And I believe the basic structures of these programs are sound enough to work for farmers again in the uncharted days ahead. Of course, there will have to be changes as our economy changes. That's obvious. But our farm programs were flexible enough to change rapidly from emergency measures used to fight depression in the days of dwindling markets and rock-bottom prices, to emergency measures that encouraged all-out production during war days. Why, then, will not these same programs be flexible enough to meet the needs today and in the immediate future? I believe they can if they are given the chance.

Your farm programs were provided by the Congress of the United States, and their existence depends upon Congress. Each year your congressional representatives review the progress of each program and appropriate the funds thought necessary to carry on the work for another year. At any time that same Congress could sign the death warrant of any part of the national farm program by failing to appropriate the necessary funds for its operation. That has been done before and it can be done again. All that would be necessary is for enough of your representatives to believe that the interests of the country could best be served by saving the money spent on farm programs.

That idea must be watched carefully unless we find ourselves penny-wise and pound-foolish. I believe we are working for the long-time good of the Nation when we spend money intelligently to provide a farm program for farmers to operate themselves for their common good. That's much better than staggering amounts of money appropriated at more or less regular intervals for relief. It costs much more to pull the Nation out of disastrous depression than it does to prevent the depression in the first place. And just as surely as the farmer loses his financial stability, the whole Nation is in trouble. Every Federal program that has dropped by the wayside has done so because Congress failed to provide money for its operation. And I believe it would be dangerous for that to happen to our more important farm programs at any time in the near future.

I believe that it is absolutely necessary to protect and strengthen certain definite features of the national program. It is up to your representatives—if they are to represent your interests, as well as the interests of consumers who buy farm products—it is up to your representatives to provide a means for the successful farmer to stay on the farm and maintain a decent standard of living. We're on the right track to find that means, but it is not yet an accomplished fact.

We're on the right track with the farmer triple-A committee structure as it operates today through the Field Service Branch of the Production and Marketing Administration. It will always be best for the farmers to work out their own programs with the assistance of the United States Department of Agriculture as offered by this program. Assistance should be offered, yes, but never compulsion. As long as the farmers in this State will work out a program applicable in their area, they will always have my cooperation and the cooperation of the Department of Agriculture in putting it into effect. We have the opportunity through these elected farmer committees to develop the action it takes to meet the changing needs in every farming community. But it is the joint responsibility of the United States Government and the farmers themselves to take full advantage of this opportunity.

We're on the right track with the beginning we've made with the Rural Electrification Administration. That effort must be strengthened so that every farm will have the same opportunity of townspeople to share the benefits and comforts provided by electricity. The Federal Government should bear its full share of responsibility in seeing that the farmer can operate more efficiently with electrical equipment—his family can have washing machines, electric refrigerators, lights, and other comforts that every American in cities and towns has come to expect.

The farmer's problems of distribution must be solved. * * * Problems raised by such obstacles as inadequate roads. Until farmer market roads become useful arteries through which farm products can flow to market, the first step in solving our food distribution problem has not been taken. Other methods of transportation—air transport, for instance—will in time play its part. It is our duty as your representative to do everything possible to smooth the way for better market transportation by any and all methods.

But as important as all these issues may be to farmers, they must take second place when we consider the question that comes first in all industries. The farmer, like other businessmen, wants above everything else the adequate protection of his income. Unless the farmer's business is financially stable, he has nothing to build upon. Unless we provide some means whereby the farmer himelf can protect that financial stability, we cannot expect the ambitious young manhood of Michigan to turn to agriculture as a life's work. No man willingly subjects his family to a life in which he can do nothing to protect their security. Other industries have progressed too far in offering more security than farming has ever done in the past. If agriculture is to strengthen itself with new blood for the future, protection of income must be the first consideration in our national farm program.

The current price-support program is provided by law of Congress only through the 2-year period following the formal declaration of the end of the war. This was done as a wartime measure to protect the farmer's income through the unsettled reconversion to peacetime operations. But I believe Congress must watch the picture closely. I am not sure the 2-year period will be long enough to offer full protection in this time of rapid changes. If we still need a price-support program at the expiration of the present provision, then I will be the first to fight for it. We must not be too hasty in throwing away the programs that are doing a constructive job for agriculture and for the Nation as a whole. And the price-support program, protecting the farmer's income at market time, is doing a constructive job.

But there would be a gap in that protection without the Federal crop-insurance program. From planting to harvest time, the farmer's source of income is at the mercy of every whim of the weather, of attack by insects and plant disease. Through no fault of his own, he can lose his whole crop. All the price supports in the world can't do the farmer a bit of good unless he has a crop to market. That's why I believe in supporting the insurance program and expanding it as rapidly as possible to include all major crops. At the present time, with only wheat, cotton, and flax as regular insurable crops throughout the Nation, we are not yet providing adequate protection for the farm income. But Congress has provided the means for expanding the coverage to other crops through the trial program. Corn and tobacco will complete their third and last year as trial crops during 1947. If the experience gained during this experimental period proves successful enough to warrant their addition, these two commodities can be added as insurable crops on a national basis. Already extensive investigation has been made to add potatoes as a trial crop in the future, and we hope that others can be insured more and more rapidly as the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation has had time to gain more actual experience.

All-risk crop insurance is a comparatively new undertaking, and it will take time to work out a successful program all down the line. But I believe it can and will be done. I believe a successful crop-insurance program is a necessary part of the national farm program.

Upon such ideas as these, I have worked actively for farm legislation during the years I have been in Congress. And it is upon these ideas I would continue to work, because I believe I am speaking for the farmers I represent. But, also, I would want to keep in close touch with such farm leaders as you farmer committeemen who have also been elected to represent your people. Together we should be able to make the true voice of our Michigan farmer heard in every piece of legislation that affects him. Through your frequent contacts with every farmer in every county, you form an invaluable means of tapping the source of farm thinking. By sharing your knowledge with me, we could do a real job of representing our people. We could make more headway toward our common goal of fair and stable farm prices, full protection for the farm income, and a higher standard of living on every Michigan farm.

The Shipping Outlook

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Journal of Commerce of July 29, 1946:

THE SHIPPING OUTLOOK

(By Stanley Ferguson)

THE OFFENSIVE FROM THE LEFT

For some months the Maritime Commission, the War Shipping Administration, and the shipping industry generally have been subjected to an unremitting series of attacks from the leftist press. The attacks have appeared in different publications, under different names and at different times, but with premises, errors of fact, and phraseology so strikingly similar as to suggest a common source if not rewrites of a common hand-out. In the well-worn terminology of the CIO's maritime committee they charge that the industry and the two agencies have pulled a $21,000,000,000 swindle on the public.

Fortunately, the attack from the left has largely tripped on its own feet. Its premises were too weak, its facts too few, and its errors too patent to support the charges it has so shrilly raised. After all, even the beaten yes men of a contemporary police state would find it hard to reconcile the immense achievements of our war-shipping program with the argument that its entire cost was squandered—particularly when it is considered that the larger part of those billions went into wages, no mean proportion of which were siphoned off through dues, assessments, and the like into the treasuries of the unions which are sponsoring these attacks.

However, it is a fact that the truth seldom catches up with the original lie, and it is certainly to the interest of the shipping community to counter two of the principal charges most persistently raised by writers working from CIO material: (1) that WSA paid more for the vessels it requisitioned than they were worth and (2) that WSA endeavored to the greatest extent possible to charter ships rather than take them for title because the charters provided more revenue for the shipowners. Both of these charges are wholly false.

THE VALUATION OF REQUISITIONED SHIPS

If any general statement can be applied to the Government's policy toward compensating owners of requisitioned and chartered ships during the war, it is simply that the rate of compensation actually paid was lower than that paid to other classes of property holders.

The special rate given shipowners was the result of a provision of the 1936 Merchant Marine Act prohibiting any enhancement in the value of requisitioned ships as a result of the causes necessitating the taking. WSA and the Comptroller General had a difference of opinion in 1942–43 as to the exact causes necessitating the taking—whether they were the outbreak of war in Europe, the declaration of a limited national emergency, or President Roosevelt's subsequent declaration of an unlimited national emergency—but this was finally ironed out.

Actually, it would be difficult to find any branch of the Federal Government which showed greater caution in making payments for requisitioned property than WSA itself. As soon as it became evident that WSA differed with the Comptroller in its interpretation of the enhancement clause, the agency promptly stopped all payments and did not resume them until three eminent jurists, headed by Judge Learned Hand, had been called in by President Roosevelt to interpret the enhancement clause. When WSA resumed payments on requisitions and charters, it computed its rates of compensation on the basis of the rulings handed down by this special board.

That this basis of compensation was lower than that available to other classes of property holders under the "just compensation" clause of the Constitution was demonstrated by the success achieved by several shipowners who, dissatisfied by the rate offered by WSA, resorted to the courts. Court awards ran 20 to 25 percent higher than the WSA rate. Small wonder the writers on the left have found it convenient to ignore them in their attacks on United States Shipping.

REQUISITIONS FOR TITLE OR USE?

The heavily labored accusation that WSA requisitioned ships for use rather than title when possible because of the greater return to shipowners under charter was ably refuted by War Shipping Administrator Granville Conway in a letter to the Senate Commerce Committee last week, but a few of Captain Conway's points deserve special attention because of the widespread confusion on this particular issue.

In requisitioning the use—that is, under charter—of some 8,000,000 tons of merchant shipping early in the war program, WSA was following a policy which virtually every other Allied maritime power had previously found to be prudent. It did not wish to commit itself to the expenditure of $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 additional without knowing how long the vessels would be needed or when it would be possible to return them to private control.

WSA's attackers have fallaciously assumed that because $4 per ton per month was paid on the average for charter of these vessels, that the total cost of chartering was far greater than the total outlay required to take the ships for title. This would have been true enough if the cost of the vessel's title was all that was involved, but it was not. Whether WSA bought up or chartered the ships, they had to be run, and to run them cost money. What it actually cost was about $2.75 per ton per month, thus the net charter rate is reduced to $1.25 and not $4. This is the only true basis of comparison.

A second consideration—ignored by the opposition—was that of the tax liability of steamship companies as to gains from the sale or charter of ships to the Government. Where title was requisitioned, profits were taxable only as capital gains, at a rate of 25 percent. Where charter hire was paid, the revenue was taxable as income at rates running as high as 80 and 90 percent.

Any sober analysis of the situation—whether limited to representative ships in a group or to the whole program—will demonstrate clearly that WSA's policy of requisitioning for use rather than title was one of prudence and common sense; it produced far less net profits for shipowners than would have the policy now being espoused so noisily on the left.

PROSPERITY IS COMPARATIVE

Virtually every one of the current crop of leftist attacks on the shipping industry have rested on a comparison between the original cost or the depreciated book value of a number of old ships and their earnings on a particular lucrative voyage—such as those to the Red Sea in 1941—or sale price to the Government.

This basis of comparison is wholly meaningless when applied to shipping. It ignores the cost of shore establishments and operations, the losses incurred by the line in laying up the vessel or running it in ballast in depression years, and what in many cases turned out to be the extensive costs of reconditioning the vessel. Little attention is given to the fact that the vessel itself is merely an instrument with which a steamship line performs a service. One might as well suggest that the writing opponents of the national shipping policy be paid for their articles on the basis of the depreciated value of their typewriters.

Shipping, after all, is an industry that traditionally prospers and suffers in cycles and its earnings must be weighed with that in mind. After a long period of adversity, it is now riding a wave of comparative prosperity. But if past experience is any guide, it will need all the resources it has on hand if its present solvency is to be maintained.

Unfinished Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I bring to the attention of my colleagues the splendid editorial which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of July 20, concerning the action taken by the Senate on the so-called equal-rights amendment. Although the possibility of further action by the House on the resolution pending before that body is precluded by the Senate vote, nevertheless the equal-rights amendment must sooner or later be passed as a simple act of justice. The Federal suffrage amendment suffered defeat in its initial test, but through continued courage and persistence of the women of America that amendment is now a part of our National Constitution. The equal-rights amendment will also one day be written into the Constitution, for it will never be permitted to die.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Apparently many Senators do not feel bound by the platforms upon which they are elected to office. Apparently they see no inconsistency in subscribing to the United Nations Charter, which reaffirms "faith in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women," then rejecting that equality in the United States of America. Yesterday afternoon, after desultory debate, the Senate voted 38 to 35 against the resolution which would have given the 48 States an opportunity to pass upon the equal-rights amendment. That amendment reads: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." The resolution had been favorably reported by the Judiciary Committees of both Houses of Congress. It had the support of the President, of at least 30 governors of States and of both great political parties.

Opponents argued, as seemed politic, that they upheld the principle of equal rights for women. But they feared lest special legislative protection given women in industry be upset. That old argument falls flat now. During the war, when most such special legislation was suspended, women proved that they can do very well indeed without discriminatory protection. And, as Senator RADCLIFFE pointed out, women would gain more by establishment of equal legal rights than they could lose in special privileges.

A vote was forced, proponents say, at an unfavorable time. The Senate, it seems, was just too tired to see beyond the status quo. That vote doubtless precludes further consideration at this session. However, the measure has come before every Congress for 23 years, ever since the nineteenth amendment established the principle of equality of citizenship but failed to implement it. The Senators need have no doubt that it will be brought up again as a measure of simple justice that is not to be denied.

Our Privilege and Duty To Vote Election Day, November 5, 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in this wonderful country of ours citizenship is a serious responsibility. If a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people is to be maintained, our citizens must be alert about taking part in elections.

The results of the primaries throughout the entire Nation show an alarming negligence on the part of hundreds of thousands of American citizens in their failure to go to the polls and vote. In neglecting to vote they fail to take advantage of a great privilege—the privilege of helping to select the type of representatives who they feel would best protect their interests and benefit the country as a whole.

The importance of the November 5 election cannot be too strongly emphasized. Every citizen who has reached the age of 21 should vote.

I appeal to the people of the First Congressional District of Iowa to come out and vote for governor and other State officials, United States Representative in Congress, State senators, members of the State legislature, and county officers, so that our State, district, and counties will have the right type of representation in public office.

No American citizen should neglect the privilege and let others do the voting. The character of our Government is largely what the voters make it. Every voter is part of the Government and we should protect and cherish our right to participate in its elections.

A policy of indifference can no more win the peace than it could have won the war. Ask any returned serviceman the value of each person contributing his share and doing his own part in an outlined program of action. The parents, wives, and sweethearts of veterans will remember that our servicemen fought for the freedoms we enjoy, and I hope that they will impress upon their friends and neighbors that the perpetuation of our democracy depends upon a wide-awake and vigilant electorate.

Every American citizen should take advantage of the opportunity to exercise our franchise. If we do this we will express our will by voting for the candidates who we think will represent us best.

It is our patriotic duty to vote at the general election, November 5, 1946.

Public Library Demonstration Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, during the course of hearings before the subcommittee of the House Education Committee on H. R. 5742, the Public Library Demonstration bill by Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois, some revealing testimony was disclosed, especially about my own State of Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania has an unenviable record, when it is shown that 35 percent of the population is without library service. This means that 3,451,555 residents of the State have no access to books from libraries. In Massachusetts library service extends to the remotest corners, and not one individual is left without the service. Massachusetts has the best record of any State.

There is approximately one-half book for every person in Pennsylvania, while in New Hampshire there are 3.58 books per person. Pennsylvania expends 26 cents per person per year for library service, as against Massachusetts's $1.02. The national average is 41 cents, so you see Pennsylvania is below the average for the Nation.

The American Library Association states:

> New Jersey has county-wide library service in more than half of its counties, besides many good city libraries. In densely settled Pennsylvania, however, there are 16 cities between 10,000 and 40,000 population without public-library service.

Apparently the government of Pennsylvania has been negligent in its duty toward this side of educating the people of the State. Pennsylvania has had a Republican administration for many, many years, with the single exception of 4 years, and the responsibility for this condition rests squarely upon the Republican Party of the State. What are they going to do about it? This does not mean necessarily that libraries need be built in every remote area, but most States with a better record than Pennsylvania have what they term "bookmobiles." Ohio is a good example, spending 78 cents per person per year for books, and with only 67,245 of the people of that State left without the service of libraries.

Survey for a Proposed Mississippi River Parkway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have, for a considerable time, been interested in the creation of a national parkway system along the Mississippi River. I made a statement before the Committee on the Public Lands in favor of H. R. 6609, which would authorize a preliminary survey to be made to determine if such a project would be justified.

Since that time I have made further investigation and have found that fine highways already exist along both banks of the Mississippi from its mouth to its source, and that little additional construction would be necessary.

I feel very strongly that such a parkway would be a great asset to the people residing adjacent to the Mississippi, and that there would be special benefits to the residents of Quincy and Adams County, Ill., in my congressional district.

As part of my remarks, I include my statement before the committee and also an editorial appearing in the Quincy Herald-Whig of July 28, 1946:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD, and I represent the Fifteenth Congressional District of Illinois. One of the principal cities in my district is Quincy, in Adams County, which is located on the Mississippi River.

I appear here today in support of H. R. 6609, introduced by your chairman, which would authorize the survey of a proposed Mississippi River parkway for the purpose of determining its feasibility.

For a considerable number of years there has been a great deal of interest in the establishment of a national parkway system from the source of the Mississippi to its mouth. The plan envisions the creation of a recreational strip of land along the shores of the Mississippi from Canada to the Gulf, with a Federal highway from the summer vacation lands in the north to the winter playgrounds of the South.

The idea of a Mississippi scenic route was conceived over a quarter century ago. It was originated before World War I by Truman Pierson and a trail was laid out, backed by strong organization in all States along the river.

Later, in 1939, there was a great deal of interest in this project and 10 United States Senators simultaneously introduced bills for its creation. One of the original sponsors is now President of the United States and another is now President pro tempore of the Senate.

Interest was also expressed in a project of this character by the introduction of H. R. 170, by Congressman CANNON, of Missouri, now chairman of the Appropriations Committee. A hearing was held on his bill in 1945 at which time there was evidenced a great deal of interest by Members of Congress whose districts are adjacent to the Mississippi, by the governors of the States concerned, and other organizations whose primary interests lie in the Mississippi Valley region.

In my own State there has been a great deal of interest manifested in this Mississippi Parkway. A nonprofit organization has been incorporated, entitled "The Mississippi River Scenic Highway Association of Illinois." The president of the association is Mr. Edward P. Allen, one of the most prominent citizens of Quincy, and the secretary is Mr. Thomas M. Beatty, also of Quincy, and one of the veteran road boosters of my State. The directors are from widely separated points along the Mississippi, including Moline, Nauvoo, Hardin, Alton, Cairo, and Quincy. This organization is an expanding and enthusiastic group, actively backing this movement.

After becoming familiar with the purposes of this association, I introduced last March, H. R. 5732, which would have authorized the necessary steps to undertake the National Mississippi River Parkway.

It hardly seems necessary for me to go into detail as to the advantages of developing a parkway along the Mississippi, with its many natural resources, geographical advantages, and historic associations. With the Mississippi running, as it does, through the heart of our country—touching 10 States with a population over 31,000,000 people, and with approximately 6,000,000 registered passenger automobiles—a scenic highway paralleling its banks would serve as a recreational grounds which would be unsurpassed in its accessibility to a great number of our citizens.

I do not need to dwell upon the many lakes adjacent to the upper Mississippi Valley or the attractiveness of the scenic beauty and climate in the delta region.

Since I am from Illinois I simply want to call attention to the fact that we, also, have many interesting and attractive places of rare beauty and of historical interest along the Mississippi. All I need to call your attention to is the well-known Palisade zone north of Moline, famous old Nauvoo, the Mormon city, the famous Pilot Knob at Galena, old Kaskaskia, the Illinois Ozarks, and Horseshoe Lake—to name just a few.

For a project which will so profoundly affect the welfare and well-being of so many of our people, especially in this area, the cost will be relatively very small. The great majority of the existing highways would be utilized and it is contemplated that very little additional acreage would be needed to complete this entire 2,000 miles of scenic highway—nothing like the acreage in the Great Smoky Mountain project and hardly a fraction of that used in the Yellowstone. The reason for this is that much of this acreage at present belongs to the various States in right-of-way along existing roads and in natural State parks which is available without additional acquisition Little more would be needed except to connect and utilize the best features of these facilities.

Since a project of this character would involve close cooperation between the Federal Government and the States concerned for the acquisition and conveyance to the United States Government of such areas and the many kindred problems including the method of administration in carrying out such a comprehensive plan to completion, it was thought best by the Secretary of the Interior that any specific legislative plan relating to the creation of a National Mississippi River Parkway should not be enacted until a survey of such project had been made by the National Park Service of the Interior Department and the Public Roads Administration of the Federal Werks Agency, as was done prior to the development of the Natchez Trace Parkway.

The Secretary of the Interior therefore recommended legislation for the purpose of making such a survey and a bill has now been introduced by Hon. J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in the form of H. R. 6609.

I am in hearty agreement that this is the proper manner in which to proceed and I therefore give my whole-hearted support to H. R. 6609 and urge this committee's speedy favorable action on it. Surely the 30,000,000 people residing in the Mississippi Valley, and the millions of others who would make use of this scenic and historic highway are entitled at least to have such a project surveyed, as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, so that sufficient data may be acquired to justify its ultimate construction.

I appreciate the opportunity of appearing before you and thank you for the attention you have given me.

[From the Quincy (Ill.) Herald-Whig of July 28, 1946]

ILLINOIS CITIZENS VIEW RARE NATURAL BEAUTIES ALONG MISSISSIPPI SHORES

Many residents of Illinois are surprised to find rare beauties in their own State. There are several magnificent State parks, the great Shawnee National Forest and the Illinois Ozarks in the southern part of the State, and the majestic bluffs along much of the Illinois section of the Mississippi River. Only in recent years have the people of the Middle West come to know their own scenic country. The fault lies with the State itself and the cities adjacent to these wonderlands.

Only a few years ago, the State of Illinois launched an elaborate system of State parks. The program is not complete, but those areas now fully developed rank with the finest in the United States. Still many persons know little of the recreational advantages offered by Illinois. There has been too little said about our own vacation spots and hundreds of thousands of Illinois residents have never visited such places as the beautiful Pere Marquette Park, which with an area of 5,000 acres is the State's largest, and the equally magnificent Starved Rock Park.

OUR BIGGEST ASSET

Visitors from the Plains States almost invariably marvel at the size of the Mississippi River, with its tall limestone bluffs. Many of us who live along its shores fail to appreciate its beauty and its recreational value.

The old river has had a bad press or, too often, none at all. Those who are in constant warfare with the river, a battle in which Quincy, situated high on the bluffs, has had little participation, often forget the tangible value of the stream. Without it and its 100,000 tributaries, the Middle West would be a barren desert. Because of it and the water it carries, we have one of the world's most verdant valleys.

TO OPEN THE DOOR

Soon the long period of the Mississippi's isolation may end. There is pending in Congress legislation to develop a parkway along the shores of the river from its source near the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico. The proposal calls for a national park 2,500 miles long, with a highway through the entire length and abundant recreational facilities within the narrow strip of park. There would be bathing beaches, picnic and camp spots, trails up the high bluffs and along the wooded shores, boating and fishing.

The program would open the river to the millions of residents in the States bordering the river and to other millions from distant States to whom the Mississippi River has been only a fabulous story.

Plans have advanced to the point that the House Public Lands Committee has approved funds for a survey of the proposed parkway. In furthering the park program, there has been formed in Illinois a group known as the Mississippi River Scenic Highway Association. This body of representative citizens from the 19 Illinois counties along the Mississippi is actively supporting the parkway plan. It met last week at Pere Marquette State Park along the shores of the Illinois River, near the junction of the Illinois with the Mississippi.

No more beautiful spot could have been chosen for the meeting. To those present, Marquette Park was an example of the wonders that will be opened all along the river by the parkway.

RIVER IS KEYNOTE

There are points of beauty in Illinois, but the greatest number of scenic wonders and historic spots are located along the mighty Mississippi. The men who gathered at Marquette Park understand the advantages offered by developing the natural attractions of the river. They have united in an attempt to make available to others the pleasures they enjoy.

The proposed parkway would open up the Nation's biggest vacation area easily accessible to great numbers of people. Its scenic advantages are sufficient to warrant the project, but there also are many spots of historic interest. There are scores of places that stir memories of the past. These are not confined to Illinois, but this article is discussing only this section of the river. Galena, early boom city and scene of lead mining, is worth a visit. Down the river are the Mississippi Palisades, towering peaks cut out by thousands of years of erosion, and historic Rock Island where a war prison was located during the War Between the States, now the home of a United States arsenal.

Perhaps the most interesting point of all is Nauvoo, founded by the Mormons in 1839, which, within 4 years, became the largest and most powerful city in the State, with almost complete city independence. Nauvoo had its own army and its own courts. A few miles away, in Carthage jail, the Mormon prophet and his brother, Joseph and Hyrum Smith, were assassinated and secretly buried in Nauvoo. Then came the Mormon war and Brigham Young led his flock westward. Many of the old Mormon buildings still stand. They would form an important part of the parkway plan.

From Nauvoo to Hamilton, and the great hydroelectric dam at the scene of the Des Moines rapids, is one of the most picturesque drives in the Middle West. Quincy has its own points of scenic interest in the remarkable bluffs, Indian mounds, and Quincy Bay. These bluffs continue through much of Pike and Calhoun Counties and on to Alton.

Alton has its own parkway plan already under way. This project would follow the river from Alton north to Grafton under some of the most interesting cliffs along the entire river. These natural wonders are now viewed only from boats on the river. The parkway, which probably would become a part of the Federal system, would make them accessible to all. The Alton development is backed by Alton citizens under the leadership of Mayor Harold Wadlow and Paul B. Cousley and is to be known as the McAdams Parkway, in memory of Mr. Cousley's former associate as publisher of the Alton Telegraph.

Farther down the river are Cahokia, Kakaskia, and Fort Chartres, birthplaces of civilization in Illinois. The Mississippi brought Joliet and Marquette and the early French settlers to the Illinois country. Along its shores pioneer history was made.

Cold-Blooded Murder

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I include Eleanor Roosevelt's column, My Day, published in the Washington Daily News, Monday, July 29, 1946, and titled "This Cold-Blooded Murder Holds Us Up to Ridicule":

HYDE PARK, Sunday.—In our family we have always said there are two kinds of anger. One kind you have to fight and conquer, since it shows weakness. The other kind is righteous indignation, which can be indulged in with a clear conscience.

For the last few days, when I've not been sad, I've been seething with righteous indignation. Ever since I read of the horrible murder of two Negro couples in Monroe, Ga., by a group of white men, I have been indignant that any people could make me feel so ashamed.

My grandmother came from Georgia. I have always had an understanding of the problems facing southern white people on interracial questions. But cold-blood murder of two men and their wives holds our Nation up before the world to ridicule and shame. The murderers, I am sure, call themselves Christians and good citizens of a democracy. How can we talk about democracy when groups such as this mock the principle on which it is founded?

You can have no real democracy when the people in your midst, whatever their race or color or creed, and whatever their crime may be, cannot be sure of a fair trial and even-handed justice. No one wants sentimental kindness, but all men under whatever government they live want freedom and justice. There is no freedom when one group of individuals can strike fear into the hearts of other individuals and use violence against them.

I hope neither the Federal nor the State authorities will rest until these men who besmirched the honor of our Nation and of our democracy have been brought to trial. I do not want them killed, because you cannot bring back the dead by adding to their number. But I want these men held up to ridicule in their own environment as men who do not understand how to uphold democracy or live in a democratic community. I want them obliged to make what restitution is possible to those who live and whose loved ones have been killed, and I want them placed where they must be harmless.

People who can think that such actions are right are dangerous in any community and, since they cannot control themselves, they should be permanently restrained by their Government.

America Must Understand the World Problems We Face

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to include under my extension of remarks an address delivered by Mr. Frank E. Gannett before the Kiwanis Club of Jamestown, N. Y., on Thursday, July 11, 1946. The picture he paints of foreign conditions is well worth the perusal and careful study of every person in the United States:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your generous introduction. Even though I may have my misgivings about meriting all that you say, I am nonetheless grateful.

I am glad to come here today and address this very influential group because I believe it is most important that the American people take a greater interest in Europe and know about conditions over there.

It is my opinion that what happens in Europe in the next 1, 2, or 3 years, may determine whether we shall have another war, which scientists tell us might be the end of civilization.

As your chairman has said, I had the privilege of taking a wonderful trip and making an extensive and intensive study of conditions over there. I visited Paris, all the leading cities in the American zone in Germany, visited Austria and Trieste, which has been a perplexing problem, and then flew to Rome. Flying from Rome to London in a little more than 4 hours, I spent 3 days in that great city.

Soon after I arrived in Europe I realized how little I knew about the situation over there. I read many newspapers and magazines and should be well informed, but I found that I was quite ignorant of the critical situation that prevails there.

I wish all of you and all the leaders of the country could have seen what I saw and heard while on this long journey. You would be aroused as I have been over the dangerous possibilities that now prevail. I am not an alarmist and surely not a war monger, but I do feel that we should know the truth. Only by learning the facts can we find any solution to any problem.

Perhaps our newspapers haven't given enough emphasis to news from middle Europe. We have so many domestic matters—OPA, strikes, tie-ups, and domestic questions, that we have forgotten Europe. And yet, these domestic questions are trivial in comparison with the great problems that may decide the fate of the world.

I want to say this to the great credit of our military leaders in Europe. None of them wants war. They have been through it, seen the horrors of it, and they are against war. The general impression is that military men desire war, that it is their profession and that is how they advance and gain promotion. But none of them today wants any more war, and if they have their way about it, there will be no more war. These men are careful that they say nothing in any of their remarks that might help bring on a war.

The first great impression that we received was the scarcity of food. The seriousness of this situation has not been exaggerated. It is a trifle better than it was, but it is still critical. I shall try to show you that it plays a most important part in all our problems in Europe.

You don't see people falling dead from starvation in Europe, but you do see pinched faces and many evidences of the lack of nutrition. Children are puny and pale. Official statistics show that tuberculosis has been increasing at a rapid rate, as have all the other diseases that result from malnutrition. Infant mortality is most alarming. In some districts it has risen to 300 out of every 1,000, which means that only 3 out of every 10 babies survive. Think of that.

This is due to the lack of adequate food for the mothers, especially milk and also, of course, milk for the children. Because they haven't adequate food, the people over there show lack of energy. They seem to be in a daze as they wonder about. Production in all lines has been falling because the men haven't sufficient food to supply strength for work.

There isn't any question that for lack of food, millions will die. The critical shortage of food will last at least until the harvest in 1947. Until these unfortunate people have enough to eat, we shall find it difficult, if not impossible, to solve many problems that may affect the whole world.

To understand the situation in Germany and Austria, I must go back to the beginning. By the terms of the Potsdam agreement, these two countries were to be divided into three zones. France then came into the picture, and it was decided to divide these two countries into four zones.

The eastern part of Germany, the richest and largest food-producing section, was given to the Russians. The northwestern section, with the exception of the port of Bremen, and a small section around Bremen, went to the British. The French were given the southwestern section with its coal and control of the Rhine.

The American zone is the southern central section. It contains 20,000,000 Germans. The farm lands are poor, and can't produce more than half enough food for the population. In this section there was before the war much light manufacturing which gave thousands employment. That is now gone.

The American zone, however, has the most beautiful scenery. Unfortunately no one can live on scenery.

Before the war, Germany had a population of 60,000,000, almost half as large a population as the United States. Regardless of the fact that the Germans provoked the Prussian war, the First World War, and the war that ended a year ago, and deserve the most severe condemnation, the fact remains that they were a great people and have made a large contribution to mankind. German scientists have been outstanding in making important discoveries. The Germans boasted on their culture. They also are inventive and skillful in all lines of production.

We just can't eliminate these people from consideration. We can't entirely forget them as some have tried to do since the war ended. They present a staggering problem.

I will say that in Germany you see only older people, or very young; the middle-aged are gone. About 8,000,000 Germans were killed, or wounded on the battlefields, and I don't know how many millions still are in prison camps, particularly in Russia.

Most of the middle-aged class, of course, are the youths reared under Hitler. They are trained, dangerous Nazis—Nazis through and through. They still believe in Hitler and what they fought for. I talked to a great many Germans over there, with interpreters and without interpreters, but none of them would admit their war guilt and would never admit defeat. They were unsuccessful as in the First World War. With ruins all about them, with all the suffering and all the evidence of their defeat, they still say they were unsuccessful.

If any nation was ever defeated, it is Germany.

The first article of the Potsdam agreement provided that Germany should be so treated that she would never again be able to wage war. We can all approve that policy. To make it impossible for her to carry on another war, she has been stripped of all heavy industry. Our airmen destroyed nearly all the war production plants in that country. What machinery was left has been taken out of the country, mostly by the Russians. It will be a long, long time before war production of any consequence can be restored in Germany. We need not worry about that or about Germany fighting us again.

The Potsdam agreement also provided that the standard of living in Germany should not be higher than in the other countries of Europe. That appears to be certain.

There are many other provisions in the agreement which keep the German people down to a bare existence. As a matter of fact, we have gone too far in that direction, and that is one of the reasons that our problem has become so difficult.

I yield to no one in the belief that the Nazis deserved the severest punishment. Hitler and his gang upset the whole world, caused the death of millions and every country on the globe has suffered from the effects of the war.

I saw abundant proof of the atrocities that the Nazis perpetrated. I visited Dachau concentration camp and learned all about its horrors. The fiendish brutality that the Nazis carried on against helpless people is the most outrageous in all history.

The Nazis exterminated over 6,000,000 Jews, not for committing any offense, but simply because they were Jews. Young and old alike were victims of the Hitler fanatics. Today in Europe there are only 1,200,000 Jews living.

Another great problem is caring for the millions of people displaced by the war. These poor people lost their homes, all their belongings except what they could carry on their backs and saw members of their family tortured and killed. Those who finally reached refuge behind the American lines were for a long time suffering so much from the horrors they had experienced that they would cling together in little groups for protection.

Our military governments have repatriated hundreds of thousands, yes, millions, of these unfortunate folks, but there still remain a vast number without homes or country.

A high percentage of the Jews still remaining in the American zone of Germany and Austria want to go to Palestine so they may have a homeland of their own. So they may begin life anew with safety.

Having seen all this devilish work of Hitler and his gangsters I waste no pity on them. Now, however, is not the time merely for vengeance, but the time to consider our own best interests and the future of America.

Winston Churchill, who did more than any other one man to defeat Hitler, recently said, "Our task now is not to hold Germany down, but to hold her up."

The greatest mistake ever made was the division of Germany into four zones, because the border lines of these zones afford many obstacles. If a person in the American zone undertakes to manufacture a small automobile, he has to go to the British zone to get his steel; to get magnetos he goes to the French zone; to get his tool-making machinery, he must go to the Russian zone. All of this makes it impossible to carry on any manufacturing in any of the zones.

The Russian border is carefully guarded, and it is difficult for the other zones to do any business with the Russians.

As a result of this zoning arrangement, the 20,000,000 Germans in the American zone will find it impossible to revive the manufacture of consumer goods. Most of these plants were destroyed. There is no capital to rebuild them, no money to buy raw materials, and, therefore, no chance for much production. This means there will be vast unemployment in the American zone. Thus the Germans will have no way to buy food or get enough to eat, for the land in this zone cannot produce, as I said before, more than half the food needed.

At first we had a ration of 1,500 calories daily for the Germans in our zone. This was reduced to 1,250 and recently has been cut to 1,180 calories. I had as a luncheon the food allowed the Germans for a whole day. In other words, my luncheon was 1,180 calories. I found it not enough to satisfy me. The situation is made worse by the utter lack of such foods as milk, eggs, and butter, which are known as "protective" foods.

The question arises, then, what are we going to do with these 20,000,000 Germans in our zone? Are we going to feed them indefinitely at a cost of perhaps $2,000,000,000 a year, or what is to happen to them?

Until Germany is made an economic and political unit, there seems to be no possibility that she will get on her feet and become self-sustaining.

I should interject that the Germans in the Russian zone are getting adequate food. We haven't definite information about anything behind the iron curtain, but it is reported the Germans there get around 2,000 calories a day. Russia as a whole has plenty of food for its people.

One of our objects in Germany has been to return the government to the Germans and develop democracy. How long will the German people, if they do not get enough to eat, favor a democracy? If under communism they are able to ward off starvation, they will, of course, turn to communism and lose interest in any government that does not give them sufficient food.

You can't sell democracy to a man who is hungry.

From the beginning our military commanders in Europe have protested against this zoning of Germany. They have said it would not work, and that unless Germany is unified there will be disaster. At first France opposed unification because she wanted to be sure that her eastern frontier was protected against any more attacks. Now, however, it is believed that France will join with Britain and America in a proposal to end the zoning, but Russia now will not consent to a change in the Potsdam agreement. Russia undoubtedly intends to hold fast to that part of Germany in her zone, and she sees no reason for giving it up.

This, however, is only one of the problems that confront us. Everywhere in Europe the Soviets have been extending their influence. It is generally recognized that their ambition is to dominate the entire European Continent. If we fail to solve the situation in Germany, or pull out of Germany, the door will be left open for communism to advance to the shores of the Atlantic. The recent election in France afforded some encouragement, but France is not yet safe from ultimate domination by the Communists. If Franco is driven from power in Spain, that country too will likely come under the control of the Communists. I hold no brief for Franco but the fight against him is being inspired by Moscow.

The situation throughout Europe as a result is tense. The Russian border is carefully guarded by military forces. As a result almost daily there are incidents that might easily cause an explosion.

Trieste, the important seaport in the northeastern section of Italy on the Adriatic, has been a point of gravest concern. Ninety percent of the population of the city is Italian. East of Trieste lies Yugoslavia. That country is now dominated by Tito, a stooge for Stalin.

Stalin wanted Trieste, for it would be a valuable port for Russia. Through Trieste commerce would flow into Yugoslavia, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, the Danube Valley, and even to Warsaw.

Russian officers have been training the Yugoslavs. They have at least 150,000 men in uniform, some say 200,000; others put the number still higher. Tito has 1,000 airplanes, mostly made in America.

All along the Yugoslav-Italian border there have been serious incidents. The feeling between these two peoples is very high.

Stalin insists that the Big Four Conference give Trieste to Yugoslavia and for a time it seemed possible that this situation might lead to open warfare. Only a few days ago, however, the Paris Conference accepted a compromise plan whereby Trieste is unfairly taken from Italy and made a separate state under international control. This is a victory for Stalin. This compromise for the time being may lessen the tension, but history has proved again and again that such a compromise of a dispute will only promote more friction and become a breeding place for war.

Only a few days ago Stalin seized the rich resources of eastern Austria. He did this without even advising the United States, Britain, and France until he had carried out his plans. Everywhere he defiantly proceeds to carry out his plan for extending Russian influence.

Today the Soviets have four million and a half men in the Army and another million in other military service. They are building up a greater and greater war-making machine. Stalin has announced that as his policy. Britain and the United States, however, have demobilized our armies and are basing our policies on the hope for world peace.

Although the situation in Germany is the cause of great concern, we have recently reduced our forces there from 450,000 men to 300,000 men. Most of these are young, inexperienced soldiers. We certainly are not in a position to resist by force any move that Stalin may make in Europe.

I have been asked many times how long must we keep an army in Germany. In my opinion we must keep a good-sized force in Germany at least until a new generation comes to maturity. We should stay over there for 15, 20, or 25 years, but will the American people support such a program for so long a time? How long will we be willing to feed the hungry 20,000,000 in the American zone, and we are doomed to have this burden of feeding them unless the terms of the Potsdam agreement are changed.

How soon will some demagog arise in Congress and demand that we bring the boys home and forget Europe as we did after the First World War, to our sorrow and great loss, the tragic Second World War.

The American people must be aroused to the need of facing this great question. I say we must finish the job our brave boys did over there. We must see it through.

Our officers in Europe have tried in every possible way to cooperate with the Soviets. On trivial matters, the Russians now and then will yield, but on important matters, they are adamant and concede nothing. The many deadlocks in the Conference of Foreign Ministers at Paris, the deadlocks that have occurred in the United Nations Security Council, illustrate the policy that Stalin intends to pursue.

The basic trouble is the clash of ideologies between the Russians and other people. The Soviets believe that the state should be all-powerful; that the state should control the lives of everyone. The Soviets believe that the capitalistic system is the cause of all our wars, and that the only way to end war is to have communism dominate all the world.

Of course, this is ridiculous. Wars have been caused by dictators. If the people of the world had their way, there would be no war. But only in a democracy or a republic like ours do the people rule.

We, contrary to the Communists, believe in the dignity of man, the supremacy of the individual. We believe that the people should dominate government and that freedom and liberty are sacred rights.

The capitalistic system, which the Soviets condemn, has in the last 150 years made more progress in every field of activity than was made in all the countless preceding centuries. It has given to America the highest standard of living in all the world. No one who has seen the pitiful conditions in Europe would fail to appreciate what we have here in this country.

It is the dream of countless millions to live some day under the American flag, with freedoms, privileges, and blessings enjoyed nowhere else on this globe.

There are many other features of particular interest in my trip that I can only mention because of lack of time. It was a great experience, of course, to see the devastation of Europe. No pictures can give you adequately any idea of what was done over there in the way of destruction. I can't describe it. You would have to see it to realize its extent. It is just unbelievable.

Berlin, for a 2½-mile radius in the center of the city, is nothing but ruins. The city is 90-percent destroyed. There are streets without a living person in sight, rubble everywhere. And Berlin is not the worst damaged of all cities in Germany. Several others had worse treatment than Berlin. Everywhere it is ruin, ruin, ruin. Just three German cities escaped destruction to some extent, and the destruction in others ranges from 65 to 99 percent.

Germany is back to the bicycle age. They have no cars, no horses. The women, treated generally by the Germans as animals of burden, lug or carry everything by hand or on their backs.

It was an experience, of course, to see where Hitler died with his Eva, in the underground office and apartment, called a bunker, near the Reich Chancellery. It makes a deep impression on anyone to see how fast Hitler fell from his high hopes for world domination when America got her full strength in the field.

To go into the house where Hitler lived in Berlin, in great luxury and ostentation; to go into his office in the Reich Chancellery, now bare and ruined, where he sat before the fireplace and plotted great military affairs, that too was an experience.

The Nuremberg trials are of great importance—a book could be written about them. There I saw Goering in his faded gray field uniform. I could almost spit on him. I wanted to but I was afraid of the guards. There I saw, also, of course, the other 21 arch criminals, including Von Ribbentrop, Hess, and Doenitz.

I had dinner and lunch with Justice Jackson and an interview with the judges. All deplore the length of the trial, but they want to be sure that the defendants have their full day in court. They will, I believe, all be convicted, and executed.

You here in his home city will be glad to know that Justice Robert H. Jackson made a fine impression on us. He is doing a great job. He has been working hard and long hours. He appeared tired. He would much rather be home than in Nuremberg, but he regards this trial as marking the dawn of a new day in the world.

When one person kills another he is guilty of murder. When two persons kill someone both are guilty of murder. If several gangsters organize and commit murder all are guilty. But heretofore if a lot of gangsters got control of government and waged a war, killing millions, these gangsters, hiding behind the state, went free.

If Justice Jackson succeeds in his effort to punish the Nazi gangsters, then in the future, leaders in government will hesitate before starting a war.

The trial has seemed to drag along because there is so much documentary evidence in the case. When the Allies came into Berlin so fast and so unexpectedly, they seized carloads of records. These will convict the accused Nazis. The trial may not end until September.

Hitler's hideout on the side of a mountain near Berchtesgaden is another great story. In 1938 Hitler began to build this place of refuge and 3,000 men worked on it for 3 years. An underground tunnel connected his house and Goering's and Bormann's and the soldiers' barracks. There were 66 steps down to the tunnel. I counted them. That showed that he was really a coward with no courage to face it. He thought he would build this hideout which no one would be able to penetrate. But some British airmen, one night, in a few minutes destroyed the houses of Hitler, Goering, and Bormann. Hitler, unfortunately, wasn't there.

I got a great kick out of an inscription on the place, written by some GI who had been there: "Hitler doesn't live here any more." That is American humor for you. You should see some of the inscriptions on the walls inside the living room. A great many visitors there paid their respects to Hitler. Most of them are unprintable.

A visit to Rome is always an experience. I went again through old Rome, the greatest city in the world 2,000 years ago. I was, by my walk through the ruins, reminded that the Roman Empire began to fall when price ceilings were put in effect. Under Emperor Diocletian there was a great drought. Wheat became very scarce. Its price soared. So the dictator fixed a price for wheat. It was so low that farmers refused to grow wheat. Thus the supply further diminished. Farmers left their farms and went in to Rome. Finally the government had to provide entertainment, circuses. Soon the government had to take care of everybody and Rome fell.

My visit to the Vatican City and an interview with His Holiness was another thrilling experience. I have never seen anyone so much like a saint as he. He is frail and his voice is soft and low, but he is undoubtedly one of the most powerful men on earth. He was most cordial, affable, charming, and democratic. He speaks English well. He made a great impression on all of us.

Then we came back to England and had 2 hours with Prime Minister Clement Attlee in the rear of No. 10 Downing Street. He talked to us frankly in a democratic way. He gave us an idea of what was going on in the minds of the Labor Government. National organization of all industries with Government control is their aim. But so far the program is not producing any good results.

In Britain I found many in high places who feared that communism might sweep across Europe, many who thought it now was too late to stop its onward rush.

Thus you can see it was a wonderful trip—most profitable and enlightening. Naturally it made a tremendous impression on me.

In conclusion, let me say emphatically that the American people certainly don't want another war. They have no desire to fight the Russians, but if communism does sweep over Europe, we in America will surely be in danger.

There are just two hopes for us. One is that Russia may change its present policies, abandon its idea that world-wide communism is the only road to peace, and decide to cooperate with us. Whatever may happen in Europe, we certainly don't want communism here, and yet there is evidence every day of intrigue, of underground Communist activities, undermining this country and its form of government so that we too may be forced ultimately to take communism.

We must do everything we can as we are doing to get along with Russia, but we can't do it by the policies we have been following of yielding and yielding and yielding to almost every demand in every situation that has arisen.

The other hope is that within Russia the people may become dissatisfied with communism, the very low standard of living that now prevails there, the preparation for further war that is now going on, and revolt. The thousands of Russian soldiers who came in contact with our men learned much and as a result are becoming dissatisfied with their lot and are restive.

Stalin and his staff see the danger of an uprising and are constantly moving the Russian divisions about to prevent them from ganging up against the Government. Our trouble is not the Russian people, but again, it is a dictator, a one-man government, that is just as threatening to us as were Hitler and Mussolini. Until totalitarian government is ended, we shall not be safe.

A man who knows conditions in Russia and has the best information about the Soviet leaders says there are three schools of thought. One, led by the militarists, believes that now is the time for Russia to strike for world domination. They say America and Britain are war weary, demobilized, deep in debt, and don't want any more war. Russia has a great army and its totalitarian Government can force the Russian people to fight on to win any objective.

The second group, said to include Stalin and Molotov, believes in building up still stronger military forces which later can dominate Europe, the United States, and South America—all the world.

The third group feels that Russia now has all the territory that she can handle and that she should develop what she has instead of carrying on aggression. That group seems to be in a small minority.

Whatever may be Russia's plan, America should be aware of the great dangers in the present situation. We have a challenge as great as the war that we won. We must be awake and alert. We must meet our responsibilities. We must assume leadership if we are to escape another war. I will not admit that war is inevitable. It must not be. But we must face and help solve these great problems if civilization is to be saved.

I came back from Europe greatly depressed by my experience, by the ruins everywhere, by the famine, starvation, suffering, misery, and despair that prevail, and especially discouraged by the lack of hope of any immediate solution of the problems that we face.

I came back home thanking God that I am an American. There is such a contrast over there with what we have here. We simply don't realize what it means to be an American or what it is to have the blessings that we enjoy. These liberties and privileges we have must be preserved, whatever the cost may be. They are worth fighting for. We must keep this "The land of the free and the home of the brave."

Future Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER E. BREHM

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, when news flashed around the world that Japan had finally surrendered, peace-loving people everywhere joined us in offering a prayer of thanksgiving to Him who had at last delivered us from the evil intentions of our enemies.

Not only did all loyal Americans offer a prayer, but they vowed that never again would the world be encompassed by war.

The Congress of the United States had determined that America would do her full part in working for permanent peace. Never again would America—justly or unjustly—be accused of refusing to do her full share in an effort to outlaw future war.

In accordance with this determination and noble objective, the Congress voted full participation and active cooperation in the United Nations organization. We voted full participation in the Bretton Woods monetary agreement. We pledged active participation in the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Organization. More recently, we have offered control of the atomic bomb to a world organization in an effort to show good faith on our part to keep the peace.

Participation in these organizations has cost the American taxpayers billions of dollars and the end is not yet in sight. However, no one will begrudge this money nor the extra tax burden which it has and will continue to impose upon them providing we are successful in our objective. The cost will be small compared to the cost of again waging total war wherein the finest youth of our Nation are sacrificed.

I am not a pessimist and I intend to continue to support any and all measures which in my opinion might even remotely help preserve the peace of the world. However, when I study Bloch's history of the past and realize the gigantic task which confronts us, I frankly confess that I am filled with misgivings. Not only does past history portray the tremendous task which faces us, but the apparent unwillingness of certain nations so far to cooperate with our good intentions is most discouraging.

Bloch records that from the year 1496 B. C. to the year 1861 A. D. there were but 227 years of peace.

The time elapsing between these two dates is 3,357 years, which means that we had 13 years of war for each 1 year of peace.

Since 1861, or the past 85 years, there has been no year in which a war was not being waged in some part of the world.

When we contemplate this historical fact and realize that today in this year 1946 the peoples of the world are just emerging from the most destructive of all wars, it causes me to wonder whether we should continue to boast of our so-called modern civilization and our super-intelligence.

Further contemplation naturally brings to mind the problems facing us now and in the future if we expect to succeed in the fulfillment of our hopes and desires in bringing to a torn and shattered world the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

Only 227 years of peace on all the earth at one and the same time, compared with 3,205 years of war. It exceeds the imagination to contemplate the mental, spiritual, and physical advancement possible for the human race had those three-thousand-odd years been spent in construction instead of destruction.

I firmly believe that, if only for self-preservation, we, as a Nation, must assume an active leadership in any peace organization.

I further believe that any enduring peace proposal which is based on a purely economic standard of living is doomed to failure. Unless we incorporate moral and spiritual standards in conjunction with our economic planning, distrust is inevitable. With distrust comes lack of faith, and with faith lost the entire scheme will collapse. And, finally, if America is to assume active leadership both spiritually and economically throughout the world, we must become and remain both spiritually and economically strong.

I have unbounded faith in the American people to assume this world leadership if they are given the truth. Freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and freedom from governmental controls and regimentation hold the answer to all our social, religious, and economic problems.

Class hatreds and persecution of minority groups can never be removed by legislative action. You cannot legislate brotherly love in the hearts of men. This can only be done by an intense desire in the hearts of men for peace and good will, and unless the nations of the earth soon come to realize this fact, the prospects for permanent and enduring world peace will most certainly grow dim.

Letter of Mrs. Bessie L. Miller, of Greensburg, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I wish to include a letter from a Mrs. Bessie L. Miller, of Greensburg, Pa. On July 16 I inserted in the RECORD a telegram from a tenant of Mrs. Miller. The letter which follows refers to the contents of that telegram.

JULY 19, 1946.

Congressman KELLEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to an article in the Greensburg Morning Review, dated July 17, 1946, I am writing you to give you an understanding of the supposedly national issue of the landlord which has been entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. By certain distortions of the truth, it seems that the landlord is wholly at fault. However, this is not the case.

The said tenant, Harry Rohrbacher, has made improvements to the extent of minor painting and papering, but these repairs have been to his personal likes and dislikes rather than to the betterment of the said property.

The discontinued use of the laundry service was brought about by the misuse of my daughter's electrical equipment, which is irreplaceable, when the understanding at the time the apartment was rented, was that the tenant was to furnish his own equipment.

A little of the past history: The home was remodeled before the war to make 2 three-room apartments as my daughter's husband was going to enter the service, and they had only one child. At the present time, there are two children and my daughter's husband has returned. This necessarily requires more living space. With this reason in mind and also faced with the problem of furniture storage brought about by less room space, it is now necessary for my daughter to eliminate the storage problem. She is being forced to move her furniture. The course I took, that is the increase of the rent to a point I felt equitable with similar apartments from $25 to $50 per month, was used more or less as an inducement for the tenants to find other living quarters.

Over a period of the past 6 months, it has been brought to the attention of the tenants that they should find other living quarters due to my daughter's necessity of expanding her living quarters. This was done verbally at that time. However, 60 days ago, written notice was given, but there has been no effort made on the part of the tenant, Harry Rohrbacher, to find another place to live. This also brought about the rent increase.

I know that you, Congressman KELLEY, have a personal interest in the landlord as well as the tenant, and also in the trials of ex-servicemen getting along. The foregoing statements were expressed to give a clearer picture of the landlord's position. The action was not taken to create any hardship for the tenant, but rather to relieve a poor living arrangement for my daughter.

I am hoping this letter will create a correction in the minds of so many who have been influenced by the published article concerning a raise in rent.

Very truly yours,
Mrs. BESSIE L. MILLER.

GREENSBURG, PA.

The Road Back—A Soviet Yugoslavia?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, July 27, the majority floor leader, Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, gave a fine exposition to this House of the present tyranny existing in Yugoslavia. His speech indicates the extent to which the administration has been moved by examination of the facts about a situation for which, it must be admitted, the policies of the United States Government during the past 3 years have been, in very large part, responsible.

One can only hope that it is not too late to retrieve some measure of respect and friendship among the oppressed people of Yugoslavia for our country by, as Mr. MCCORMACK puts it, "firm governmental policies executed by our State Department to aid the persecuted Yugoslavs, prevent terrorism within her boundaries, refuse to deal with tyranny, to the end that there may yet be peace."

Such a firm policy by our State Department might well have been displayed only a few weeks ago, prior to the so-called trial of General Draja Mihailovich, whose guilt and liquidation were determined in advance and officially announced as settled by the government of the Communist dictator of Yugoslavia, Moscow-trained Marshal Josip Broz, alias Tito.

The Members of the House and the American public in general are still unaware of the full facts concerning the present regime in this very strategic area of southeastern Europe. For that reason, and to supplement Mr. MCCORMACK's statements, I ask consent to insert in the RECORD an article by Mr. Eric L. Pridonoff, which appeared in the Los Angeles Examiner on June 9, 1946. Mr. Pridonoff has had exceptional opportunities for determining the facts as he was for 13 months economic attaché at our Embassy in Belgrade, and has fluent, idiomatic command of Slavic dialects. His contact, both with officials of the Tito regime and ordinary citizens—peasants and villagers and townspeople—give his reports a validity not obtainable from less-qualified sources.

Concern for our interests in Yugoslavia, and for the pledges given by our Government more than 5 years ago to the now murdered General Mihailovich is not just now being shown in the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. My constituents may recall that on June 25, 1945, over 13 months ago, I pointed out the dangers inherent in the Communist-composed cabinet of Marshal Tito, and the fact that this clique under the domination of the Soviet Politburo in the Kremlin would "extend the borders of Red Russia to the Italian frontier and the Adriatic Sea." That has now been accomplished, though it might have been prevented during any of the months between June 1945 and the date of Mr. MCCORMACK's indictment.

TITO ONLY PUPPET FOR SOVIET, SAYS EX-UNITED STATES ATTACHÉ—RUSSIAN MILITARY MISSION BOSSES YUGOSLAV CHIEF

(This is the first of a series of articles presenting an authoritative first-hand picture of conditions behind Europe's Soviet-created "iron curtain." The writer is Eric L. Pridonoff, of Los Angeles, who has just returned to America after 13 months as a special economic attaché in the United States Embassy at Belgrade, Yugoslavia. Pridonoff had a rare opportunity to view personally Soviet Russia's operations in the Balkans. Belgian-born but American-educated and naturalized, Pridonoff was recruited by the State Department as a special embassy officer in Yugoslavia because of his intimate knowledge of Russian and other Slavic languages. Having completed his mission, he has resigned to return to his career as a mechanical engineer in California. Free of diplomatic restrictions, he has written these articles to inform his countrymen of his observations behind the "iron curtain.")

(By Eric L. Pridonoff, former special economic attaché in the United States Embassy at Belgrade)

Marshal Tito is not the real dictator of Yugoslavia.

He is a puppet.

His own political commissars rate him no higher than sixth in the civil government of Yugoslavia.

Over that civil government is a supercrust of Soviet Russian domination that wields the power of life and death, of judicial, legislative, and executive prerogatives rolled into one—and ruthlessly exercised.

The most powerful single individual in Yugoslavia today is Major General Kisilev, head of the Russian military mission to Yugoslavia, a shrewd politician and clever diplomat of the Soviet brand.

He, alone, directly or through members of his staff, can—and does—give orders to Yugoslavia's civil government heads. The voice may be that of Tito, but the hand at the helm of the Yugoslav state is the hand of Moscow, manipulated through the person of Major General Kisilev.

RED ARMY CHIEF NO. 1 MAN

In Yugoslavia's own official family, the real No. 1 man is Gen. Alexander Rankovitch, minister of interior, general secretary of the Yugoslav Communist Party.

Under his direct control is the dreaded OZNA, secret police organization, all-Communist in membership and as brutally powerful as Hitler's Gestapo or Soviet Russia's NKVD.

Controlled by the OZNA and to some extent officered by its members is the KNOJ, Yugoslav counterpart of Hitler's SS stormtroopers. There are 14 divisions of the KNOJ corps, a total of 150,000 men.

Though Tito holds the title of premier, Rankovitch is actually the key man in the civil government.

Next in actual power behind the camouflaged facade of Yugoslavia's Government come four other Communist masterminds who compose the tunes that Tito plays:

Moisha Piada, member of Parliament and Russian-trained Communist who has authored many of the brutal "people's laws" of Yugoslavia.

Gen. Milovan Djilas, minister without portfolio, a ruthless Montenegrin Communist.

Edward Kardelj, another Russian-trained Communist who serves jointly as first vice premier and president of the "control commission" of Yugoslavia.

Sretan Zujovic, minister of finance and veteran Communist.

NO PERSONAL LIBERTY IN NATION

Then comes Tito himself, premier, minister of national defense, the bemedaled puppet of Moscow and his own Yugoslav Communist peers.

There is no personal liberty in Yugoslavia today, although an agreement signed by Tito and Dr. Ivan Subashich, setting up a provisional government, was supposed to guarantee personal freedom—freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of assembly; freedom of religion; and respect for private property.

Today, those pledges are a hollow mockery in Yugoslavia.

Yet misled Americans are pouring over half a billion dollars in UNRRA supplies into Yugoslavia.

They should know that Tito has been using these supplies in whatever way the Communists dictate.

Americans should know that, while thousands were starving, Tito held up entrance of UNRRA supplies until two demands were met:

1. Appointment of Maj. Gen. M. A. Sergeichik, of the Soviet Russian Army, as UNRRA director in Yugoslavia. This general was former quartermaster of the Red Army in Iran.

2. Delivery of all supplies to Tito-controlled ports, to be handled from there exclusively by Yugoslav authorities, under Major General Sergeichik, as they saw fit.

UNITED STATES OFFICIALS DENIED PERMITS

Americans should know that after Sergeichik took over, American and British UNRRA officials were unable to get permits to travel to areas for which vast quantities of machinery, foodstuffs, and other goods had been requisitioned. Thus they were not permitted to make check-ups on the uses to which the UNRRA supplies were put.

Several technical experts, including a British mining expert, Mr. Jeffers, resigned from UNRRA because they would not blindly rubber stamp approval of requests from Tito's ministry of supply.

Americans, who furnished 80 percent of UNRRA funds, should know that only requests for shipments first approved by the Russian, Major General Sergeichik, went forward to London, Washington, or the other allied powers.

Tito used UNRRA goods for barter in Albania and other neighboring countries to further Yugoslavian-Communist political aims.

Yugoslav recipients of UNRRA goods—outside of a few large cities—never knew that American, rather than Tito generosity, fed, clothed, and housed them and gave them machinery to rehabilitate their war-torn country.

The first 1946 UNRRA report from Yugoslavia, submitted to UNRRA's former director, Herbert Lehman, was edited by a British woman, known to be pro-Communist, in language easily recognized as the jargon of Reds the world over.

Clothing, so generously donated in America and intended for free distribution to the needy in war-ridden countries, was sold at high prices to needy Yugoslavs by the Tito authorities.

There was a daily delegation at our American Embassy in Belgrade of Yugoslav purchasers of such clothing who came to protest about the high prices charged for such goods.

BLACK-MARKET PRICES CHARGED

Drugs, such as penicillin, sulfa, and insulin, sent by UNRRA to relieve human suffering, were brazenly sold by Tito's army doctors at black-market prices.

When people began to come to the Embassy seeking these drugs I found many instances where 10,000 dinars, equal to three months' pay of the average Yugoslav wage earner, had been charged by Tito's doctors to treat a single venereal case.

Often these applicants were plain soldiers, who didn't rate treatment reserved for the Communist elite or for those wealthy enough to pay the black market prices.

Every ranking Allied officer who resigned from Yugoslavia's UNRRA in disgust has been replaced by an expert from the Soviet Union.

I know these things are true. I have documented many of these cases and these statements are made from a background of many investigations in each category.

Reports of abuses in the UNRRA distribution in Yugoslavia were forwarded to the State Department in Washingon, but up to the time I left Belgrade the misuse of UNRRA supplies was continuing.

Molotov's Error Can Be Byrnes' Opportunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Edgar Ansel Mowrer:

Mr. Molotov's brutally frank exposition of Soviet plans for Germany offers the western democracies an opening.

They can start afresh with Germany and France.

Admittedly, a unified Germany under four-power, cooperative control as foreseen in the Potsdam agreement is the ideal solution of the German problem. But it had two implications: First, that there should be cooperation and trust between the Big Four; second, that there should be no unilateral annexation of German territories by anyone.

When the Soviet Union first insisted on dominating eastern Europe and then on annexing part and dominating the rest of Germany, it destroyed the basis of four-power cooperation. For if the Soviets with Poland are to annex German industry in the east, the western democracies owe it to themselves to internationalize German industry (the Ruhr) in the west. Since German unity is an obstacle to this, German unity should be dropped.

A divided Germany is far preferable to a Soviet-dominated Germany. Mr. Molotov's statement made it perfectly clear that Russia hopes to keep Germany (minus the Soviet amputations) united in order first to milk and later to dominate it. The best way to counter this is to divide Germany.

By such an arrangement, the democracies would have by far the better part. They would control most of the population and most of the industry. The present population figures, zone by zone, are roughly as follows:

United States zone, including part of Berlin, 16,400,000 people.

British zone, including part of Berlin, 22,000,000 people.

French zone, including part of Berlin, 6,500,000 people.

Soviet zone, including part of Berlin, 19,500,000 people.

Even if partition meant abandoning a couple of million more Berliners to Russia, the final figures would be: Democracies, 42,900,000; Soviets, 21,500,000.

It seems obvious that one-third of the Germans, even militarized and communized by Russia, could never become a threat to western democracies controlling twice as many Germans.

Therefore, Mr. Byrnes should follow up Mr. Molotov's statement of Russian aims by merging the three western zones and organizing the combined area federally.

If Russia does not like this, it will have to modify its views about annexing part of Germany and ultimately dominating and sovietizing the rest. Neither the United States nor Britain has ever formally consented to such annexations. If Moscow goes ahead regardless and takes German territory either for itself or for Poland the Western Powers are free to do what they wish with western Germany regardless.

Molotov's rash statement not only gave London and Washington a chance to get out of a bad commitment regarding Germany; it gave them an unequalled chance of winning back France.

Ever since the war, the French have been the victims of the illusion that since the Western Powers lacked the guts to stand up against Soviet imperialism, France could avoid trouble and feather its own nest more warmly by remaining strictly neutral between the Soviets and the Anglo-Saxons.

But France is not naturally a neutral state. The French are the natural leaders of western Europe. Western Europe inherently chooses "Atlantic civilization" with Britain and America. French neutrality has not only condemned France to frustration—it has condemned all of western Europe to impotence.

French neutrality was founded on the belief that France would obtain decent consideration from the Soviets as compensation for repudiating plans for a western bloc. The French were confident that the Soviet Union would prevent the rivival of a united and formidable Germany.

The Molotov declaration was a warning to the French that the Soviets had in mind ultimately building up Germany as a Soviet ally. It was also a snub. For with French policy concentrated on weakening Germany by detaching the Ruhr, Molotov's insistence on German unity—less Soviet amputations—was tantamount to telling the French that, between their friendship and that of the beaten Germans, the Soviets chose the latter.

Here is an unexpected opportunity for Mr. Truman and Mr. Byrnes to revise the unprofitable anti-French policy of the Roosevelt-Churchill era. Here finally is the chance to reunite western Europe as a necessary counter weight to an eastern Europe forcibly united by Soviet arms. Now is the moment to start shaping a world closer to American and British hearts' desire.

When Molotov opened his mouth about Germany he put his foot into it. Molotov's mistake can be Byrnes' opportunity.

Redemption and Retirement of Capital Stock of Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include a statement in regard to a bill to authorize the redemption and retirement of the capital stock of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and for other purposes which I have introduced today.

This bill would authorize the Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to retire the capital stock of the Corporation out of the assessments paid by insured banks after July 1, 1946, the Board to determine under what conditions and when the retirement should be made. No retirement could be made if the effect thereof would be to reduce the net worth of the Corporation below $1,000,000,000. This would enable the Corporation to return the $289,000,000 invested in, and representing, its original capital, and make possible a further reduction of the public debt. After the capital stock has all been retired, the Corporation would be self-sustaining and would be a mutual deposit-insurance fund financed solely by the insured banks, but would continue to be administered, as at present, by a board of directors appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The bill also proposes to increase the compensation paid to the two appointive members of the Board from $10,000 to $15,000, which is the salary paid to the members of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System as well as to the Comptroller of the Currency, who is ex officio the third member of the Corporation's Board of Directors.

The Corporation's power to issue its obligations would be retained at its present level, notwithstanding the fact that some or all of its capital stock is retired.

Wagner-Ellender-Taft Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I took the floor earlier in the day to present to the House the telegraphic appeal of Governor Walter E. Edge, of New Jersey, for action on the Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill.

Since receipt of the Governor's wire the mail has brought me a further endorsement of this needed legislation from Mr. William T. Vanderlipp, acting commissioner of the department of economic development, State of New Jersey, Trenton, N. J.

The letter follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT,
Trenton, N. J., July 25, 1946.

Hon. GORDON CANFIELD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CANFIELD: The acute shortage of homes for veterans and others in New Jersey demands the passage immediately of some legislation to help alleviate the situation. The hearings on the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill—S. 1592—now being conducted before the House Banking and Currency Committee in Washington, D. C., should be continued without cessation so that this important piece of legislation, being the best that has been devised to date, can be voted out of committee and placed before the whole body to decide its fate before Congress adjourns I am heartily in favor of legislation which will help the suffering people of New Jersey to obtain more and better housing as soon as possible.

Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM T. VANDERLIPP,
Acting Commissioner.

Mr. Speaker, as Commissioner Vanderlipp stresses, the shortage of homes for veterans is acute and we have it in our hands to legislate before adjournment. I cannot help but feel that if the House leadership is insistent the job can and will be done.

Inviting Contempt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include an editorial on the Un-American Activities Committee which appeared in the Washington Post on Thursday, July 4.

I have expressed myself again and again as being unalterably opposed to the continuance of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. This editorial in the Washington Post, one of the great newspapers in America, expresses a point of view that is being widely supported from one end of the country to the other by church groups, educational groups, women's organizations, labor organizations, and outstanding Americans.

To serve democracy truly we must be eternally vigilant and we must not hesitate to turn the searching eye of truth upon ourselves.

INVITING CONTEMPT

It now seems clear that Americans persecuted by a congressional committee cannot look to Congress for relief. They must turn, then, to the courts. This is what Mr. Corliss Lamont of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, cited for contempt of Congress at the instance of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, has decided to do. "It is the aim of the council," he said, "in its reasoned opposition to the Wood-Rankin committee, to establish once and for all the right of Americans under our Constitution to work freely for American-Soviet understanding and friendship." This is a basic right meriting respect alike by those who dislike the purpose for which it is exercised and by those in sympathy, and Mr. Lamont is altogether accurate in referring to it as a "test case important to all individuals and organizations active in the field of education and public relation."

What the Wood-Rankin committee has attempted with respect to the Council of American-Soviet Friendship, as it did with respect to the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, is to harass the organization out of existence. To this end, the committee has indulged in what seems to us an arbitrary and outrageous abuse of its subpena power. It has made a sweeping and wholly unnecessary demand that the council produce in Washington all its books and records—which would leave it, of course, unable to function. If the committee has any basis for belief that the council is engaged in un-American activities—and no evidence whatever has yet been presented in support of such a thesis—it can undertake investigation on a selective basis. A court must now determine if the demand made upon the council was a reasonable exercise of the subpena power.

Defiance of a congressional committee is, of course, a very serious matter not lightly to be countenanced by Congress or the courts. There is no doubt that Mr. Lamont, like Dr. Edward Barsky of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, has been technically at least, contemptuous of congressional authority. But when congressional authority is used, as the committee is here seeking to use it, to hamstring an organization instead of merely investigating it, contempt is invited. The House as a whole has now twice confirmed the invitation by voting to cite Barsky and Lamont for contempt. The disposition of members to support a committee of their own creation is quite understandable; but they would have done a great deal more, we think, to enhance the respect for Congress which they seek to enforce if they had curbed a committee abusing the authority exercised in their name. They can hold the respect of Americans only as they respect American rights.

Atomic Energy Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. CLASON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, as one of the conferees on the historic atomic energy control bill, I was pleased to read the attached editorial from the Springfield, Mass., Union, of Saturday, July 27, 1946.

I am sure that the other members of the conference, both from the Senate and the House, as well as our colleagues, will appreciate the words of commendation in this editorial:

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL

It would be encouraging to discover that every conference session of Senate and House Members on controversial legislation ended in such a logical compromise as the one that handled the bill to create machinery for the control of atomic energy. The control involved naturally is not designed for international use, but to guide our own policy on atomic energy in respect to whatever treaties are made for international control.

One of the best features of the conference agreement is that which guarantees an all-civilian commission of five members. The Senate favored such a commission, the House recorded its support for a commission on which at least one military member would sit, with a maximum of two allowable. Atomic energy is explosive politically as well as physically, and the presence of a military commissioner on the board well might lead to foreign suspicion as to the designs of the control agency.

Offsetting this defeat, the House won its point that the Director of the Division of Military Application should be a member of the military, an unquestionably reasonable provision. Further opportunity for the Army and the Navy to make their influence felt in atomic control is provided in the establishment of a military liaison committee to work with the control commission.

There may be some resentment, in military circles, against the exclusion of a service representative or representatives on the commission. Some Army leaders believe that full control of the atom should be vested in the military, but that idea implicitly emphasizes only the destructive side of atomic energy. A commission completely free of official Army or Navy representation is far more desirable, far less suspect in the eyes of the world.

The conferees should be congratulated on a good job well done. They have left little ground for argument against the proposed form of control. They are able to present to their respective legislative bodies a commendable bill that apparently has an excellent chance of passing—and passing before this sesson ends.

Justice for the Baltic States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PEHR G. HOLMES
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following petition of the Lithuanian-American Council:

JUSTICE FOR THE BALTIC STATES

AN URGENT APPEAL TO THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Within a few days, on the 29th of July 1946, representatives of 21 governments will meet in Paris to discuss the peace treaties for certain Axis satellite nations. In view of this, the Lithuanian American Council wishes to call to the attention of the Government of the United States of America the following:

The neutral nations of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia live, and have been living for quite a long time, under conditions of much greater hardship than those which the war has imposed upon the Axis nations of Rumania, Hungary, and Bulgaria. The three Baltic States are occupied by the army and police forces of Soviet Russia, and have to suffer the most cruel methods of oppression and terror employed by the occupying power, which endeavors to impose upon them an economic and social order that is abhorrent to the desires and traditions of their populations.

In addition to that, these three Baltic nations are being subjected by the Soviet overlords and their hand-picked quislings to the ruthless practice of "social engineering," consisting of mass deportations of whole sections of their populations considered to be inimical to the Soviet regime, and of colonization of their lands by Russian and Mongolian elements brought in from diverse areas of the Soviet Union. In effect, these inhuman measures of the invaders amount to an attempt to destroy completely the three ancient nations residing on the shores of the Baltic Sea.

And yet, while the victorious powers are planning a peace conference for the former enemy countries in order to reopen for them the road to a peaceful existence and development, the fate of the above-mentioned Baltic nations is being entirely ignored.

The reports from Lithuania reaching this country indicate that this Baltic nation is in imminent danger of being wiped out by the Soviets. Here, for instance, is a story recently cabled to the American press from Stockholm, Sweden:

"Renewal of the systematic deportation of Lithuanians from their homeland to make room for the nation's resettlement by Russian families was described here today by a Lithuanian woman who escaped from the country and fled to southern Sweden. She said the Russians were also removing Jews. Following is her story:

" 'Rounding up of people for deportation to eastern Russia, somewhat diminished during the winter, began in earnest this spring. Among about 350 deportees from the Baltic states arriving weekly in Liepaja (Libau) concentration camp, well over one-third are Lithuanians. Libau concentration camp is one of many the Russians have established in Latvia, which they have made into a sort of distributing center for deportees. The population of these camps is slowly moved eastward by the NKVD (Russian secret police). * * * Now the NKVD performs more quietly the liquidation begun by the soldiers. * * *

" 'In Klaipeda (Memel) there is already a fairly large population of newly arrived Russians. These settlers open shops and trade in greater freedom than they would in Russia, as no Communist principles appear to be enforced on them by the Russian authorities.

" 'The increase in the Russian population is perceptible in Kaunas and Vilna. * * *

" 'Life in Lithuanian cities is difficult. Nothing is obtainable in the open market against ration coupons. The black market is the official market and it is run by Russian officials. * * *

" 'Once fertile, Lithuania is now a desert. This year there will be no flax or fertilizers available. It seems a deliberate policy of the Soviets to starve and ruin the country for, like deportation, starvation is a method of eliminating the native population so it can be replaced by Russians.' " (The Chicago Tribune, July 1, 1946.)

Other witnesses who were able to escape from the Baltic countries, have similar stories to tell. The situation evidently is quite well known among the informed circles in Europe, as the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Winston Churchill, made the following statement in his speech in the House of Commons on June 5, 1946:

"The populations of the Baltic states are no longer recognizable as those which existed before the war. They have suffered a double liquidation, both at German hands, and Russian hands." (Parliamentary Debates, vol. 423, No. 154.)

In view of these facts, can the Allied powers, which fought the war for the principles announced in the Atlantic Charter, remain passive and indifferent while the three Baltic nations are being wantonly annihilated?

The victorious powers are under obligation to look after the welfare even of their former enemies. In recognition of this responsibility, the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain are striving to supply food to the people of Italy and Germany and to revive their economy. Can it be that the victors have a lesser obligation toward the nations which did not aid their enemies?

Irrespective of what the present rulers of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia might say in justification of their acts, the Baltic nations are still, in law, sovereign and independent states. On July 23, 1940, shortly after the so-called elections to the People's Diets and a few days before the Russian-imposed quislings of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia petitioned for admission into the Soviet Union, the State Department issued the following statement:

"During these past few days the devious processes whereunder the political independence and territorial integrity of the three small Baltic republics—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—were to be deliberately annihilated by one of their more powerful neighbors, have been rapidly drawing to their conclusion.

"From the day when the peoples of these republics first gained their independence and democratic form of government, the people of the United States have watched their admirable progress in self-government with deep and sympathetic interest.

"The policy of this Government is universally known.

"The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities, no matter whether they are carried on by the use of force or by the threat of force.

"They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one state, however powerful, in the domestic concerns on any other sovereign state, however weak.

"These principles constitute the very foundations upon which the existing relationships between the twenty-one sovereign republics of the New World rests.

"The United States will continue to stand by these principles, because of the conviction of the American people that unless the doctrine in which these principles are inherent once again governs the relations between Nations, the rule of reason, of justice and of law—in other words, the basis of modern civilization itself—cannot be preserved." (The Department of State Bulletin, July 27, 1940, vol. III, No. 57, p. 48.)

During the intervening years and on many occasions, the Government of the United States reaffirmed its stand on the matter. We are proud that it continues to adhere to this fundamental policy with regard to small nations.

The United States, and many other governments as well, in the Western Hemisphere and in Europe, continue to recognize the diplomatic representatives and consular agents of the Baltic States. Thus, there is not the slightest doubt in regard to the legal side of the problem. The rights and privileges enjoyed by every sovereign nation which is not guilty of violating its international obligations or disturbing peace, cannot rightfully be denied any longer to Lithuania or her northern neighbors, Latvia and Estonia.

Their desperate plight under foreign occupation calls for immediate action on the part of the Great Powers which have taken upon themselves the responsibility for the future of Europe.

The Lithuanian American Council, therefore, urgently appeals to the Government of the United States to take proper steps to protect the populations of the Baltic countries from the cruelties and injustices they are suffering at the hands of the Soviet invaders. In particular, we request our Government to see to it that arbitrary arrests, deportations, and executions of the people of those lands be stopped; that civil liberties be restored to them; that the confiscated farms, business establishments, and other properties be returned to their owners. There is no excuse for murder, despoliation, and torture of innocent people.

By the pronouncements in the Atlantic Charter, the Common Declaration by the United Nations and the Yalta Agreement, the Great Powers promised to restore sovereign rights and self-government to those who have been forcibly deprived of them, and to let every nation choose its own form of government. There is no valid reason why the application of these principles should be still withheld from Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, more than a year after the cessation of hostilities in Europe and Asia.

The Lithuanian American Council requests the President of the United States of America and the Secretary of State to use the power and influence of their offices to effect the removal of obstacles which prevent the exercise of the functions of sovereignty of the Baltic States, to wit:

That the Soviet armies of occupation and its police force be withdrawn from their territories;

That the conditions be brought about in those countries that will allow hundreds of thousands of their deportees and refugees to return to their homes without danger to their lives and personal liberty;

That, finally, the people of Lithuania—as well as Latvia and Estonia—be given an opportunity to choose their governments by free and unfettered elections.

By addressing this urgent appeal to you, we seek only justice for the small and defenseless nations which by no fault of their own became tragic victims of the terrible war and the rivalry of greed between their more powerful neighbors. We fervently hope that the United States and its allies will spare no effort to redeem their pledge, solemnly given during the war, to create a lasting peace based on principles of freedom and equality for all nations, large and small.

Respectfully submitted by the Lithuanian American Council executive board:

LEONARD SIMUTIS,
President.
Dr. P. GRIGAITIS,
Secretary.
MIKAS VAIDYLA,
Treasurer.

Veterans' Housing Bogs Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, apparently we have too many fingers in the pie. We have too many agencies and too little work, and apparently a great lack of coordination and cooperation between the various Federal agencies and bureaus. These were designed to help the veterans, and calculated to furnish, as expeditiously as possible, housing for the veterans, who need homes.

At Tulsa, Okla., a deplorable situation exists, which I am inclined to believe is illustrative of what is going on throughout the Nation. For 4½ months a series of veterans' temporary housing facilities has been in process of reconstruction and adaptation for the use as veterans' living quarters. But the veterans' housing programs have bogged down, as is woefully illustrated by the resolution of Tulsa Post, No. 577, Veterans of Foreign Wars, adopted by that post at its meeting July 25, 1946:

Whereas the city of Tulsa made application for housing units for war veterans through the Federal Public Housing Authority, which application was granted on or about March 6, 1946, for 215 housing units, and a further application for 140 housing units was granted on or about June 9, 1946; and

Whereas a contract was let to W. R. Grimshaw Construction Co. to dismantle the first allotment of 215 housing units at Wichita, Kans., move and reconstruct the buildings in Tulsa, and the contract was negotiated without competitive bids, on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee, plus a percentage of the contractor's overhead agreement; and

Whereas materials commenced to arrive at the fairgrounds in Tulsa on about March 15, 1946, and have been in the process of erection since that time; and

Whereas Mayor Olney F. Flynn appointed a committee to accept applications and screen the said applications for occupancy of the veterans' emergency housing units, and approximately 550 applications were accepted for the initial allotment of housing units, and an order of preference was set up by this committee, composed of representatives of the Tulsa Chamber of Commerce, Red Cross, and major war veterans' organizations; and,

Whereas the committee selected out of the applications 197 married veterans with 237 children and 28 expectant mothers (plus veterans and their families of the Negro race for occupancy of those housing units assigned Negro veterans) for occupancy of the housing units at the Tulsa fairgrounds; and

Whereas on June 6, 1946, it was announced in the public press that the veterans' emergency housing project in Tulsa was to be delayed indefinitely because of lack of materials to complete same, and

Whereas on June 6, 1946, there was appointed by this post an emergency housing committee with instructions to do any and all things necessary within its power to cause an early completion of the veterans' emergency housing project in Tulsa and to work with other war veterans' organizations to this end; and

Whereas the emergency housing committee made an extensive investigation of the cause of the failure to complete the veterans' emergency housing project made numerous out-of-town trips to various places and interviewed many persons, and cooperated with other veterans' organizations to this end; and

Whereas the veterans' emergency housing committee found:

1. That unless the materials hereinbefore listed (set forth in the committee's report) are found and made available, the war veterans' emergency housing project will be delayed indefinitely.

2. That the contractor had been told by Government agencies that the required materials for the projects would be procured through Government channels as needed.

3. That there is no liaison between the various Government agencies, and particularly between the Federal Public Housing Authority, Civilian Production Administration, War Assets Administration, Surplus Property Office, Army and Navy personnel in charge of war plants, camps, and cantonments.

4. That the materials have not been made available to the contractor.

5. That where the Government agencies such as the Civilian Productions Administration have authorized and created local advisory committees recognized and established organizations of war veterans have not been consulted and do not have representation on such committees.

6. That materials suitable for use in veterans' housing projects, such as the one at Tulsa, have been disposed of by Army and Navy authorities: Therefore be it

Resolved by Post No. 577, Veterans of Foreign Wars, in regular meeting assembled at Tulsa, Okla., That:

1. That the findings of the veterans' emergency housing committee above set forth be made the findings of this post;

2. That a representative of the recognized and established organization of war veterans be added to the local committee working with the Civilian Production Administration;

3. That liaison be established between the agencies charged with administering the Federal public housing program to the end that the materials salvaged from various camps and defense plants and declared surplus be channeled to the veterans' emergency housing program.

4. That salvaged material that can be utilized in the veterans' emergency housing program be channeled to the contractors awarded contracts for the construction of such veterans' emergency housing earmarked only for such use.

5. That all new building materials stored in Government-owned or leased warehouses and all salvaged building materials from camps and defense plants be channeled to the veterans' housing program through recognized and established merchants for resale exclusively for the construction of veterans' homes.

6. That corrective steps be taken to counteract the lack of interest and passive attitude prevailing in the Government agencies charged with the administration of the Federal public housing program.

7. That the findings of the emergency housing committee of this post and this resolution be given the widest publicity possible and that copies of same be forwarded to all Senators and Representatives from the State of Oklahoma requesting their support and assistance in rectifying the conditions that prevail.

Adopted at Tulsa, Okla., this 25th day of July 1946.

GEORGE J. OVERMEYER,
Post Commander.
LAWRENCE BRENT,
Adjutant.

Mr. Speaker, the circumstances enumerated in the foregoing resolution are enough to cause the various Federal bureaus charged with the responsibility of providing homes for the veterans to hang their heads in shame. There is no excuse for such delays, and the disappointments which have resulted; nor for the failure to carry out the intent of the Congress. The situation is almost persuasive that there has not been an attempt in good faith to carry out the provisions of the laws enacted by Congress and designed to furnish relief for the veterans and their families so badly in need of housing facilities. It simply does not make sense to see building materials and supplies being used for other purposes, while these veterans' projects are delayed. If the veterans are to be housed, as Congress provided they should be, these bureaus should channel the materials to such projects. The veterans have a right to complain, and have their plight exposed to the public. It is the result of the bungling and mismanagement on the part of those clothed with constituted authority in the premises.

Congress Should Have Granted Veterans and Pioneers Assistance First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, while there is overwhelming sentiment in Congress and in the country for the Government reorganization bill, I personally did not like many of the details of it.

I felt that this was not the time to make an increase in the compensation of the Members of Congress as the $10,000 and the $2,500 official expense account is sufficient.

I would rather see an increase in pensions given to our worthy and needy pioneers and old people. Furthermore, we could wait for some time, as far as these congressional increases are concerned, until we get closer to a balanced budget.

Then, too, there are many needs for the veterans which must be provided.

It would have been better to wait until another later date to bring up the matter of congressional salary increases, even though most people believe Members of Congress are underpaid.

Relief for Small War Plants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a letter written by the Honorable HAROLD KNUTSON to the Honorable John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, today.

Some months ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 6022) to grant relief to small war plant corporations from an executive order requiring certificates of necessity from such plants. This bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives which in turn submitted the bill to the Treasury Department for a report. Repeated requests have been made for such report but to date it has not been received.

It is now too late to ask the passage of said legislation. The following letter suggests immediate relief which could be granted by the President. The letter follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 30, 1946.

Hon. JOHN W. SNYDER,
Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Early in the war the late President Roosevelt issued an Executive order under his War Powers Act requiring small contractors to secure certificates of necessity which would enable them to amortize their investments in such war plants or to charge off the cost thereof against profits.

The order has never been rescinded and it is working a definite hardship on many small war plants who do not have large legal staffs and perhaps were not aware of the need for securing such a certificate.

In order to relieve their distress Representative DONDERO, of Michigan, introduced H. R. 6022 several months ago and it was referred to the Ways and Means Committee, where no action has been taken because the Treasury has to date failed to submit a report on this bill, notwithstanding numerous requests that they do so.

It is now too late to take action on any new legislation as Congress will probably adjourn Friday. In view of this situation, I am going to request that you be so good as to suggest to the President that he revoke the order referred to in paragraph 1 of this letter in order to give immediate relief to hundreds, if not thousands, of small war plants which may be put out of business because of their failure to secure a certificate of necessity. Such action would grant real relief and enable many of them to stay in business.

With personal regards and best wishes, I am,

Yours sincerely.

Further Footsteps on the Pathway to Enduring World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been graciously extended me so to do, I herewith make brief comment and insert in connection therewith a chronological list of principal international conferences in which the United States has participated during the period from January 1, 1945, to and including June 1946. This list was prepared by the very prompt and very able Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, and I again have occasion to thank the Library of Congress for their cooperation in this important matter. Heretofore on occasions the Library of Congress, at my request, has likewise furnished me with a chronological list of such international conferences in which the United States has participated in the period preceding my request for these lists. This valuable and inspiring information and data has been heretofore printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. To complete the RECORD therefore, down to date, I have pleasure in inserting the list hereinafter set forth.

This day on the floor of the House of Representatives, I was privileged to make brief comment on the fact of the beginning on yesterday of the peace conference of the 21 nations at Paris, France; and to call to your attention also the very significant and appropriate send-off given our distinguished Secretary of State, James Byrnes, when he left Washington a couple of days before this epic-making peace conference in Paris. Distinguished Senators, of both the Democratic and Republicar Parties, as well as distinguished Members of the House of Representatives, the President of the United States, Cabinet officers, top-ranking governmental administrators, admirals, generals, and members of the armed forces, both men and women, civilians by the thousands, with the waving of flags and the cordial salute of trumpets and the playing of inspiring patriotic music—these all joined in sending our Secretary of State in a hopeful, inspired, prayerful attitude to Paris. How significant it is that bipartisan support cordially and sincerely wishes this conference abundant success. How different it is from some times past in our Nation's history. Thank God that selfish and ostrichlike isolationism is no longer prevalent or paramount in our Halls of Congress—sufficient enough to hold back the fact that we must either live as a world neighborhood or we will not live at all. This morning on the floor of the House I respectfully urged every Member of Congress to work for peace and to pray unceasingly. I also urged that each of us do our dead level best for our constituents in our respective districts—to think rightly and pray sincerely that this Paris Peace Conference will find common accord to the end that men shall enduringly live in terms of peace—instead of in terms of fear of sudden atomic destruction.

This list, together with the others the Library of Congress supplied me and which have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix by me during the last 18 months, should convince us of the fact that never before in recorded history have there been so many nations of the world holding so many international conferences among themselves on the subject of common concern, worry, fears, and stresses among men of different nationalities; of different faiths; of different political idealogies; of different ways of living; of different ways of economic control and social philosophies. I have a very definite feeling from what I read and learn from the world's present economic status and history that probably the most formidable enemy of enduring world peace and of world neighborhood progress, stabilized and cooperative effort, and common understanding and good will among the peoples of the earth at this time is the untoward and present unbalance in our world neighborhood. Never before have we been forced to live as such close neighbors. Never again will we live as far from the other nations of the world as we live this day. Transportation development, scientific research, technical improvements, and atomic energy have catapulted us into either a world catastrophe or a world neighborhood or a world neighborhood of nations. America has her present destiny which is to assume the responsibility and to discharge with honor and dispatch America's full obligation, responsibility, and privilege to a determination of which choice the world shall make. With reliable facts and figures to our attention that probably about two-thirds of the world's population ordinarily lives in poverty and ignorance, and that this percentage of the world's people cannot well produce either enough to eat or enough to wear or enough to house themselves decently—and with the immediate and intimate presence of atomic energy and fissionable materials ever in our midst; and with the probability that it is no secret to any of the major nations of the world—I say it is encouraging and heartening that the Paris Peace Conference is now in progress, and that these 161 chronologically listed international conferences have been recently held as set forth in this list from the Library of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, this leads me to say very sincerely—even though very briefly—that the heart of America must not think for a moment of being discouraged or disheartened on account of any present world condition which seems to indicate great difficulty in and problems about concerted action in either this Paris peace conference—or any other conference amongst the world nations. For, it seems to me that evidence conclusively proves that the world nations are getting together for they know they must get on their knees in humility and concerted thinking together; lest they are forced to deal in the immediate future as the aborigines dealt, to wit: to kill other humans first lest they themselves are killed by other humans. Therefore, let us take heart as we are conscious of these international conferences having been held, and the minds of the world directed to a common solution of world neighborhood problems.

Nor is the fact that startling or final agreement has not been made on all of the subject matters of the conference at all discouraging to me. I hope and pray that no American will allow himself to be possessed of mental fear or hazard or stress or strain in these strenuous, trying times of reconversion of this world from the greatest devastating war in the world history. We must keep our heads up and our hearts and spirits attuned with the infinite. We must keep our feet on the ground—patriotic, devoted, sensible, and sound—tolerant of all sincere purposes of sincere people, where ever they are in the world. We must dedicate our renewed strength to the cause of unity of action as a nation to the end that none of those who have died shall have done so in vain, on account of any lack of purpose or power or work on our part.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT J. McGLINCHEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. McGLINCHEY. Mr. Speaker, the smoke of battle over OPA has cleared away and we have a price-control law. But the facts of the deliberate sabotage of this vital program should be impressed upon the minds of our people so that they will know who is responsible for the weak, crippled measure which the President felt compelled to approve.

Aided by a group of lobbyists, with millions of dollars back of them, the Republican Congressmen, ignoring the distress which higher prices will bring to hundreds of thousands of persons, employed every means at their command to bring about the death of OPA. In that they failed. But they did succeed in taking out most of its teeth.

I believe in enacting legislation which will provide essential justice to all of our people and at the same time preserve our future national security. I believe that effective price control should have been continued for another year, and voted accordingly, and judging from the thousands of letters and telegrams which have poured into Washington during recent weeks, the great mass of the American people believes likewise. Various pressure groups, however, expect to profit by inflation at the expense of the millions of our citizens who sacrificed to buy bonds during the war. Beginning several months ago, these groups have waged a steady battle for the removal of price control, and the seeds of their propaganda fell on fertile soil when planted with Republican Members of the House and Senate, who were ready and willing to undertake the job of emasculating the price-control law.

Under the new law many changes will be made. More and more products will be freed of price controls, and decontrol will come faster and faster.

As prices rise, the tendency will be to blame the party in power, whereas the fault lies directly with the Republican Party and a few Democratic members from the South. When people are irritated and unhappy over the national outlook, their tendency is to vote against whoever is in office. In the coming election, I sincerely trust that they will profit by the tragic experience through which our country passed as a result of electing a Republican Congress following World War I and repeating that mistake in subsequent elections. It is needless to dwell on the misery and distress suffered by the millions of our plain people through the Hoover depression. Even the grim war years have not erased those memories from our minds.

Consumers and businessmen alike should realize that the Government has been exerting every effort to safeguard their earnings and savings by stabilizing prices and that, despite the greatest inflationary pressure the country has ever known, under OPA a relatively stable price level and a sound economy have been maintained.

Any weakness in price control as it existed prior to June 30 was in its administration and not in the law. Injustices have occurred in some instances, especially in the operation of rent control, but greater injustices became evident immediately upon the expiration of the law on June 30. Recently, a distressed woman called at my Philadelphia office to solicit my advice in a rent problem. She was the mother of three veterans. Her daughter had served in the United States Navy. This girl is now an invalid. Immediately after the expiration of the price-control law on June 30, the mother received a 30-day notice of eviction. As stated, she is the mother of not only one but three veterans, one an invalid. They are people of limited means, and their outlook was dismal indeed as due to the present housing shortage they did not know which way to turn.

The Republican Governor of our State might have had the foresight to call a special session of the legislature to act on rent control as had been done by the governors of other States. Instead, when distressed citizens appealed to him to take this step he replied by suggesting that they write to their Congressman. Again, the same old story of buck-passing, a typical illustration of the do-nothing policy for which the Republican Party is renowned. The city council of Philadelphia finally made a half-hearted effort to remedy the local situation by acting on a rent regulation and referring it to the city solicitor to determine its legality. Another example of the policy of inaction and indolence which characterizes the Republican Party, and another example of hypocrisy because while the Republican Party in Philadelphia, in its efforts to deceive the people, was giving lip service to rent control, the Republican Party in Washington through its Republican Congressmen from Pennsylvania and elsewhere was voting not only against rent control, but also against price control of commodities.

Terminal Leave Pay for Enlisted Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained to urge the House to vote for a cash settlement in lieu of terminal leave pay for enlisted personnel.

Throughout this session of Congress I have felt that it would be more proper, more useful, and more acceptable to the personnel involved and to the Government to vote and pay adjusted compensation for enlisted personnel rather than terminal leave pay. This would have offset their failure to receive leave pay and would have adjusted the inequities of their present pay without making such an issue the subject of future political battles. This is, in my judgment, an earned and well-justified cause.

However, inasmuch as terminal leave pay is now an issue, I sincerely feel that justice can be done only by a cash payment. Bonds will not, in my judgment, properly equalize the payments to enlisted personnel and officers.

I have confidence in the enlisted personnel, and I know that, if they are financially able to do so, they will invest in Government bonds voluntarily. They did so during the war. As a group, soldiers bought more bonds than civilians of comparable financial abilities.

I urge that the House insist upon its position and require that payments be made in cash.

A Home Program for American Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to include the following statement by Rev. C. E. B. Ward concerning a work to strengthen the American home and provide a healthy home environment for homeless boys.

A HOME PROGRAM FOR AMERICAN YOUTH

(Presented by Rev. C. E. B. Ward, executive secretary of the League for the American Home, Inc., and Marvel House, Inc., Homes for Youth)

A quarter century ago, through the devitalizing influences of our materialistic civilization, there began a general forsaking of spiritual entities, accompanied by a marked loosening of family ties. There was a consequent drawing together in a great variety of social groups for those heart satisfactions normally found in personal religious faith and at home and fireside.

The resultant break-down of family authority which shifted personal parent responsibilities to outside agencies only stimulated their increase. A few persons here and there were disturbed by this trend which was subtly undermining the love and loyalties, the appeal and authority of the home. (One school had a class for teaching parenthood. There are now hundreds of such classes in schools and social groups over America.)

Abcut this time Rev. C. E. B. Ward, a New York City pastor, remarked one evening to Mrs. Ward that there were seven meetings in the church that night. This fact came with an impact, which started anxious questionings regarding the future of American homes with so many outside agencies taking time and energy—and led, finally, to Mr. Ward's resignation and to their resolution to study home conditions at first hand, expanding the walls of their own home to young people of all types; also to explore by personal interviews the public's reaction to their theories. All in the faith that some practical program might unfold for restoring the place of the home.

With their meager savings, a plot of ground was bought 20 miles out in beautiful New Jersey near the Ramapo Mountains, three tents pitched, and with the help of a few boys who had heard of their home plans and had come to work with them, they began to build the first cottage.

Boys drifted in from everywhere. They learned home duties; they discovered their native gift for future careers, and in the building and settling of the place every boy acquired a hand craft he had most aptitude for. The boys had a boundless enthusiasm for the life in the home, even for the hardest work. There was no punishment. Those who offended were suspended, some several times. Soon there were too many for the small home unit.

Then two apartments were opened in New York City, one being contributed by the landlord. Still later two 12-room houses were opened on One Hundred and Thirtieth Street—one for young men and one for young women. The number of houses grew until Mrs. Ward had loved and mothered as her own, 2,300 boys and 241 girls while she reared her own three living children.

MARVEL HOUSE

The boys called it a marvel house because of the rapid character transformations, and for the miracles of provisioning.

This experiment was conducted in 20 different houses, in 10 communities of 4 States. These houses served several thousand youth of all social classes. They comprised many religions and nationalities. It was practically 100 percent successful.

Marvel House was incorporated in New Jersey in 1916, Mark Nave, president, and Kennard L. Wedgwood, treasurer. Incorporated in New York in 1919 with 12 directors, among them Arthur Curtis James and ex-Governor Whitman; and in 1944 in Connecticut.

As the impulse of this mission stemmed from a drive to create something practical for home betterment, after 19 years of this study in Marvel House homes, its purpose seemed accomplished and the time ripe for consolidation of the findings into a solid national program.

Marvel House homes were closed and the program which had slowly unfolded through the years was embodied by a group of representative people under the leadership of Reverend and Mrs. Ward into a program for the League for the American Home, Inc.

In retrospect, Marvel House had been a remarkably vivid, spiritually inspiring experience. Hundreds of letters from the boys from all parts of the world tell of their charmed associations in these homes. "What a fellow gets in this house he never gets away from," said one boy. Another from the West, "Who could picture a jollier family than I witnessed at dinner that last evening in Marvel House? It has stayed with me ever since. I wonder if I will ever know another dinner like that." One wrote from Egypt, "When I went out of the gate in the morning the weight and hardness and struggle of the city settled on me. But when I returned at night, as soon as I came through the gate, the brightness and cheer and joy of the home drove away all depression." A hard-headed inspector confessed, "This is no institution, but a home, and a beautiful one. Boys who come out of here will amount to something. They'll have to from this atmosphere."

Marvel House functioned to create homes for neglected and delinquent youth. Six sections of New York City have asked for their reestablishment, offering local support, as have many other parts of the country. Home centers are projected for over America. This would cost $300,000 with local backing. These homes would prepare 10,000 youth annually for civic and spiritual leadership.

LEAGUE FOR THE AMERICAN HOME, INC.

The League functions as a national educational movement. To promote training of youth for marriage and parenthood careers. To stress religious training of children by parents and to lend all possible aid.

Both Marvel House and the League act as fact-finding and promotional agencies to wrench the thought and effort of the public from its obsessed reliance on outside institutions, and its preoccupation with business and pleasure. To stir it from its lethargy and indifference to an awareness of the potential dangers in present youth conditions and in modern social welfare trends, into a realization of the dynamism locked in the family circle.

Home is the place where America will hold its rendezvous with destiny.

Not on battlefields nor in marts of trade; not primarily in halls of learning nor in ecclesiastical counsels; not even in legislative assemblies nor in world parliaments of man may individuals and nations confidently face the perplexing confusions of tomorrow. But rather in homes—the simplest, humblest form of human organism. In homes, which miraculously implant the unconscious beginnings of faith which assures a growing church, and builds the sound character indispensable for citizenship in a democratic state.

A free world cannot survive without America's spiritual leadership. It is not a question of solving the political and economic problems of the world. But whether we can maintain the integrity of our own souls against the corruption of luxury, and be an example to the world. The answer will be found in the character built by the millions of obscure American homes. The only effective defense against the atomic bomb is the creation of human beings who have no impulse to throw bombs on anyone.

A FEW ACHIEVEMENTS

Conducted family unit Marvel House homes for several thousand youth, also private schools and camps with home features; 40,000 personal interviews with representative Americans for expert counsel; questionnaire survey of Los Angeles metropolitan social agencies; home and marriage youth conference under Presbyterian Board of Christian Education; prepared method of procedure for churches, clubs, community groups and private schools; printed 250 pieces of literature and distributed several hundred thousand copies; had influential part in stimulating many groups and organizations; issued national call to prayer (reprinted from New York Times) during London blitz; sold war bonds to Carnegie Hall artists and to Philharmonic concert patrons; held exhibit in Madison Square Garden; opened Washington, D. C., office; organized League Congressional Committee; addressed Congressional breakfast group, opening door to home discussions in breakfast groups over America; opened Marvel House home near Washington; prepared program on home and early religious training for National Conference on Control of Juvenile Delinquency.

OBJECTIVES

National-International Home Center, unique in America, a memorial to the noblest traditions of American home life and interpretation of the place of the family in building the postwar world. Headquarters for all League activities; foster-home committees in local churches to cultivate spiritual values in families of church and community; circulate Family Prayer Circle pledge for daily family devotions; a magazine, the Human Digest, stressing family spiritual welfare; publish True Marvel House Christmas story including youth of 30 nationalities; and thrilling stories of Marvel House boys; national series of home rallies; Nation-wide art contest open to young artists for placing on canvas the Vision given years ago by a stranger, symbolizing the struggle and final victory in this Christian home crusade; national home week for agitation, wide emphasis and study for the prevention of delinquency and crime; persistent, personal effort to secure legislation for compulsory training for marriage and parent responsibilities; further recommendations to UN urging appointment of commissions for study and research to underscore the place of home and family in relation to world peace.

AMERICA'S RESPONSIBILITY

United States Government bureaus warn, "There is an almost complete breakdown of hitherto approved methods painstakingly worked out" to meet the needs of youth. "We dare not place too much dependence on recreation alone" for youth development. "There were recently 18,000,000 children between the ages of 7 and 14 on the loose" without adequate parental supervision. President Truman warns, "In some categories juvenile crime has increased in excess of 350 percent since Pearl Harbor." J. Edgar Hoover says, "The only solution is old-fashioned homes and religion."

In view of these warnings it becomes imperative for those of us who haven't given the home question any serious thought, to take an honest inventory of values affecting the future of youth, and gear our thinking, planning, and giving to the most effective program for equipping them for civic and spiritual leadership.

As a Nation we are distinguished for efficiency in preparing scientists, engineers, educators, and social workers, but have failed lamentably in even a concept of training for parenthood, the biggest job on earth.

Of $52,500,000 gifts in 1 year by 122 leading American foundations for philanthropy not a dollar was given for any movement preparing youth for home careers and the early religious instruction of children by parents.

The New York Times says, "Endowment funds aggregating billions are available for charity and education, but when there is question of providing sorely needed funds for homes, capital is lacking. Give the home a chance. This is better than spending increasing billions trying to correct errors that might have been avoided if only 5 to 10 percent of money lavished on institutions were invested in homes."

Congressional Reform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in my remarks an editorial from the Hartford Courant of Hartford, Conn., of July 28, 1946, concerning congressional reform. The press of the country has well received the reorganization bill which passed the House and Senate last week.

The late and highly respected Francis T. Maloney, then a Senator from my State, submitted the first resolution in the Senate just prior to his death in January of 1945. He, as chairman of the first congressional reorganization committee, had devoted much of his time and energy in working out the details of this much needed reform.

The action of the House and Senate last week in passing the congressional reorganization bill will ever be a lasting and enduring monument to his name. I know that our late departed friend, were he with us today, would applaud the action taken by the Congress.

The editorial follows:

CONGRESSIONAL REFORM

Fundamentally, the congressional reorganization bills passed by the Senate and the House were not in conflict. Both would reduce the number of committees and provide for closer working relationship with the President. This latter provision might restore party responsibility to a commendable degree, averting repetition of some of the experiences of recent weeks that may be illustrated by the impasse over extending the price-control law. And of special importance is the new legislative set-up pertaining to the Federal Budget designed to keep appropriations within estimated income.

Congress is to be commended for taking final action on this question, although in so doing it would have been wiser to have adopted the Senate's version of the bill rather than to have approved the bill as amended by the House. For example, the outright increase of the salary for a Congressman from $10,000 to $15,000 as voted by the Senate is not only defensible but far more forthright than the House provision to boost it to $12,500 and then tack on an additional $2,500 free of all control, meaning tax exempt. If these salaries had not been blanketed into the income-tax law, some question might be raised as to the need for boosting them by $5,000. Again, we see here another illustration of just shifting money from one pocket to the other when salaries of public officials are taxed.

We regret that in the House Representatives WOODHOUSE, of Connecticut, and JUDD, of Minnesota, lost their fight to provide every Congressman with an administrative assistant. The Federal business has expanded so enormously in recent years that the most conscientious and efficient lawmakers cannot keep abreast of all questions as they should. Such assistants could relieve Congressmen of much of their present errand-boy duties to constituents, leaving more time for consideration of the broader questions involved in legislation. In the long run the additional cost would likely be a sound investment. Economy in government does not consist so much of penny pinching as it does of prudent spending.

At any rate, it is heartening that Congress is showing an interest in reforming itself. It is no overstatement of the importance of this question to say that reform is absolutely imperative if confidence in representative government is to survive the attacks by those who would undermine and destroy it. With the machinery of legislation moving from the horse-and-buggy age to this streamlining era, we should set the election of better Congressmen as the next objective. We have had all that we can stand of corrupt or allegedly corrupt lawmakers, to say nothing of those wishy-washy ones who rely on public-opinion polls rather than on their own judgments to determine how they will vote.

The Courant cannot refrain from heartily commending Senator LA FOLLETTE and Representative MONRONEY, chairman and vice chairman, respectively, of the congressional committee who studied the problems of Congress and backed their conclusions with an excellent bill that has been amended only in detail during its course through the legislative mill. And above all else we would remember that the groundwork for this urgently needed reform was laid by a Connecticut Senator, the late Francis T. Maloney, who was the first chairman of the Committee on Congressional Reorganization. With characteristic incisiveness he had struck at the roots of Congress' weaknesses. Without detracting from the credit due Messrs. LA FOLLETTE and MONRONEY, the bill now at the White House may be regarded in its basic reforms as a tribute to the public service, rendered by Senator Maloney. If death had not ended his career, he would have been in the forefront of the fight for improving the legislative machinery. He was that kind of an American.

The Road Back—A Soviet Peace for Yugoslavia?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, just as Poland was the first of our allies to be liberated for absorption and subjection by our wartime associate, the Soviet Union, so Yugoslavia presents the most complete example to date of the sovietization of another of our original allies in the war against German national socialism.

The technical details of liquidating all persons suspected of a lack of obedience to the Communist bosses in Yugoslavia is a subject which American legislators and citizens should have an opportunity to study. Also, the forced growth of anti-American propaganda in these regions where we were once held in high respect, is a fact to be taken into account in formulating our foreign policy.

The following articles by Mr. Eric L. Pridonoff, which appeared in the Los Angeles Examiner on June 16 and 23 of this year, are unusually educational in regard to the present situation in the area of southeastern Europe, which has great strategic importance to future peace for Europe and for us.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include these articles:

EX-ENVOY SAYS YUGOSLAVS FEAR LIFE UNDER REDS—"IRON CURTAIN" HIDES SYSTEMATIC TERROR CAMPAIGN BY MINORITY

(Behind the "iron curtain" in Yugoslavia not more than 4 percent of the people are voluntary Communists; the other 96 percent live under the persecuting whiplash of the OZNA, Tito's Moscow-dominated secret police. That's the first-hand observation of Eric L. Pridonoff, who has just returned from Yugoslavia after 13 months there as a special economic attaché in the United States embassy at Belgrade. Pridonoff, who has resigned his State Department post to return to his prewar career as a mechanical engineer in Los Angeles, tells in this second article of his series the methods by which Russia has imposed its "reign of terror" on Yugoslavia.)

(By Eric L. Pridonoff, former special economic attaché in the United States Embassy at Belgrade)

Every city in Communist-ruled Yugoslavia is divided into wards by the Tito regime. Every ward is headed by a committee, whose members are tested Communists.

The wards, in turn, are divided into streets with Communist street committees. And each street is divided into blocks under Communist block secretaries.

These ward, street and block officials report daily to the OZNA, all-powerful secret police, controlled by Gen. Alexander Rankovich, minister of the interior, who is general secretary of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia.

RED FILES BARE LIFE SECRETS

No man, woman or child may move in or out of his block, street or ward without it being included in the daily reports to the OZNA.

Each individual must have in his possession at all times a "karakteriska" signed by his block secretary. Without this document he cannot buy food, obtain lodgings, clothe himself or travel.

The OZNA maintains files on each individual, and in those files is written the most confidential and secret opinion of the block secretary about the holder of every "karakteriska."

The file gives the Communist Party stamp of approval or disapproval of the individual.

People not of the Communist front are classified as unreliable, lawless, even as killers. They are game with ever open season, for the OZNA, for the "reliable" or the authorized or those labeled "ours" in the favorable dossiers.

DOCUMENT OF LIFE OR DEATH

In Yugoslavia the "karakteriska" is a document of life—or death.

Based on reports of the block secretaries, OZNA men may enter any home, check food supplies, wood, clothes for each family.

Smoke is checked as it comes from the chimneys, to indicate whether fuel is burned too often, and also to check the source of the fuel supply if more than the meager ration seems to be consumed.

Visitors, for even a few minutes, are reported. Casual street contacts are noted, with special emphasis on contacts with British or American persons.

In order to buy a pair of shoes, a yard of cloth, or any consumer goods except food, the individual must get a coupon from the ward headquarters—impossible unless the "karakteriska" is in order and the official file at headquarters places the applicant on the approved list.

Prices, with a coupon, are reasonable. Getting the coupon is the trick.

Yet Tito's military officers and government officials have shoes in multiple pairs. They live in the best housing. They have ample food. Their wives wear silk and furs and diamonds. They have automobiles and ample American gasoline. Their stoves have ample fuel.

On the farms, in the forests, in the mines, each group has a production quota, carefully estimated, watched and checked by the never-ending chain of OZNA espionage.

The farmer must sell to the Government, at fixed prices such quantities of foodstuffs as the government in that district estimates it needs to furnish 600 grams of flour per day to heavy laborers, 450 grams for other laborers, and 300 grams for all others—in American measure, 600 grams is about a pound.

The farmer with more than five head of sheep must sell all wool in excess of the five head to the Government at fixed prices. Those with less than five head can keep two fleeces for each member of his family, the rest being sold to the Government.

The Government fixes prices on all items. Any semblance of thrift is called hoarding and carries penalties up to death. Raw materials, semifinished materials—all must be sold to the only authorized buyer—the Government.

Owners of agricultural land may not sell it.

Owners of factories, or production plants of any kind, frequently find themselves accused of having made profits during the German occupation, if they were in occupied territory.

Charges of war profiteering bring commissars to take over their plants.

Fines and taxes put the plants into Government hands in short order after that.

ALL PRIVATE LAND HAS BEEN LIQUIDATED

Under the Tito-Subashich agreement private property was guaranteed. Under the Tito-OZNA regime more than three-quarters of all property in Yugoslavia has been liquidated.

Any denunciation of an individual in the people's court—any charge by a Communist that the individual collaborated with the Nazis—is equivalent to guilt.

Milosh Minich, public prosecutor of Serbia, appearing before the legislative committee, made the following comment on justice as it is meted out in present-day Yugoslavia:

"If we had judges—jurists as permanent judges—we would give preponderance to formal justice. But material justice should be rendered by men, regardless of whether they are jurists.

"Justice should be pronounced by men who know how to guard the achievements of the national liberation struggle. Men of the national liberation struggle appreciate better the significance and importance of the new laws than would jurists who interpret the letter of the law."

TEN MINUTES BRING DEATH SENTENCE

Just how this works may be shown by some examples.

In Sandjak, a court composed of a Communist, a Gypsy, and a Turk sits in judgment at night, sentences people to death by shooting without a proper hearing and without a lawyer present—the whole proceeding lasting less than 10 minutes in some cases.

A group of women of the Anti-Fascist Front of Women suddenly decided to form a court in Belgrade last July. They tried a Yugoslav woman and sentenced her to 5 years imprisonment.

The authorities recognized the sentence, set it up as an example.

YUGOSLAVS FEAR OZNA VISITS

There is not a man or woman in Yugoslavia other than the small percentage of Communists, who are not afraid of a visit from the OZNA or the militia to their homes; of torture, jail, plunder, persecution, and death.

Many thousands of Yugoslav refugees are now in Italy and Austria, ready to kill themselves rather than be sent back to the homeland they knew before the arrival of Tito and the locusts of communism.

TITO'S YUGOSLAVIA REJECTS UNITED STATES, BRITISH AID, SCORNS ANYTHING AMERICAN, INSULTS YANKS

(By Eric L. Pridonoff, former special economic attaché in the United States Embassy at Belgrade)

British and American military supplies saved Tito's Yugoslav partisans from extinction during the war.

British and American supplies through UNRRA saved Yugoslavia's economic life after the liberation from Hitler's rule.

But today Tito, his Communist secret police, his general, and his civil government officials openly scorn anything American or British, anything not within the orbit of communism.

Yugoslavia—below the crust of military and political dictatorship—lives in the forlorn hope that some day, somehow, the Americans or the United Nations will save them.

I have been told this not once but literally hundreds of times by non-Communists all over the country—in trust, because, though an American, I could speak to them in their own tongue.

TITO ATTITUDE ONCE FRIENDLY

Tito and the Communists in Yugoslavia were not always openly scornful of and antagonistic to Americans east of the Adriatic. Once we and the British were most welcome there.

That was when our aviators, and our supplies, were parachuting to earth to aid the Partisan effort against Hitler.

That was when Prime Minister Churchill, reporting to his Parliament after the Big Three Conference at Teheran, declared:

"Between General Mihailovich and Tito, we are taking sides with Tito and shall give only him our greatest possible assistance."

The good will of Tito and the Communists held as long as we gave them armaments and food for their armies, great numbers of trucks for their transportation system, and, later, vast UNRRA supplies to feed the starving people.

It held until the incident at Trieste when Allied troops stopped Tito's Partisans from flowing westward beyond Fiume into northern Italy, and stopped their plunder and mass murder.

Then came the change.

Before the Trieste incident, when parades were held in Yugoslavia and Tito's victorious army strutted—often on UNRRA shoes—or rode, often in UNRRA relief trucks, the banners showed pictures of Stalin, Tito, Roosevelt, and Churchill.

AMERICAN AID KEPT SECRET

To the shouts of "Long live the Soviet" and "Long live Tito" were added shouts of "Long live America" and "Long live England."

After the Trieste episode, however, there were no shouts for the American and British leaders, no placards for America or England.

The American trucks, driven by American gasoline, carried Tito's troops all over Yugoslavia, but there was no mention that America gave them to the Partisans. OZNA forbade posters of the Allied leaders of the Western powers.

That Tito and his Communists were willing to take but not to give, is evidenced by this statement of Yugoslav General Ärsa Jovanovich before he left, dressed in the uniform of a Soviet lieutenant general, for Russia to undergo 2½ years' training in Russian military and political tactics:

"You will never buy us with UNRRA supplies. You will never buy us. Our sympathies are with the East."

The Tito feeling toward Americans showed when the Embassy was ready to move into Belgrade. Daily complaints began to come in about Tito's seizures of American enterprises in Yugoslavia.

Usually a committee of three, headed by a commissar, took over. Up to April 1946, when I left, no such seized property was returned to American ownership or control.

AMERICANS ACCUSED OF COLLABORATION

Some of our citizens were accused of collaboration with the Germans, others merely of making profits during the occupancy—all without evidence.

The J. G. White & Co. property at Novi Sad is one instance.

First the holdings were taken over. Then a forced sale was put through at 10 percent of the original investment. Then charges were made for back wages.

A penalty was assessed for profits during the war—Hungarian occupation forces occupied the plant—so that the final return amounted to less than 1 percent of the original investment.

Another case is that of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. holdings at Belgrade.

I personally investigated both cases, and so I know the facts.

I went with two American representatives to look over the plant owned by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. at Zemun. We presented our credentials to the commissar in charge.

He said he had nothing to say to us, that he was in charge, and that we could not even come into the waiting room.

It was tough for an American to take a slap in the face like that, but every American now in Yugoslavia can testify that Tito and his Communists are slapping all American faces just that way.

EMBASSY EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO INSULTS

Even employees at the American Embassy are subject to persecution and insult.

About a year ago the Embassy electrician, a Yugoslav, was arrested without specific charge and jailed. We never learned what happened to him.

While I was in Yugoslavia, five native members of the United States Embassy staff were arrested without charges and jailed without trial.

On one of them, no reports were ever received. Two of the others were still in jail when I returned to America. The other two were released after a time.

A score of Embassy employees were told from time to time by OZNA, secret police agents:

"You will not work for the American reactionaries forever. You are either with us or against us. If you choose to work for the reactionaries, we will remember."

EMBASSY FOOD SUPPLIES TESTED

There is constant terror in the Embassy among Yugoslav employees. They never know when they will be arrested.

Diplomatic immunity is not recognized by Tito or his men.

Americans coming in or going out of Yugoslavia are searched.

Embassy food supplies come in by air from Italy or Austria. Tito customs men require each box to be opened. They put their fingers into their mouths, then into sugar or flour to test it.

Any Russian officers in Yugoslavia who demonstrated friendship for the Americans at the Embassy were quickly arrested on trumped-up charges of bribery or some other alleged offense and whisked away to an unknown fate. There were several such instances, of which I have first-hand knowledge.

Last February the Tito foreign office sent a sudden message to the United States Embassy that all cars parked in front of it were blocking traffic and would have to be moved.

While plans were being made in the Embassy to move the cars, and assurances had been given by Tito's foreign office of ample time to complete the removal, the chief of the traffic patrol arrived and presented an ultimatum that if the cars were not moved within 5 minutes he would move them.

At the end of that 5 minutes his men began to break locks on the cars and move them away.

In Memoriam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH E. TALBOT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include in my remarks a memorial address delivered by Grand Master Carl W. Johnson, of Washington, D. C., at a memorial service at the grave of Nils Pearson, first grand master of the Vasa Order of America, held at Evergreen Cemetery, New Britain, Conn., on June 25, 1946:

IN MEMORIAM

We have come together, members of the Vasa Order of America, to honor the memory of our order's first grand master, Nils Pearson, and those who, together with him, gave their time and strength to lay the solid foundation upon which our organization has built and has operated for now one-half a century.

We, the children of the present day, will ever need to remember that our work which, at times, seems hard, would be infinitely more difficult if it were not for the sacrificial effort and toil of those, like Nils Pearson, who have gone before us. Thinking of the anniversary we are permitted to keep and of the abundant success that has been ours, culminating in its country-wide celebration at this time, we may truthfully say to ourselves in the words of the Good Book: "Others have labored and we have entered into their labors." Others have tilled the ground and sown the seed and ours has been the joy of gathering the harvest.

We have come here this hour to honor the memory of Nils Pearson and of those who, in days now long past, worked with him in and for our order. How shall we honor them? The monument that we erected in this hallowed spot is a fine and worthy testimony both to the enduring character of the planning and the building wrought by these pioneers. It is truly expressive of our appreciation of their effort and of our desire not to become forgetful of all that they have done. As such we deem it a worthy tribute and we are deeply honored in being able to share in this memorial service.

But there is still deeper and finer tribute that we are called upon to bring, one, without which, the gathering at this monument becomes only a perfunctory rite and a meaningless ceremony. That deeper, finer tribute of us at such a ceremony as this is that we shall exemplify in our own living and conduct those virtues that we praise and admire in these leaders, our forbears, and that we now build well in our day so that those following us may receive good from us even as we have received good from them.

Words of praise and monuments of stone are noble tributes, but they are never as good as the spirit of consecration, the spirit of service, the spirit of helpfulness, the spirit of loyalty to home, to country, and to God. These qualities our leaders had in rich measure. Let us honor them today and in the days to come by cultivating in our Order and in our personal conduct these same qualities. Let this be the greater, finer tribute we bring to Nils Pearson and his faithful coworkers.

We cannot think of the past without wondering also about the future. This needs to be said. Not all serious problems for ourselves and our Order have been solved. There is still much and great work to do. Wisdom and strength will be needed, together with courage, patience, and endurance. Where will be found these virtues? Where? In the story of the past. In the lives of those whose work is now done and whose remembrance, like a divine benediction, will rest over us. May this be our experience growing out of this ceremony. May it be an experience which shall create a greater Vasa Order, one which shall enrich our own lives and which shall finally be blessed with the approval of those who follow after.

Record Shows OPA Has Granted Price Increases Ranging From 12 to 41 Percent in Building Materials Since VJ-Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, during the past few months the charge has been repeatedly made that the Office of Price Administration was holding down volume production of building materials through a policy of refusing to grant price increases which might be production incentives. The facts of the lumber pricing situation, together with the total number of price increases granted by the Office of Price Administration, are brought together and summarized for the first time in a valuable article published in the July issue of the Architectural Forum, regarded as one of the outstanding magazines in the building field. The figures they cite offer a complete and accurate refutation of the charges that few price increases have been granted. According to the Forum's figures, increases granted have ranged from 7 percent for southern pine to 41 percent above base prices for cast-iron radiation. For the benefit of the Members of the House, I should like to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this very illuminating story.

BUILDING MATERIALS PRICE BOOSTS

While the fate of the whole building materials price-control structure hung between Congress and President Truman, the industry continued to contend that price ceilings were the biggest single factor in holding down volume production. Housing Boss Wilson Wyatt said that price increases were now being handed out briskly to producers who could show need for them. Last month his office gave the Forum this check-list of price ceiling boosts granted to date for important building materials:

SOUTHERN PINE

Increase of 4.7 percent November 29, 1945. Increase of 7.3 percent on February 20, 1946. This makes a total of 12 percent since VJ-day.

DOUGLAS FIR

Three increases granted since March 1946 for a total of approximately 12 percent.

WESTERN PINE

An 11-percent increase in April 1946.

LUMBER PRODUCTS

Commensurate increases granted. Examples: Oak flooring got a 10-percent increase in February 1946 and a 4½-percent increase in May. Douglas fir plywood got a 7½-percent increase in November 1945, and a 20-percent increase in March 1946 for 12 construction items. Lumber prices as a whole are now up more than 90 percent over their 1929 levels and more than 25 percent over 1941.

COMMON AND FACE BRICK

An increase of $2 per thousand (about 10 percent) September 1945 east of the Rockies. The same increase west of the Rockies in January 1946. Both were in addition to area increases ranging from $1.75 to $3.75.

CAST-IRON SOIL PIPE

Four increases granted, the last on May 25, 1946, for a total of $17.50 a ton or 27 percent above the base price of approximately $65.

ASPHALT ROOFING

Two increases totaling 10½ percent.

ASBESTOS CEMENT ROOFING AND SIDING

Roofing shingles up 15 percent, siding shingles up 5 percent.

HEATING EQUIPMENT

Domestic oil burners up 9 percent. Warm-air furnaces up 12 percent. Gas-fired and liquid-petroleum-fired furnaces and unit heaters up 12½ percent.

CAST-IRON RADIATION

Four increases totaling 41 percent above base prices.

PLUMBING FIXTURES

Enameled cast-iron fixtures up 8 percent plus adjustment for individual companies. Brass fixtures up 24 percent. Valves and fittings up 20 percent.

Chester Bowles Honored for Public Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHASE GOING WOODHOUSE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mrs. WOODHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include excerpts from a statement issued by the American University, Washington, D. C.:

Chester Bowles, Director of Economic Stabilization and one of America's outstanding public citizens, was awarded an honorary degree of doctor of laws for "distinguished public service" by American University at its commencement ceremonies last night, June 10.

Bowles was chosen for the honor in an annual poll conducted by the university among a hundred of the Nation's most prominent citizens qualified to judge the degree of service by Americans in public life. Bowles was deemed to have made the most outstanding contribution to public service in recent years.

The panel of 100 judges consisted of representative public officials, businessmen, educators, journalists, Members of Congress, and other public figures. While the individual votes in the poll were not disclosed the following people were among the participants: Bernard Baruch; Secretary of State James F. Byrnes; Marquis Childs, newspaper columnist; Gordon Clapp, general manager of TWA; Harold W. Dodds, president of Princeton University; Eric A. Johnston, former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce; Eugene Meyer, publisher of the Washington Post and head of the World Bank; Raymond Swing, radio commentator; Charles P. Taft of the State Department; Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Commerce; General Dwight Eisenhower, Army Chief of Staff; Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt; Assistant Secretary of State Will Clayton; Nelson Rockefeller; William S. Paley, president, Columbia Broadcasting System; former President Herbert Hoover; Walter Lippmann, newspaper columnist; and Justice Wiley Rutledge of the United States Supreme Court.

Each member of the panel received a nomination ballot from the university on which he was asked to place his first three choices for the honorary degree with his reasons for the selections. The nominations became the basis for a recommendation for the award to the board of trustees by the faculty of the university's school of social sciences and public affairs. The degree is awarded annually.

The citation accompanying the degree said of Bowles: "Citizen in the emergency service of his Government; life-long advocate of the American way of life defined as a national neighborhood producing more and more goods and services of better and better quality for more and more people at lower and lower prices in a free and expanding market economy; believer in full employment and high-level production achieved by an ever-higher standard of living, the product of American scientific skill, industrial competence, labor efficiency, and commonness of purpose; administrator of his Government's purpose to maintain under the stress of world disorder domestic stability and economic fair play; symbol of a national desire to bridge greed amid the confusion of circumstances and to avoid selfish advantage amid the misfortunes of a world; executive, factual in controversy, informative in dispute, strenuous in the achievements of objectives; New England Yankee convinced of the American destiny, guided by moral purpose and of a tomorrow without fear."

Bowles was born on April 5, 1901, in Springfield, Mass., where his family has been identified with New England public life for the last hundred years. His grandfather was Samuel Bowles, famous Civil War editor and founder of the Springfield Republican.

Increasing Demand Shown for Repeal of Regulation W

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, from time to time I have made speeches and inserted my remarks into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the subject of consumer credit and regulation W.

As times goes on, there is increasing sentiment throughout the country for the elimination of this vicious regulation, which discriminates against the veterans and people of small means. Just recently the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel published editorials on the subject.

I ask permission to insert these into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because of their timeliness. The first editorial which was published in the issue of July 6 is entitled "Soaking the Poor," and the second in the issue of July 15 is entitled "Consumer Credit." The articles are as follows:

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of July 6, 1946]

SOAKING THE POOR

It is doubtful if 1 person in 100—and probably not more than 1 in 500—knows what is meant by regulation W.

Even so, every person who has negotiated a little personal loan at this bank or individual loan company in the last 5 years or so has run smack into this device, even though he didn't know the name of it.

Regulation W is a dictum which was drawn up by the Federal Reserve System, under a Presidential Executive order, to tighten up credit and thus prevent the pressure of high wartime incomes on a dwindling supply of goods.

You could borrow money for certain specific things—paying the doctor or dentist, paying funeral expenses, paying taxes, etc. You could not legally, however, borrow money to buy what was called "listed articles." This roster of listed articles included most of the consumer goods normally on the market.

The regulation also shortened the period of time payments permissible on certain items purchased on the installment plan.

To some extent, credit was tightened up and a certain number of persons were discouraged from borrowing to purchase new washing machines, ironers, refrigerators, etc.

Now that the war is long over, and when a reasonable expansion of credit, along with increased production of goods would be of inestimable help to millions, the Federal Reserve System has amended regulation W—not to loosen up credit, but to make it tighter.

For one thing, the amendment removes the restrictions from installment sales of listed articles, when the amount of the credit is in excess of $1,500. This means simply that the wealthy man doesn't need to worry about regulation W. He may buy an expensive car without restrictions on the extension of credit. But the average man still is hamstrung by the wartime regulation.

The amendment further removes some luxury items, such as attic ventilating fans, from the list subject to regulation, and adds on some which people of the middle economic class are thinking of buying—such as kitchen units incorporating dishwashers, ironers, refrigerators, or washing machines.

Also, the amendment requires the person borrowing money for educational, medical, hospital, dental, or funeral expenses, to tell how much he is to pay on such bills, and requires him to give the names and addresses of the persons to whom the payments are to be made. Moreover, he must pay the amounts he specifies in his loan.

This latter provision, of course, came about because John Doe, when he went to borrow money, discovered he could buy things with money borrowed for doctor expenses. There was no way of checking up to see if he used it for the purpose listed on his application.

The reasons for the Federal Reserve System's move in loosening credit restrictions on luxury items and keeping them tight on consumer goods are simple enough to see through.

The market is flooded with luxury items of all kinds, but the New Deal planners have succeeded in removing most consumer goods from the market. The Federal Reserve, if it now loosened the reins on consumer credit, would simply create that much more money pressure on a dribble of goods, and call the attention of more and more people to the fact that Government policies have created unprecedented scarcities of the things people need and want.

As a matter of fact, until the supply of available goods is increased enormously over what it now is, the restrictions on credit won't work much hardship on anyone.

The vicious thing about the new amendment to regulation W is that it completely removes restrictions on costly goods to be purchased by the wealthy, while discriminating against the man of moderate income. The rich man can now buy a $2,000 car, without restrictions on credit, but the middle class man still must hew to the line with payments financed only for 1 year, on his moderate-priced car—and his note can't be "ballooned" at the end of that time, either.

The wealthy man can buy his attic ventilating fan, but Mr. Average Man can't buy his wife a washer or ironer without paying one-third down, and the remainder in a year's time.

Right now, with the supply of consumer goods practically nil, the amendment to regulation W won't be so noticeable. But the Federal Reserve said nothing about its being a temporary expedient, and it is safe to assume the amendment is intended to be a permanent one, unless pressure forces a retraction. As soon as the supply of things people want becomes near normal, every person who needs credit, and every banker who wants to extend credit, ought to send up an incessant howl of protest until the unfair and discriminatory amendment to regulation W is thrown out.

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of July 15, 1946]

CONSUMER CREDIT

In a discussion of consumer credit, Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN, of Minnesota, recently brought out some pertinent facts and some ideas that to us at least were new.

Congressman HAGEN's remarks, originally made at the annual Institute of Industrial Banking, have been reprinted in the Industrial Banker, official publication of the AIBA.

Mr. HAGEN pointed out the inequities involved in the Federal Reserve's amendment 20 to regulation W, which favors wealthier persons and discriminates against those of modest income.

Regulation W is a Federal Reserve edict, placed in effect early in the war, to restrict credit extension, time payments, "ballooning" of notes, etc.

"I do not care," said he, "what the reason may be that millions of our families do not have as much as other millions, but I say that it is fundamentally the duty of the United States to realize * * * that these people with small incomes and smaller cash resources are just as much Americans as the other group better situated financially. * * *

"Ridiculous * * * it is to assume that a washing machine should go first to the rich woman * * *."

Another and highly important point made by Congressman HAGEN was this:

"The credit of the American family is actually a possession—it is not a gift of government or business. It is as much a man's property as his home, his farm. * * * Consumer credit is a tool * * * by which the great machinery of distribution in this country is enabled to gear itself so that many millions of American families may be able to acquire the things our factories produce. * * * It was the advent of the credit customer which made possible the belt-line production for which we are famous."

An idea of Mr. HAGEN's which struck us as new, and yet containing much simple logic, was this: A man forced to pay cash for a car which he intends to drive for 3 or 4 years, is being forced to pay in advance for transportation that he will have over a considerable period of time in the future.

"I say to you," Mr. HAGEN declared, "that when a workingman's family buys a refrigerator and pays one-third down on its price, this family has actually paid in advance for the refrigeration it wants. * * *

"As a matter of fact, when this family pays in full, in 2 years, for a 15-year refrigerator, it has advanced credit to America's economic system to the extent equal to more than seven times the speed with which the family uses up what the economic system has provided. The family that pays for a refrigerator in 2 years has advanced 13 years' credit to American business, production, and banking.

"Let us stop this erroneous thinking about credit as some sort of a favor which either business or Government can decide is good or bad for the American people. The fact is, if the people generally cannot be persuaded to offer the use of their credit to our economy, the great factories * * * will operate much more slowly, employ many fewer people."

That, it seems to us, is a good point. Just as many people find it impossible to get along without occasional credit, so the Nation's industries would find it difficult to get along without the people's extension of credit to the economic system.

It's something for the Government in general, and for the manipulators of credit regulations in particular, to think about.

Veterans Demand Surplus Materials for Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, our veterans have grown impatient with the ineffectual manner in which surplus materials are being handled, and their inability to obtain the use of the same for the construction of their homes, so badly needed.

If genuine service is to be rendered, as promised, these materials should be made available to the veterans. They have investigated thoroughly the conditions that prevail and the deplorable manner in which surplus materials are being frittered away for other purposes and not being channeled for use in the construction of veterans' homes. They do not hesitate to give us the benefit of their investigations. Congress has made adequate provisions for the handling of the problem, but the Federal bureaus seem to have utterly failed to carry out the expressed wishes of Congress, and their unpardonable delays and mismanagement have disappointed the veterans world without end.

I am pleased to quote the following resolution, with outlined suggestions and remedies, adopted by the Gen. Clarence L. Tinker Chapter 160, the Military Order of the Purple Heart, at Tulsa, Okla., under date of July 19, 1946:

"Whereas it has been announced that certain designated surplus military installations are to be dismantled, and it is calculated that 1,500,000,000 board feet of lumber and other essential materials will be available from these projects. The veteran and public have been led to believe that this surplus material will be disposed of to the veterans for their use in the construction of their homes. From the information which we are able to obtain there has been no method of channeling this surplus material to the veterans.

"We hereby—

"Resolve, That this surplus material must first be offered to the veteran through some manner in which the veteran will have an opportunity of obtaining this surplus material and to execute his or her HH ratings of certifications and to receive the materials which he or she is entitled to and in desperate need of in solving their housing problem: Be it further

"Resolved, That a true copy of our proposed method of channeling this surplus material be attached to this resolution and that the detailed proposed method be considered a part of this resolution. And that copies of this be sent to each duly elected Oklahoma Representative in Washington, D. C.; to the Office of the National Housing Expediter; to to Office of the War Assets Administration, Washington, D. C.; to the national service director and legislative chairman of the Military Order of the Purple Heart, Washington, D. C."

The above resolution unanimously voted and adopted by the membership of the Gen. Clarence L. Tinker Chapter 160 of the Military Order of the Purple Heart, of Tulsa, Okla., at a regular meeting this the 19th of July 1946.

ALFRED R. JARVIS,
Commander, General Clarence L. Tinker, Chapter 160.

Attest:

SAM W. HEDRICK,
Adjutant.

To assist the veteran in solving his or her housing problem at the earliest date possible, the following suggestions are offered relative to channeling the 1,500,000,000 board feet of lumber and other building materials which will be available when the surplus military installations are dismantled.

Granting that the surplus military installations which are to be dismantled have been designated, and that the prices of the material have been worked out, the next move would be to get this surplus material into the hands of the veteran for use in the construction of his or her home.

To accomplish the desired purpose of assisting the veteran in the shortest time possible toward solving the housing problem the various materials should go back into the channels which are qualified and already set up to handle same, for this method would speed up this program and overcome certain conflicts and much red tape.

1. Lumber, sash, doors, builders' hardware, etc., to be allocated to the lumber yards and material distributors.
2. Plumbing and similar items to be handled by the plumbing establishments.
3. Electrical equipment and kindred material by the electrical firms.
4. Heating plants by the heating companies.
5. Stoves and miscellaneous hardware by the hardware dealers.

And other items too numerous to mention but which are desperately needed by the veteran to be channeled back to their respective supplier so that the veteran will have an opportunity to purchase same.

To assist and see that this material and so forth reaches the veteran it is suggested that the recognized veterans' service organizations and the American War Dads throughout the Nation assist in their community in seeing that the veteran receives this material which he is entitled to receive.

Weichel Fights Bill Granting Merchant Sailors GI Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I am including some remarks covering proposed legislation for merchant seamen.

WEICHEL FIGHTS BILL GRANTING MERCHANT SAILORS GI BENEFITS

WASHINGTON, July 17.—A determined fight to prevent House action on legislation giving war veterans' benefits to merchant seamen appeared in prospect today.

Representative ALVIN F. WEICHEL, Republican, of Ohio, told a reporter that he would object to consideration of the measure on the ground that civilian sailors were not entitled to benefits won in combat by men in the armed forces.

Already approved by the House Merchant Marine Committee, the bill is before the Rules Committee, but WEICHEL delayed action by requesting time for opponents to be heard.

The Rules Committee has authority to recommend that bills be given the legislative right-of-way.

WEICHEL declared that it would be unfair to extend to merchant seamen the same rights as those who fought to save the country.

"Approximately 100,000 merchant sailors were under 26 years of age," WEICHEL said. "They were exempted from military service in order to enter the merchant marine. Average gross income was over $2,500 annually, while men in combat received as little as $60 a month."

"Merchant seamen," WEICHEL said, "had a risky job, but they were well paid."

He estimated that the legislation, proposing to give civilian sailors educational, financial, and other benefits of the GI bill of rights would cost $116,000,000.

Reorganization of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks and include certain editorials with respect to the legislative reorganization bill which passed the House last week:

[From the Washington Post of July 30, 1946]

COMMUNICATION

REORGANIZATION ACHIEVEMENT

Passage last week of the Legislative Reorganization Act was an epochal forward step toward congressional self-improvement. Upsetting the pessimistic predictions of Capitol Hill dopesters, Congress has accomplished a legislative miracle. In one courageous leap our National Legislature has jumped the hurdles of timidity, inertia, and vested interest and approved modernization of much of its antiquated machinery and methods.

Responding to the Nation-wide demand for action at this session, the Senate on June 10 and the House of Representatives on July 25 have adopted 80 percent of the comprehensive reform program recommended last March by their own Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress. This is a great victory for better government in America. It will go far to renew popular faith in the capacity of our representative democracy to handle the problems of the postwar world.

Consider what has been achieved. Congress has reformed its obsolete committee system, reducing 81 little legislatures to 34, eliminating at one swoop its inactive committees which have been merely ornamental barnacles on the ship of state, consolidating those with overlapping jurisdictions, and creating twin committees organized functionally in both Houses and correlated with the major areas of public policy and administration. It has voted to equip its reorganized committees with independent, qualified experts to aid them in wise law making and more effective oversight of the execution of the laws. It has strengthened the research and legal facilities of its Legislative Reference Service and its Legislative Counsel.

Because of the growing heavy volume of legislative business, it has decided to divest itself of the settlement of private claims and pensions, bridge bills, and other private and local legislation by delegating them to appropriate administrative and judicial agencies.

Beset by swarms of lobbyists whose importunities distort public opinion and make it difficult to ascertain the majority will, Congress has concluded that persons principally engaged in seeking to influence legislation should register and make full disclosure of their membership, receipts, and expenditures.

With a view to strengthening congressional control of Federal expenditures, a legislative budget has been authorized that will furnish a coordinated picture of income and outgo; the legislative phase of the budget process has been improved; expenditure analyses by the Comptroller General have been authorized to enable Congress to determine whether public funds have been economically and efficiently expended.

Moreover, committee procedures as regards hearings, meetings, and records are to be regularized. Fixed adjournment of Congress at the end of July each year will permit members to keep in closer touch with their constituencies. And higher salaries and retirement allowances on a contributory basis will not only enable Congressmen to make ends meet and feel more secure and independent, but should also improve the personnel of our national parliament. All the adopted changes will cost less than $5,000,000 a year, which surely is a modest price to pay for increased efficiency on Capitol Hill.

It will be generally agreed, I think, that the adoption of these sweeping changes in one act adds up to an impressive achievement. It was a large dose for Congress to swallow at once. Several important reforms remain to be won in future sessions. They include the creation of majority and minority policy committees to plan and coordinate the legislative program and strengthen party responsibility; a joint legislative-executive council to promote better teamwork between Congress and the President; measures to enforce the legislative budget which has little more than moral force in its present form; authority to appoint executive assistants to Senators and Representatives who need them to reduce the burden of errand-running; selection of committee chairmen by some better method than the seniority custom; stronger safeguards against Senate filibusters; and the control of obstruction in the Lower Chamber. The fight for these additional reforms will be resumed in the Eightieth Congress.

Congressional reform has been a cooperative undertaking. Many persons inside and outside Congress have contributed to the gains that have already been achieved. The late Senator Maloney of Connecticut was a prime mover in the cause, falling victim to the very conditions of overwork he was seeking to remedy. Chief credit rightfully belongs to Senator LA FOLLETTE, chairman, and Representative MONRONEY, vice chairman, of the joint committee which produced the reform legislation. Their skillful craftsmanship and masterly management of the floor debate on the bill were crucial to victory. Valiant work behind the scenes was done by the other members of the joint committee: Senators WHITE, THOMAS, PEPPER, RUSSELL, and BROOKS; and Congressmen DIRKSEN, LANE, MICHENER, PLUMLEY, and COX. Senator WHITE and Representative DIRKSEN were towers of strength in floor debate. Grateful thanks are also due the majority leaders in both Houses who gave the bill its chance on the floor, to the 86 Senators and Representatives who testified and offered helpful suggestions, to Senate Legislative Counsels Rice and Boots for indispensable advice, and to the many other nameless officers and employees of Congress who helped in various ways.

Outside Congress many groups and individuals, regarding representative government as the bulwark of democracy, gave powerful support to the movement. Since 1941 the Committee on Congress of the American Political Science Association has been a spearhead of legislative reorganization efforts. The League of Women Voters rates it as one of the foremost domestic needs of the Nation. The National Planning Association made a major contribution through its publication and wide distribution of the Heller report on strengthening the Congress. Scores of interested private citizens appeared before the committee or submitted written suggestions. Business, labor, and farm groups have urged congressional reorganization. And upward of 400 leading newspapers and magazines covering every State in the Union put their editorial weight behind the movement. Outstanding among them was the Washington Post to which we owe a debt of special gratitude for its wonderful reporting and editorial support.

To all who helped in this great cause I extend heartiest thanks.

GEORGE B. GALLOWAY,
Chairman, Committee on Congress, American Political Science Association.
WASHINGTON.

[From the Washington Post of July 30, 1946]

UNSNARLING CONGRESS

Congratulations are the due of Congress for streamlining its creaking and groaning machinery. It is, as Mr. Galloway says, a miracle that such a seven-league step has been taken in the reorganization of Congress. All through the war Congress refused to follow the lead of the country and undergo reconversion in the interest of efficient operation. At the opening of the Seventy-ninth Congress none could have foreshadowed action before adjournment. The cake of custom, as Bagehot calls it, is the greatest bane of improvement. Institutions get fixed in a mold, vested interests are built up around the status quo, and a mental inflexibility imposes its own barrier to change. Yet the environment in which Congress has to work is in a state of constant flux as a result of a combination of circumstances. The rapid speeding up in the tempo of life affects the work of Congress no less than our general habits. Along with the other organs of government, Congress, which used to keep hands off the workaday activities of the citizenry, has become almost the fulcrum of our economic life. But the imperative of a streamlining of legislative procedure has been supplied by the situation of the United States at the very summit of the world. All nations waited breathlessly upon the protracted and dilatory decisions of Congress in the matter of the credit to Britain and the enactment of a new OPA.

Congress, to be sure, might have been less acquiescent in self-improvement but for the sweetener contained in the pay increase. The legislators, after all, are human. But the fact is that the hike in the remuneration of our legislators is an integral part of the modernization of Congress. They are underpaid in terms of their responsibilities and commitments. There will be a $2,500 rise, with an extra $2,500, tax free, for expenses, together with retirement privileges. The boost, incidentally, will put Congress in better mood to put up salaries in the executive branch for our high operating officials. The hemorrhage of public servants out of the Government has become dangerous to good administration. We are sure Congress recognizes this. With legislative salaries adjusted, it should now see that the hemorrhage is stopped. It is caused for no other reason than that the officials can no longer afford to work for the Government. In this connection we commend to the legislators an article called "False Economy in Government," which Mr. John J. Corson has contributed to the American Mercury. The argument in that article for the lifting of the ceiling on executives' salaries from $10,000 to $15,000 is authoritative and compelling. A last-minute effort by Chairman DOWNEY of the Senate Civil Service Committee is under way to make this improvement.

The heart of congressional reorganization—80 percent, it is said, of the La Follette-Monroney recommendations—is the revamping of the archaic and, indeed, unworkable system of standing committees. Like Topsy, these committees have just "growed," with the result that they overlap in the same problem areas, as in public land problems and in the rules and administration of the Senate. In other cases they are competitive, as in the case of transport. The new reorganization halves the standing committees in the Senate and makes the House content with a third of its standing committees. The gain in the conduct of public business will be immeasurable. Not only will the new committees represent the principal provinces of public policy, they will be able to function correlatively as between the two Chambers. This reform would have been completed by a provision for policy committees that would enable Congress to chart its legislative course. Stricken out as a result of House resistance, this will be one of the companion measures left for reformers of Government to prosecute. With the valiant generalship of Senator LA FOLLETTE and Representative MONRONEY, they have helped to make the Seventy-ninth Congress memorable, and in the future there should be fewer of those snarls in Congress which have recently been productive of jeremiads about the imminence of a constitutional crisis.

The Cancer Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that it was necessary for me to leave Washington Friday evening, July 26. Circumstances at home compelled my leaving Washington.

During my absence on Saturday, July 27, the bill (H. R. 4502) for the mobilization of the world's cancer experts was brought up under suspension of rules but failed of passage.

Millions of dollars have been appropriated and spent during this session of Congress. More than the amount involved in this particular legislation was recently spent in connection with the atomic bomb at Bikini. That, of course, may be money well spent, however, the appropriation of money to provide research for the prevention and cure of cancer is something which strikes all of us, as was so well pointed out by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. Approximately 480 of our fellow human beings in the United States die of cancer every 24 hours. It seems to me that the expenditure of $100,000,000 is small indeed if the expenditure will result in the saving of lives and the elimination of human suffering.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the very first order of business in the Eightieth Congress will be the introduction and calling up of a new bill incorporating the provisions of H. R. 4502, and that it will pass overwhelmingly.

Miscellaneous Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, it has been a pleasure to work with the other members of the committee, the representatives of veterans' organizations, and officials of the Veterans' Administration in enacting into law many ideas for the benefit of the veterans of this Nation. Only time will tell how good our work has been.

The major legislative measures—the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, liberalization of the National Service Life Insurance Act, and increases in compensation and pension to veterans and their dependents, have been explained. In this concluding insertion, attention of the veterans and their families is called to many miscellaneous matters with which they may be concerned:

MISCELLANEOUS BENEFITS

TERMINAL LEAVE

Under legislation now under consideration authority is granted for the payment to men and women in the armed services of World War II, below the commissioned ranks, an amount equal to pay at their grade when discharged, for accumulated leave. Application will be made to the service (Army or Navy) in which the veteran served.

CIVIL SERVICE PREFERENCE

A veteran who served in time of war who was honorably separated from the service will, upon establishing his status with the Civil Service Commission, be entitled to a 5-point rating preference on civil-service examinations. If he (or she) is suffering a service connected disability this would be increased to 10 points on civil-service grades. This same 10-point preference is allowable to the wife of an honorably discharged service connected disabled veteran who is himself unable to qualify; and also to the unremarried widow of an honorably discharged deceased veteran who served in any branch of the armed forces during a war.

There is in addition preferential consideration on the eligible list for appointment, and also of retention in case of a reduction in force.

DOMICILIARY CARE

A veteran, discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, who is suffering from a disability, disease, or defect, which is chronic and not likely to be curable or to be improved by hospital care, and which makes it impossible for him to earn a livelihood, will, under certain conditions, be eligible for admission to a Veterans' Administration home for domiciliary care.

BURIAL ALLOWANCE

The Government, through the Veterans' Administration, will pay up to $150—recently increased—to cover the expense of burial, funeral services, and transportation of the remains, of a deceased veteran. This allowance is available to the undertaker or to the person who pays the bill for the funeral expenses. Application must be made within 2 years after the veteran's death.

BURIAL FLAG

An American flag, with which to drape the casket of any honorably discharged veteran of any war, may be issued on application by relatives or undertakers to postmasters at any county seat post office or any other post office designated by the Veterans' Administration, or any field office of the Veterans' Administration. The flag will be given to the next of kin after the burial. Flags may also be issued by the above agencies in the case of any person who has died while in the military or naval service between May 27, 1941, and the termination of the present war.

GRAVE MARKER

A headstone, or a bronze marker, may be obtained for the grave of a veteran, which is unmarked, by making application to the Office of the Quartermaster General, Memorial Division, Washington, D. C. The applicant should designate the consignee to receive the headstone, and the engraved stone or marker will be delivered at Government expense at the destination shipping point. The setting of the stone or marker at the grave must be at private expense.

BURIAL IN NATIONAL CEMETERY

A veteran, honorably discharged from his last period of service, is eligible, upon request, to be buried in a national cemetery. Under recent revisions of the regulations his wife, minor children, and unmarried adult daughters may be buried with him in a national cemetery. A maximum of four grave sites may be assigned to one veteran, but there may be multiple burials in one or more of the graves. A national cemetery is located in this district at Fort Scott.

BURIAL OVERSEAS

More than 275,000 young Americans are sleeping in military cemeteries all over the world, each of them a carefully tended spot of beauty.

In the near future the next of kin of each of these will be asked to inform the Government of their wishes as to the transfer of the remains for reburial, with military honors, if desired, here at home. Reports are current that a few unscrupulous persons are offering to make the arrangements for the return of remains, for a fee. This is not necessary, and any person making such a proposal should be reported to the authorities.

Veterans' organizations, the Red Cross, and this office are ready to help the families of these departed heroes in this as well as all of their other problems, upon request.

SOCIAL SECURITY

A veteran, discharged under conditions other than dishonorable, who served 90 days or more after September 16, 1940, and prior to the date of the termination of World War II, or was released by reason of disability incurred or aggravated in service in line of duty, who dies within the period of 3 years immediately following his separation from service, shall be regarded, for social security purposes—

First, to have died a fully insured individual;

Second, to have earned an average monthly wage of not less than $160; and

Third, to have been paid not less than $200 of wages in each calendar year in which he had 30 days or more active service after September 16, 1940.

If, however, a pension or compensation is payable by the Veterans' Administration by reason of the death of such veteran, social security benefits will be determined without the benefit of this provision of the law.

SURPLUS PROPERTY

Any veteran of World War II, released under conditions other than dishonorable, is entitled to a priority, immediately after agencies of the Federal Government, to purchase surplus property through the War Assets Administration, either for his own personal use or for his business.

Application for priority certificates should be made to the certification officer in the regional office of the War Assets Administration, nearest the veteran's home or place of business. Any number of certificates may be received, but only one certificate for each type of article.

SUGGESTIONS

First. Preserve your discharge. Only one original will be issued. No duplicate is available. Immediately upon your return home—or now if you have not already done so—have a small photostat made to carry. Register the original with the Register of Deeds—there is no charge. Then place the original discharge in a place of safekeeping. If it is lost only a certificate in lieu can be obtained.

Second. Register with an employment-service office for a job. If you want the old job back, make a claim for it within 90 days after discharge, or after hospitalization not exceeding 1 year following discharge.

Third. Be proud of your service. Wear your discharge lapel button, which you got on discharge, or that of a veterans' organization.

Fourth. Join a veterans' organization—the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Purple Heart, if you are eligible, or some organization of World War II veterans. Take part in its activities. It will provide you association with men with a common interest for the rest of your life. And, incidentally, it will be an ever ready source of help in any problems involving veterans.

Fifth. If you need hospital care or medical treatment after discharge, get it when you need it. Do not put it off. That is one of the reasons for maintaining Veterans' Administration hospitals. You have earned it; you deserve it. Take advantage of it. Compensation in most cases is no longer reduced while hospitalized.

In every post of every veterans' organization and in the offices of the Red Cross you will find friends anxious to serve you when help is needed. Feel free to call upon them. Your Congressman, ERRETT

P. SCRIVNER, 316 Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., is always ready and willing to be of assistance.

A copy of this series of articles will be sent to any veteran or person in the service upon receipt of the name and address on a post card.

Strikes and Seizures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an article by Mark Sullivan, noted newspaperman, which appeared in the Washington Post on July 29, 1946:

STRIKES AND SEIZURES
(By Mark Sullivan)
A FATEFUL PRECEDENT

With increasing tension for several weeks, newsmen and others in Washington have watched for the outcome of a labor situation involving a novel condition and entailing a dramatic decision. In its simplest terms the question is, Will the Truman administration seize the struck plants of the Allis-Chalmers Co. and the J. I. Case Co.? The Case strike has lasted 8 months, since last December, the other 5 months, since last March. Both companies make agricultural machinery.

The striking unions (CIO) demand seizure, insistently. In this they are backed up by the Congress of Industrial Organizations as a whole. Their pressure on President Truman is illustrated by a formal resolution, "Resolved that the CIO national executive board calls upon the President of the United States and the Department of Labor to take immediate steps to seize these corporations."

Toward this demand the attitude of the Department of Labor seems one of willing agreement. Union leaders indeed interpret the Department and its Secretary as taking the union view of the issue and the union side of the controversy. Another resolution adopted by the CIO executive board reads, "Whereas Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach did on May 27 publicly proclaim Government intervention if the company did not bargain in good faith * * *." Sources sympathetic to CIO say that an order of seizure has been drafted in the Labor Department.

But only signature by President Truman can make such an order effective. And Mr. Truman is obviously reluctant. At press conferences he has denied that seizure of the plants is under consideration by him.

Union pressure for seizure is natural. Seizure is one way of winning a strike. This is illustrated in the case of the coal mines seized last May. After seizure, the administration conceded most of the union demands and made a contract with the union. The force of the situation thus created is such that owners of properties are more or less obliged to accept the status created by the administration. The purpose of the strike is attained. Mere threat of seizure or expectation of it serves the interests of labor leaders conducting strikes, gives them power and leverage as against management in bargaining.

If President Truman is reluctant to seize the Case and Allis-Chalmers plants, that too is understandable. Seizure involves, and if done must rest upon, an extraordinary assertion of power by the President. And such an assertion of power, at this time and under these circumstances, rests upon a legal fiction. This can be understood by reading some phrases of the order by which President Truman seized the soft-coal mines last May:

"Whereas * * * the coal produced by such mines is required for the war effort * * * the war effort will be unduly impeded * * * necessary to insure the operation of such mines in the interest of the war effort." Further, the President, in justifying seizure of the coal mines, cited two wartime statutes. Finally, he said he was acting "as President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy."

To assert that a step taken in May this year is done in the interest of "the war effort," when the war had ended 9 months before, is dubious enough. To make the same assertion a full year after the war ended, would be proportionately more dubious. The legal fiction is glaring.

Further than that, there is a fundamental distinction between seizure of the coal mines, and seizure of Allis-Chalmers and Case. In seizing the coal mines, the whole industry was seized. The administration can conduct a whole industry by simply imposing universal conditions upon it. But seizing Allis-Chalmers and Case would be seizing specific individual plants in a large industry. In this case the Government would be conducting plants in competition with other plants, involving intricate details of marketing and distribution.

Seizure at this time of Allis-Chalmers and Case, or any other plants in similar circumstances, would set a precedent for peacetime, for it is peacetime we are now in. The legal fiction of reliance upon Presidential wartime powers would evaporate.

It would be a precedent also for a new way of handling labor disputes, and make irrelevant all the discussion about new laws to deal with labor relations. The process set up by seizure of Allis-Chalmers and Case as a precedent would be a sequence: A strike, stalemate in labor-management negotiations, Government seizure of the plant, a contract between Government and the union, return of the plant to its owners. Exercise of such absolute power by Government would supplant and destroy the existing processes of collective bargaining.

Letter From Committee for a Just Peace With Italy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter:

COMMITTEE FOR A JUST
PEACE WITH ITALY, INC.,
New York, N. Y., April 15, 1946.

Hon. JOHN J. ROONEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROONEY: This is to acknowledge receipt, with thanks, of your telegram of the 13th inst. advising us that on that date you spoke on the floor of the House in favor of a just peace with Italy in accordance with the published declaration of this committee. Also of your letter of even date supplementing your telegram and enclosing Secretary of State James F. Byrnes' letter to you.

The major members of our committee have asked me to convey to you their hearty congratulations for your speech, and their deep appreciation of your activity in behalf of our just cause. I would personally like to add my own feeling of gratification. With best regards I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH DI FEDE,
Executive Secretary.

Bellamy Praises Clark's Progress in Relieving Sorry Austria's Plight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the twelfth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

Gen. Mark W. Clark runs a good show in Austria. Austria is nowhere near as big, tough or important a job as Germany, and Mark Clark does not have the problems which confront General McNarney and General Clay, but there is no doubt about it that Mark Clark has a flair for power.

His cabinet seemed to know its business. His MP's were smartly accoutered, well-disciplined, and his quarters were at least as livable as any others. His entertainment was of the best.

But the Austria over which he presides is a pretty sorry nation.

Anyone who visited Vienna between the two wars was conscious of the fact that it was a dying city then. It was built to be the capital of the Austria-Hungarian Empire of 50,000,000 persons, and by the Treaty of Versailles it had been stripped of its workshops which were in old Bohemia, then set up as the Czechoslovakian state, and had been stripped of its agricultural wealth by the setting up of Hungary as a separate state.

There were left in Austria only seven or eight million—I do not have the exact figures. Vienna had the wholesale machinery to dispose of the products of an empire, and no produce to dispose of. It had the banking system for an empire and no customers. It had vast palaces and lovely hotels, beautiful art galleries, and a splendid opera, and nobody to fill or patronize these relics of the past. It was a creepy place even before the war, and now it is worse.

Hitler invaded Austria March 12, 1938, and her history was part and parcel of German history until November 1943, when the Soviet, the United Kingdom, and the United States agreed in the Moscow declaration that Austria, the first free country to fall the victim of Hitler aggression, should be liberated from German domination. They regarded the annexation imposed on Austria by Germany as null and void.

Since the day of that protocol the Allied policy of Austria has diverged sharply from that of Germany. The Austrian policy has been constructive, while that for Germany, as I have pointed out, has been in many ways destructive, and necessarily so.

Before the surrender of Germany it had been agreed that Austria would be occupied by the four victorious powers, each to have its own zone, but each to share in the occupation of Vienna. A final agreement was reached on this early in July 1945.

Vienna was actually captured from Germany by the Soviet armies on April 18, 1945. Early in May, the United States designated General Clark, United States Commissioner on the Allied Council of Austria.

BUSINESS AT STANDSTILL

The initial phase of the military government in Austria technically ended on VE-day, but it was necessary to continue a government for a few weeks until complete detachments could be placed in position and SHAEF could be furnished with key personnel to take over the work of coordinating the field.

When the first members of the United States Government staff arrived in Austria at the end of May they found a badly confused situation. Business and industry were at a complete standstill and postal, telephone, and telegraph services were cut off. Many of the rail lines were out of operation.

Road transportation was restricted to 6 kilometers from the place of residence. Food and fuel were critically short, as was housing.

There were a quarter of a million German prisoners in Austria. In the area occupied by the United States forces there were 700,000 alien displaced persons and 200,000 refugees superimposed on a normal population of 1,750,000—this is an area which never produced enough food for itself in normal times. Of course the schools were closed. The Nazi administration had collapsed and the Austrians were struggling to reorganize the civil government and maintain essential public services.

RATION INCREASED

By the third week in June the situation had greatly improved. The military government had started to take over. The French took control in the Tyrol. During the first week in August the United States forces headquarters moved from Italy to Salzburg and took control in Land Salzburg in upper Austria. The daily average ration had been increased from 700 to 1,300 calories.

After a number of conferences with Soviet officials during the summer of 1945 in Vienna, the United States, British, and French headquarters moved to Vienna late in August. Vienna was placed under quadripartite control September 1, and the Allied Council held its first full meeting on September 11.

The first outstanding accomplishment was the extension throughout the whole of Austria of the power of the provisional government set up by the Soviets under Dr. Renner in April 1945. This was authorized on November 20. The currency was converted from reichsmarks and Allied military schillings into Austrian national schillings on November 16, thus checking the danger of inflation.

On November 25, the Austrians held a free election for the national parliament. Approximately 93 percent of the registered vote was cast. The People's Party won a clear majority in seats in the parliament, with the Socialist Party second, and the Communist Party a poor third.

DR. RENNER IN CHARGE

The new Austrian Government was organized the week before Christmas, with Dr. Renner elected federal president and Engineer Figl of the People's Party federal chancellor.

Confronted in the first instance with more than 700,000 alien displaced persons, some 200,000 Austrian refugees and 250,000 prisoners of war, the Austrian Government, under the guidance of the Allied control body, has repatriated 494,000 of the non-Austrians. It now has 212,000 displaced persons of all kinds and some 28,000 prisoners. There have been no serious outbreaks of disease or unrest.

More than 12,000 Nazis have been arrested by the United States forces, and the difficult task of de-Nazification is now under way.

Recognizing that the Austrians themselves know far better than the Americans ever could who are the dangerous Nazis, the United States has turned over this job to them.

The foremost problem facing the Austrians today is food. The situation is bad. The Americans and the British have met their commitments on food. The French, hard pressed at home, met theirs only in part, in spite of the help which we have given them. The Soviets have met theirs after a fashion, in Vienna only. The people in the Soviet zone outside of Vienna have had to do the best they could with indigenous resources, because the Soviets took the position that they made no commitments to feed the people in their zone outside of Vienna.

On April 1 UNRRA took over the military stocks on hand and in the zone and on the way, and the Austrian Government is now distributing food on the basis of a normal ration of 1,200 calories per day, which is very short rations.

Austria has never been self-sufficient in food, especially bread grains. Effort is being made to get every possible acreage planted and practically all the seed for the United States zone has been secured, but fertilizer is woefully short. It is hoped to start production of nitrate fertilizer soon in the United States zone, but this depends on the coal supply.

SOME BOMB DAMAGE

Economically, the outstanding problem of our military government in Austria is, like that of our military government in Germany, to get the Soviet to accept a reasonable interpretation of the Potsdam agreement to secure freedom for the circulation of goods within Austria.

Outwardly, Vienna is much the same beautiful city it was before. There is some bomb damage, but, so far as I could see, to the more famous older landmarks.

We put up at the Bristol Hotel, which seemed as well run as ever, and if one could only get out of his mind the haunting look and the hungry, run-down appearance of the people, one might think again that he was in the Vienna of old, by the Blue Danube, listening to a Strauss waltz, but somehow or other, until the Austrians have enough food, the image will not come to life.

One cannot feel the same amount of wrath against the Austrians that he does against the Germans. The Austrians were dragged into the war by the Germans. They were not the main factors. And, although some people say that under a very affiable exterior your average Austrian is just as black hearted as the average Nazi, I cannot believe it.

Monopoly in Oil

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, particularly since it bears upon information inserted in the RECORD regarding certain members of the National Petroleum Council I am glad to insert the following editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times:

MONOPOLY IN OIL

Since the days of the original Standard Oil monopoly, the petroleum industry in this Nation has always had about it the strong taint of monopoly. With patent hoardings, restrictive drilling leases, pipe-line trusts, interlocking directorships, and other devices, one major company or another—and often a combination of many—has been running athwart the antitrust laws.

It comes as little of a surprise consequently that 37 of the 85 members of the new National Petroleum Council, which advises the Interior Department, should show up as having been involved in antitrust cases either as individuals or through association with defendant corporations. Only by passing something of a miracle could the Interior Department have managed to draw into the Council a representative of a major oil company not at least slightly brushed with the pitch of monopoly.

Yet the fact cannot stand in complete exculpation of the make-up of the advisory group. Neither can the fact that the Board will not, as Interior representatives point out, have anything directly to do with royalty rates or land-leasing regulations or drilling controls or any other Federal oil policy. If the Council is to be mere window dressing, totally useless, then there is, of course, no danger in it—but why under such circumstances have it at all? If its advice is to be taken as any kind of guide to action, it can, loaded so heavily with those already demonstrated to have trust-building inclinations, be an unhealthy influence.

There are evidences enough that the Government's oil control during the war, when the major-dominated Petroleum Industry Council and the Petroleum Administration for War under Standard Oil of California's Ralph K. Davies went swinging down the lane hand in hand, tended to dig deep trenches for the trust. Even if one grants that this policy was necessary for the duration, now that the crisis is happily over it would seem to be time to resume the battle against monopoly rather than to give it aid and comfort.

Bellamy Rates United States Kindest Conqueror

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the eleventh in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called a Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

The American soldier as a conqueror who stays to clean up the job is something new in the annals of mankind and, on the whole, he is a rather pleasant sight to behold.

There are some aspects of his conduct which probably irritate the Germans, but in the long run maybe it is good for the Germans to know that they have been licked. At least, I am sure that some of them need to know it.

For example, the higher commanders in all the American occupied zone are constantly bothered by the incredible speed at which the young American GI drives service cars, including jeeps, trucks, and passenger cars, along the autobahns and in the crooked streets of medieval German villages. Part of this is due to the sheer exuberance of youth and partly, I suspect, to a spirit of bravado, which may not be a very admirable characteristic, but is easily understandable.

I have seen American staff cars enter the narrow main street of a little German village at something more than a moderate pace. I have heard the driver blow his horn.

I have seen the Germans fleeing in all directions as if the plague was on them. I have seen dogs running for shelter, geese cackling, and some of the populace nearly fainting, but generally speaking, the drivers are so skillful that nobody gets hurt.

Now you may say this is a bad thing and ought to be stopped, and I think so, too, in its more extreme manifestations, but you can't make up an army in which all the drivers are content with 15 miles an hour.

CONQUERORS, BUT FRIENDLY

Furthermore, the American general as a conqueror is a rather agreeable person, and not too arrogant.

Our American commanders who were put in charge of the German occupied zone and in Austria found early in the game that they were expected to put up a certain amount of side in order to hold their own with the British, Russians, and French, and I agree with this.

They found in the early days, when they proceeded very modestly about their business, that there were loud complaints from their men, who found that if they moved into a city at the same time with the British, the British would show up with the best club for their officers' mess, the best quarter for their troops, the best food and the best wines, for the British are an old race and canny, and have been at this for a long time.

Furthermore, the conquered people, used as they are to measure worth by outward trappings, thought very little of the homespun, hair-shirted type of American commander and paid very much less attention to his orders than to those of a general who was equipped with some of the panoply of war when he went abroad.

It has been the custom of conquering armies for many years to requisition the best houses, including palaces, for their own use. This has been done by our Army, as well as by the other occupying armies in Europe. In fact, there is many a noble edifice now occupied by an American officer whose former Nazi owner is living in the stable, doing menial work.

CENTER OF SOCIAL LIFE

Furthermore, it is quite natural that the headquarters of commanding officers, American as well as those of other occupying armies in Germany, should be the center of social life in the town.

I do not mean to convey the impression that our American generals are living like Roman pro consuls, but, on the other hand, I think the American people will be proud to know that they have taken their place in the world at last and recognize that manners and appearances are almost as important in international affairs as argument and dialectics.

I shall never forget, nor will any of the party, the very pleasant time we had in a German city at the home of the commanding officer of the American Army there. He had obtained the services of three German musicians who played most beautifully some of the music we have loved all our lives. There was nothing ostentatious about it. It was good sound Americanism translated into the heart of Germany.

I must repeat, even to the point of tiresomeness, the necessity which I feel of Americans adapting themselves to the ways of the world, if they are going to be world actors.

I have spoken of the British and their facility in this sort of thing. I suppose I saw 20 British generals, from brigadier up to lieutenant general, each one of whom was an exact replica of that perfect major general described in The Pirates of Penzance, down to swagger stick and monocle.

AN OFFICER OF CONSEQUENCE

When they go abroad everyone knows that a person of consequence is passing by. They are urbane, very cosmopolitan, and they know their way around the broad highways and the alleys of the world.

Incidentally, if I said to one of my newly made British friends in the army and civil life, I said to a hundred that I wished the British would change their attitude toward the Americans. I said it would help a good deal in welding that alliance which I believe must be eternal between the two main branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. I said to my British friends that I would not be offensive and say that America was now the senior partner in this two-way deal, although there was plenty of reason for contending this, both on the ground of manpower and on the ground of money and resources. I would at least maintain that, by the great horn spoon, we were equal partners and that the British would do well to quit treating us like fractious children, just readmitted to the drawing room after a childish scrape entitled "the Battle of Yorktown."

To a man they said they thought I was right, but they despaired of doing anything about it with this generation of higher British military officers.

Veterans' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER B. HUBER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, during my term in Congress, nothing has afforded me as much gratification as the privilege of serving as a member of the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

My appointment to this important committee has had special significance for me—as well as for the veterans in my home district—because it is the first time in history that a Representative in Congress from the Fourteenth District in Ohio has been a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Membership on the committee has brought me into close contact with the various veterans' organizations: the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, American Veterans of World War II, the American Veterans' Committee, and others. Through constant association with the representatives of these organizations, as well as with some of the rank and file, I have become familiar with the needs and viewpoints of veterans. I know how they feel not only about matters which affect them directly as veterans but also about broader issues.

As a nation we can never fully compensate veterans for the sacrifices they endured in two terrible and bloody wars. But we must certainly do everything in our power to make the recompense as complete as possible.

The Veterans' Committee has worked earnestly during this session of Congress to achieve that objective. The American veteran and his dependents now enjoy a series of benefits far more substantial than those granted after the First World War, and greater than those provided to veterans by any other nation in the world.

Disability compensation rates have been increased so that they now amount to as much as $300 a month in the case of the more serious types of disability. A bill to increase disability compensation and pension rates for World War I and II cases by 20 percent has passed the House and Senate and now awaits Presidential action.

The medical services available to veterans have been increased and greatly improved.

Under the GI bill of rights veterans now enjoy very substantial educational benefits. Nearly a million of them are now going to college, or are receiving other advanced training, at Government expense.

Provision has been made for special vocational training of veterans whose disabilities constitute a handicap in getting a job. More than 92,000 such veterans are now being taught special skills and work methods to help them overcome their handicaps and find useful work at good wages.

Approximately 3,000 recognized veterans' information centers, more than 2,800 itinerant information centers, and almost 1,800 USES local employment offices have been set up in various parts of the country to assist veterans in finding employment. For those who do not succeed in readily finding a suitable job, substantial unemployment allowances have been provided. At any time within 2 years after discharge the unemployed veteran will be paid $20 per week unemployment compensation for a maximum period of 52 weeks. Veterans who go into business for themselves are guaranteed earnings of $100 a month for a period up to 52 weeks.

Real estate, farm, and business loans have also been made available to veterans so that they might purchase homes or farms, or get started in business.

The Veterans' Administration has been thoroughly reorganized in the interest of greater efficiency and better service. Under the able leadership of General Omar N. Bradley the organization has been streamlined and much red tape has been eliminated.

Nowhere have the improvements been more evident than in the medical branch of the Veterans' Administration. During the war, I was appointed a subcommittee of one to investigate conditions in veterans' hospitals throughout the northeastern area of the United States. What I saw convinced me that there were many things wrong with the way the medical program was being carried out.

These injustices and inefficiencies have now been corrected. Veterans' hospitals now have but one aim—to provide the highest quality of medical care. Top-ranking physicians, surgeons, and specialists are participating in the care of veterans, whereas before they were reluctant to have anything to do with the program. Leading medical schools and research institutions have opened their doors to staff doctors of the Veterans' Administration, so that these doctors are now able to keep abreast of the latest medical developments.

It has been a source of real satisfaction to me to be able to play a part in the achievement of these and other improvements in the veterans' program. As long as I am in Congress I shall continue to exert every effort to see that veterans are granted the recognition and special consideration which they so richly deserve.

Collective Bargaining Principle Abused

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, collective bargaining was designed to reduce industrial conflict and has always been considered as an aid to the workingman. In the rise of power of labor unions we now find that a few of the organizations are abusing a right conferred upon them by law. Mr. Frank R. Kent, well known newswriter, throws considerable light on this situation in his article which appeared in the Evening Star for July 29. He cites actual instances of an abuse that eventually must stop. I insert the article by Mr. Kent:

PRINCIPLE OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING ABUSED IN ALLIS-CHALMERS STRIKE

The principle of collective bargaining is one to which every enlightened employer subscribes and every labor leader and left-wing demagog proclaims as sacred. Of course, it is not sacred, but it is a sound idea and no fair-minded man wants to break it down. Distinctly it is in the national interest to guard and retain it.

That is why it is particularly shocking that there should be collusion between a labor union and any Government agency to abrogate and suspend its normal processes. Yet that is exactly what is now charged by the company in the Allis-Chalmers strike which has been going on for nearly 5 months and in which are involved some 29,000 men. It is a serious thing when the Government, abandoning its traditional role of even-handed justice, becomes the ardent partisan of either side in an industrial labor dispute.

It is such a serious departure from the position which the Government is supposed to assume and so clearly in conflict with any elemental concept of fairness that the average citizen is justified in resentment. For 13 years under the late Mr. Roosevelt the Government weight was always on the labor side. In every dispute between industry and labor the administation assumed the former right and the latter wrong.

HELD HOPES FOR TRUMAN

Though Mr. Truman felt himself obligated to adopt Mr. Roosevelt's policies, it had been hoped he would not permit the Government to be used to enforce union demands regardless of the interests of the public or the rights of the employers.

Perhaps Mr. Truman does not know it. But if the Allis-Chalmers charges are true—and the facts seem to sustain them—in the current strike the Government and the union are acting together and the collective bargaining principle is shoved aside because the unions believe they can get greater concessions through Government seizure of the plants. In this case it is the company which is urging collective bargaining and the union which is avoiding and evading it. The company offered the union the 18½-cent-an-hour wage increase approved by the Government before the strike was called. It has made numerous other proposals on other issues since, but it cannot get the union to sit down across the table for the purposes of collective bargaining on these.

"The union bosses," declares the company, "are not interested in bargaining. Instead, they stall and stall and stall, attempt to break off negotiations—stall and try to break off negotiations again. All in the hope of forcing Government seizure of our plants—all in the hope of gaining from Government sources advantages they never could obtain through the lawful and fair processes of real collective bargaining."

LABOR BUREAU AID CHARGED

And then the company makes this direct charge: "They are abetted in this by their fellow CIO aides in the Labor Department." In other words, former CIO officials now holding key posts in the Labor Department have steadily encouraged the unions to hold out until the President seizes the plants. Then the unions would get everything they ask, including the closed shop, which is the main point at issue now. Naturally, the union leaders deny they are stalling and insist the company's efforts to negotiate are a lame pretense. However, the report that the Government was about to take over has appeared in print a number of times. The company asserts that these reports were inspired by Labor Department spokesmen supposed to be acting as mediators and that they directly encourage the strikers not to bargain.

At a White House press conference on June 14, Mr. Truman was asked about these reports and replied that seizure was not planned and he expected the company and workers to get together. Two days later another report, known to have come from the Labor Department, insisted that seizure would take place. Since then these negotiations have been almost at a standstill. On July 19, the CIO executive board in Washington requested President Truman and the Labor Department to "take immediate steps" to seize nine plants of the Allis-Chalmers Co. "in the interests of producing farm implements." And the violent young Mr. Reuther now threatens to extend this strike to the whole farm-implement industry if the Government does not "take over."

NO ACTION TAKEN

As yet the President has taken no action, though it is clear the Labor Department backs the CIO demands. What this all amounts to is this: Instead of adopting the prescribed method of collective bargaining, these striking unions deliberately toss that "sacred principle" overboard and concentrate upon forcing Government seizure of the property.

Between them, the unions and the Government make a joke of collective bargaining. Between them, they are promoting the sneaking development of nationalization which is an avowed goal of the Communists. This kind of collusion is offensive to any sense of fair play. It is degrading and un-American. It can be justified only in case of a great national emergency such as distinctly does not exist in the present strike. It is vital that the American people should understand that these professional labor bosses no longer are interested in the collective bargaining about which they have been beating their breasts so long. Nowadays their prime objective is to force governmental seizure. No surer way of breaking down the American system of private enterprise could be devised.

Congressional Salary Increase

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK L. CHELF
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Louisville Courier-Journal:

THE CONGRESSIONAL RAISE IN PAY IS MODERATE

The congressional reorganization bill which has been adopted provides not for thoroughgoing reform but for reform nonetheless. A drastic reduction in the number of standing committees, delegation of action on minor claims, pensions, and local bills to appropriate executive agencies, and various other procedural changes should make the congressional machinery operate less creakily than in the past. Left untouched, unfortunately are the seniority system in the selection of committee chairman and the Senate rules which make filibustering easy.

That part of the bill which increases the Members' salaries and makes them eligible to enter the Federal pension system is the part that makes the headlines. It is also the part, we may be sure, that makes the boys uneasiest. The fact that they adopted it at all in an election year is sufficient evidence of their desperate plight. Their $10,000-a-year salaries, reduced to a little more than $8,000 by Federal income tax, are painfully inadequate. They have been the same since 1925, in spite of enormous increases in the Members' responsibilities, in the length of sessions, in the cost of living, and also, incidentally, in taxes. (In 1925, the Federal income tax collector's bite out of $10,000 was $220; in 1936, it was $260; in 1945, it was $1,915.)

The increase proposed—to $12,500 plus a $2,500 tax-free expense allowance—is moderate. Disinterested students of government have recommended a higher figure—some as high as $25,000. As a matter of fact, the figure agreed upon by Congress is probably not really adequate, in view of the extraordinary expenses which accompany the office. But perhaps at the new pay scale Congress will lose fewer first raters than it has lost in the past out of sheer personal economic necessity. And perhaps eligibility for pensions will diminish the pathetic as well as costly spectacle of aging Members clinging to their seats past their dotage because the alternative is the poorhouse.

Surplus Military Installation Materials Must Be Channeled To Meet Veterans' Needs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am just in receipt of a copy of a resolution adopted by the Joe Carson Post, No. 1, American Legion, Tulsa, Okla., at its meeting July 16, 1946, suggesting a practical way in which surplus materials obtained and to be obtained from surplus military installations which are being dismantled, can and should be channeled in order that the same may go into the construction of veterans' homes, so badly needed.

If these practical suggestions are followed, we can reasonably expect to provide the necessary homes for our veterans, or at least a large proportion of them, within a comparatively short time. But if the present do nothing or do as little as possible policies of the administration are continued, the acts passed by Congress creating ample authority to make homes available for veterans expeditiously, will have been in vain.

In order that my colleagues may know the attitude and the thinking of the veterans and have the benefit of their feasible suggestions, I am pleased to quote the resolutions above referred to, together with supplemental concrete suggestions, as follows:

"Whereas it has been announced that certain designated surplus military installations are to be dismantled, and it is calculated that 1,500,000,000 board feet of lumber and other essential materials will be available from these projects. The veterans and public have been lead to believe that this surplus material will be disposed of to the veterans for their use in the construction of their homes. From the information which we are able to obtain there has been no method of channeling this surplus material to the veteran: We hereby

"Resolve, That this surplus material must first be offered to the veteran through some manner in which the veteran will have an opportunity of obtaining this surplus material and to execute his or her HH ratings of certifications and to receive the materials which he or she is entitled to and in desperate need of in solving their housing problem. be it further

"Resolved, That a true copy of our proposed method of channeling this surplus material be attached to this resolution and that the detailed proposed method be considered a part of this resolution. And that copies of this be sent to each duly elected Oklahoma Representative in Washington, D. C., to the National Service Director, to the National Housing Expediter, and any other officials deemed necessary."

The above resolution unanimously voted and adopted by the membership of the Joe Carson Post No. 1, of the American Legion of Oklahoma, Tulsa, Tulsa County, Okla., at a regular business meeting this 16th of July 1946.

EVERETT A. WOOD,
Commander, Joe Carson Post, No. 1, American Legion.

Attest:
[SEAL] CLINTON J. BOHANNON.
Adjutant.

To assist the veteran in solving his or her housing problem at the earliest date possible. The following suggestions are offered relative to channeling the 1,500,000,000 board feet of lumber and other building materials which will be available when the surplus military installations are dismantled.

Granting that the surplus military installations which are to be dismantled have been designated, and that the prices of the surplus material into the hands of the veteran for use in the construction of his or her home.

To accomplish the desired purpose of assisting the veteran in the shortest time possible toward solving the housing problem. The various materials should go back into the channels which are qualified and all ready set up to handle same, for this method would speed up this program and overcome certain conflicts and much red tape:

1. Lumber, sash, doors, builders hardware, etc., to be allocated to the lumber yards and material distributors.
2. Plumbing and similar items to be handled by the plumbing establishments.
3. Electrical equipment and kindred material by the electrical firms.
4. Heating plants by the heating companies.
5. Stoves and miscellaneous hardware by the hardware dealers.

And other items too numerous to mention but which are desperately needed by the veteran to be channeled back to their respective supplier, so that the veteran will have an opportunity to purchase same.

To assist and see that this material, etc., reaches the veteran it is suggested that the recognized veterans' service organizations and the American Legion throughout the Nation assist in their community in seeing that the veteran receives this material which he or she is entitled to receive.

For explanation and easy reference your attention is called to (1) The distribution of lumber, sash, doors, building hardware, etc.

Any local lumber yard or material distributor is set up to handle this class of material in quantities, to pay cash at the time the material is received at the dismantled military installations, to ship or haul said materials to his yard, and to sell it in small quantities to the veteran and to carry the veteran's account for a reasonable length of time until his or her GI loan has been completed.

Method of obtaining material from the dismantled military installations by the yards would be in lots of a minimum of 10,000 board feet with a maximum of 100,000 board feet. When purchasing the material from the yard the veteran would extend his certification to the dealer for a given number of feet of lumber, and the dealer in turn would extend this certification along with other accumulated certifications to his source of supply for additional surplus material. (Where a veteran has entered into a contract for the construction of his or her building the veteran would extend his or her certification to the contractor who would extend same on to the yard for a like number of feet of lumber for use in the construction of a specified veteran's building.)

Should a dealer in a certain area find that he is unable to dispose of this material to veterans, that dealer or yard would be required to notify the other dealers and yards in that area in writing and to send a copy of same to the Office of the National Housing Expediter with a list of the items he has on hand. Ninety days after this written notice has been given and if the surplus items have not been sold to veterans, the yard or dealer then may offer this surplus material to the public.

The disposition of the above-mentioned material would be applicable to the other surplus items if channeled to their respective outlets.

New Zealand Raw Materials

Trieste Is Powder Keg Where War Might Easily Start, Says Bellamy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the thirteenth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions to Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

On the flight down from Salzburg to Rome we made a stop of several hours at Trieste, the powder keg of Europe.

Americans must remember that at Trieste there are possibilities of more immediate damage to the world's peace than in any other city. For at Trieste one American division and two British divisions confront across the so-called Morgan Line a Yugoslav Army estimated at 300,000 to 500,000, backed up, it is assumed, by a million Russian troops scattered all the way from Hungary toward and into Yugoslavia.

Marshal Tito, the leader of the Yugoslavs, runs a very cocky performance, and his border patrols are constantly arresting American and British soldiers who venture over the line a hair's breadth.

Given a bad border-patrol skirmish at Trieste, we might find ourselves in a war. Given a long-drawn-out negotiation and final break between Russia and Britain over the oil of Iran, for example, America would still have a chance to decide whether it wanted to spend American lives in defense of the British claims in the Persian controversy, but there would be no such chance given at Trieste should an untoward incident of sufficient magnitude occur there. We would not then be talking about a war. We would be in one.

We landed from the plane in Gorizia and drove to the frontier. There in a lovely countryside there was a road block, with an America sentry on one side and about 100 yards away another road block with a Yugoslav outpost. On the hills over the Yugoslav territory were enormous signs slashed in the side of the hill reading "Tito," leaving no doubt as to who was running the show over there.

The present frontier follows the so-called Morgan line, which was worked out with the Yugoslavs by Gen. Sir Frederick Morgan, representing the British and American occupying forces. It is really a retreat by the Allies from the line set up by Woodrow Wilson, which stood from the First World War until the Second. The Morgan agreement will run until the peace treaty is settled.

Trieste, Udine, and that portion of Venezia Giulia west of the Morgan line are all under Allied Military Government control and will remain so until a decision to the contrary is made by the Allied Council.

Our understanding, insufficient as it may be, of the Trieste problem, was greatly advantaged by the kindly help of Brig. Gen. A. L. Hamblen of G–5, Mediterranean theater of operations, as was our entire German trip greatly aided by Brig. Gen. Charles K. Gailey, public relations officer, OMGUS, a Georgian, a gentleman, and a fine soldier, and by Capt. Bernard Quinn of Boston, Mass.,

Behind the whole controversy looms the gigantic figure of Russia, which if Trieste were to be given to the Yugoslavs, would in effect obtain the satisfaction of its age-old dream of a warm water seaport on the Mediterranean. Because what is Tito's, one is forced to believe, is Stalin's. This would threaten the British life line and, one may depend upon it, would be opposed by the British right down the line.

Later we met General Morgan at a luncheon given in Trieste by Maj. Gen. Bryant T. Moore, commander of the 88th Division of the United States force stationed at Trieste. It is a finely disciplined division, as shown by its abstinence from provoking trouble with the Yugoslavs, and one which could be counted on to give a fine account of itself were there any real trouble.

Here may be as good a place as any other to discuss the Russian attitude in Europe, which is the unknown quantity in the whole equation. In fact, the equation could be solved if it were not for this hard riddle. On the one hand, the Russians seem to be just grown-up children. It has been said that the average Russian knows only three English words, "bottoms up," and "no."

On the other hand, the Russians indulge in the most astonishingly provocative acts which might lead to almost anything. For example, on the way down to Vienna the plane ahead of curs was fired on just before landing by the Russians, who maintained that it was just a few yards over the international boundary line. As if a pilot flying at the height of a mile or more, could be exact about a thing like that, and as if, furthermore, Russian security were involved about it.

COMPLAINTS DISREGARDED

It is reliably reported that when such circumstances as this occur and representations are made, the Russians laugh it off, on the ground that their soldiers are not very well disciplined and are likely to let go at anything they see, from bird to flying fortress, and that, furthermore, nobody was hurt.

My own guess about the matter is that their chesty behavior arises from an inferiority complex. The Western World shut Russia out of the councils of civilized nations for many years after the Soviet Revolution. America, for example, did not recognize Russia until President Roosevelt's advent. The Russians resented this bitterly at the time, and now that they have become, by reason of having been on the winning side of the war, the leading continental military power of Europe, they like to throw their weight around.

I am told that the highest information in Washington is to the effect the Russians do not want war with the Allies, and I incline to that belief myself, because they have so much to do to repair the damage to their country and get the industrial machine started again. On the other hand, one is tempted to ask why, if they really feel that way, they indulge in so many nose-thumbing gestures toward their recent allies.

American public sentiment toward Yugoslavia has always been mixed since the emergence of Marshal Tito over Marshal Mihailovich. Although a good many American officers in Europe will now tell you that Mihailovich was not much of a fighter and always wanted more supplies before he would engage in battle, whereas Tito would scrap at the drop of a hat, it seems to me that if our country had intended the American people to drop Mihailovich suddenly and get enthusiastic about Tito, then there was not enough information given out as to why, all of a sudden Mihailovich stopped being a hero and Tito wore the accolade.

The suspicion is still very strong in America that the whole business was a Russian scheme to put their man on top in Yugoslavia and that Mihailovich, who is now being tried for various crimes and misdemeanors, will not get a fair deal.

Statehood for Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. L. BARTLETT

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the people of Alaska will be addressing themselves between now and October to the question of whether they should seek in the near future the most priceless gift it is within the power of the United States to bestow, namely, statehood in the Union. Our Territorial legislature has provided that at the general election in October Alaskans will vote on the referendum question: Are you in favor of statehood for Alaska?

Some sentiment for statehood has existed in Alaska for 30 years or more. This sentiment, gradually gaining ever more adherents, has now become an insistent cry in Alaska. We have seen the formation of statehood clubs, statements on behalf of statehood from many of our most prominent citizens, the writing of statehood planks into the platforms of our Alaska political conventions, and memorials in favor of statehood passed by the Territorial legislature. The election in October, however, will be the first opportunity ever provided for the people of Alaska as a whole to express formally their desire for or against statehood.

I am concerned that that expression be the clear and unmistakable decision of a people in possession of all of the pertinent facts about statehood. It would be nothing less than tragic, in my opinion, if Alaska were to render a decision which was half-hearted or which was not decisively the conclusion of a large majority of all Alaskans of voting age and qualifications.

In that connection, I am delighted to note that a large number of Alaskans have voluntarily banded themselves together into an Alaska Statehood Association, whose primary purpose is to seek and disseminate the information on which an intelligent decision can be based. This association, which it should be noted contains both advocates and opponents of statehood for Alaska, has arranged to have all the various issues involved in statehood explored carefully and set forth in a comprehensive report, a copy of which I have in my hand and to which I will refer from time to time in my remarks today.

STATEHOOD IS NECESSARY

My own position on the statehood issue, Mr. Speaker, has been made abundantly clear on more than one occasion to the people of Alaska and to the Members of Congress. I am in favor of statehood for Alaska. I am in favor of it at the earliest possible moment. I think that nothing less than full statehood will satisfy the natural longings of the citizens of Alaska for self-government, and I think that statehood is vitally necessary in order that we in Alaska may have a sound basis on which to build for the hundreds of thousands or perhaps millions who, I am confident, will some day inhabit our great land.

I wish it were possible, Mr. Speaker, for every one of the individual Alaskans who will be called upon in October to make their historic decision to witness as I have the intimate workings of the National Government as they pertain to the interests of the Territory. All it would take in my opinion to convert the most uncompromising foe of statehood into an enthusiastic supporter would be for him to come to Washington and take over the Delegate's job for a week. It is interesting to note that my esteemed predecessor, Judge Anthony J. Dimond, who served in Washington as Alaska's Delegate for 12 years, is as ardent a proponent of statehood as I. The late Judge James Wickersham, who also served for many years as Alaska's Delegate, was likewise an earnest advocate of statehood for Alaska. The issue is above personalities. It is above politics and political parties. It is one which goes back to the fundamental ideals upon which this Nation was founded.

Alaska has been a Territory for 34 years. The American flag has flown over Alaska for 79 years. It is inconceivable to me, Mr. Speaker, that any area, and particularly one which is more than twice the size of the great State of Texas, and which is possessed of a vast wealth of resources, should remain permanently under the Stars and Stripes in a condition of political servitude. The people of Alaska are Americans. Although denied some of the normal rights of citizenship, they are citizens of the United States. They have exactly the same thoughts about self-government and exactly the same longings for home rule common to Americans elsewhere.

SOME ARE UNCERTAIN

While it is probably undeniable that all Alaskans agree in principle on the desirability of statehood, it is perfectly obvious, also, that some of the people of the Territory are hesitant in pushing Alaska's statehood claim for the reason that they are uncertain about just what is involved in taking the important step forward from territorial status to statehood. Particularly they would like to know whether the costs of maintaining a State government will be so high as to constitute a serious burden to the present population. I am glad to see that the statehood study to which I referred a moment ago goes into this aspect of the question thoroughly. I hope that every Alaskan will have the opportunity between now and election day to read and ponder the information contained in this report.

The additional burdens of government which Alaska will assume with the coming of statehood are primarily a judiciary, a police system, care of the insane, and the conservation and protection of fish, fur, and game. The only other new expenses which I can envision as falling to the new State will be the costs of operating the Governor's office, the cost of a legislative session every other year, and the costs of eventually constructing and maintaining a State capitol and whatever other buildings might prove necessary. All of the other expenses which will have to be borne by the State are already being carried by Alaska's Territorial government. The people are paying for them already and no additional burden will be involved in statehood. The total cost of taking over the present federally supported activities which I have enumerated is very carefully analyzed, item by item, in the Alaska Statehood Association's study. My understanding is that this study will be made available, generally, to Alaskans, and, therefore, I shall not at this time attempt to go into that subject. But since it is of primary concern, I expect to mention it in some detail in discussing the subject of statehood upon my return to Alaska.

COST NOT TOO GREAT

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is an expense which Alaska can carry, not only without hardship, but with the greatest of ease. The present cost of running the Territorial government is about $2,750,000 a year. Alaska meets this expense without imposing a property tax, or an income tax, and without tapping other sources of revenue commonly made use of elsewhere to support governmental services. I honestly do not feel that the cost of statehood is a matter about which Alaskans need to have too great concern. Indeed, balanced against the advantages which would accrue from that form of government, the extra cost is almost negligible.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that this argument that statehood would mean a grave financial burden upon the citizenry was used in virtually every one of the States admitted to the Union since the West was opened up by the wagons of the pioneers. The argument was advanced in all these territories—now States—by exactly the same forces which are now opposing statehood in Alaska. These forces are primarily the absentee corporate interests which have no concern whatever in whether the area of their operation shall become a successful commonwealth and a place where hundreds of thousands can live in happiness and prosperity. I urge most forcefully that the people of Alaska be alert to the real source and the real motive of such opposition.

I do not mean to imply, Mr. Speaker, that there are not some genuine residents of the Territory who are opposed to statehood for what they consider to be good reasons. I do not happen to agree with them, but I respect their sincerity. I do state without hesitation, however, that the principal source of opposition to statehood—the most vocal and insistent source—is that which I have mentioned. Alaskans need not be too greatly concerned about the predictions of imminent doom issuing from those quarters. The same predictions were made when it was proposed that Alaska should have a delegate in Congress. They were made again when the organization of a territorial form of government was under consideration. They were made when Alaskans sought legislative control over some of their local and territorial affairs. This opposition has been discredited time and time again. It has been discredited in Alaska and it has been discredited in other territories which subsequently became States. One of the compelling arguments in favor of statehood for Alaska is that the residents of no single State would ever consider for an instant returning to territorial status. So it will be, I am convinced, in Alaska.

ARGUMENTS REFUTED

There are other arguments which I have heard advanced from time to time against statehood for Alaska. It is argued that the population is not sufficiently large. As a matter of fact, half a dozen States were admitted to the Union with a smaller number of inhabitants than Alaska has today. It is argued that Alaskans are not ready for statehood. Yet Alaska has been a United States possession without statehood longer than any but 5 States in all the history of our Nation. Already it has had organized Territorial status longer than did all but four of the present States. If Alaska is not ready after 79 years of apprenticeship it probably never will be ready. But I submit this is not the case. Alaska is ready. I am sure that we will say by our votes in October that Alaska is willing also.

Much is made of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that Alaska is not contiguous with already existing States. Just why this should be an argument against statehood I have never been able to understand, and I have never been able to get a satisfactory explanation for the attitude from those who express it.

Probably the most notable advance which man has made in recent years is the manner in which he has been able to shrink time and distance. In every respect to which the slightest significance attaches, Alaska today is closer to the National Capital than were the immediate neighboring States at the time of the formation of this Nation. It is interesting to note one of the observations which the Alaska Statehood Association report makes with respect to this subject:

> Alaska does not touch any existing State. Yet there exist within the Union, as parts of States, several areas of noncontiguous territory. In addition to islands off the coast and in the Great Lakes, these include two portions of the North American mainland separated entirely, as is Alaska, by intervening Canadian territory. One is the part of Minnesota lying north of Lake of the Woods. The other is the peninsular portion of Washington, containing the village of Point Roberts, which is cut off by the forty-ninth parallel and Boundary Bay from the rest of that State. At one time Congress considered seriously, and apparently without mental reservations, a proposal to annex all of Alaska as a county of the State of Washington. If parts of States may be noncontiguous with the rest of the Nation, why may not entire States?

RIGHT ON OUR SIDE

This is a matter on which Alaska, and its sister Territory of Hawaii, may well have to do battle with prejudice and tradition. But it is a battle we are prepared to make, and with reason and logic on our side we have no doubt as to the outcome.

Another argument which some have made is that the costs of road construction and maintenance would be greater after statehood. The argument is that admission to statehood will qualify Alaska to participate in the Federal Highway Aid Act and that this will require a matching of Federal funds by funds from the State. I believe I am interpreting correctly the attitude of a vast majority of Alaskans when I say that this is exactly what we most need and most earnestly desire. The Territorial legislature has memorialized Congress to admit Alaska, as a Territory, to the benefits of the Federal Highway Aid Act. These benefits, even though Alaska should be admitted to participation on a basis which would bring her only half of the share of Federal funds provided for under the standard formula, would total at least $10,000,000 every year above what the Federal Government has ever spent for roads in Alaska in the past. Even though Alaska should have to match this money to a substantial degree, the benefits would so far outweigh expenditures that there is no doubt that instead of an argument against statehood this is in reality one of the strongest arguments for it.

At the risk of appearing ungracious, I must remind the Congress that there are dozens of similar discriminations which are being practiced against Alaska at the present time simply because it is a Territory and for no other reason whatever. The statehood study documents more than 20 examples of current or recent discriminations of this type, all of which will be swept away with the admission of Alaska to the Union on a basis of equality.

These constitute some of the specific and tangible advantages of statehood. There are numerous other advantages. There is the advantage of unlocking the resources which have been tied up in arbitrary Federal reserves and withdrawals, many of which were made so long ago that no one can recall their original purpose. There is the advantage of Alaskans' participation in national decisions as well as in all the matters of purely local government which are now handled—and so inadequately handled—at long distance from Washington. There is the advantage of overcoming and discarding a defective organic act which has never been satisfactory to Alaskans and which daily becomes less satisfactory. There are the incalculable advantages which will come from voting power in Congress and the influence which this power gives not only in matters congressional but in matters assigned to the various executive agencies of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced into this Congress a bill which would provide for the admission of Alaska as the forty-ninth State. Naturally, in view of the referendum which has been authorized by the Territorial legislature, I do not intend to press this legislation until after the people of Alaska have had the opportunity of making their wishes known on this important matter. Should the results of the referendum election show that the people of Alaska are in favor of statehood, as I hope and believe they will, Alaska's Delegate most assuredly will introduce into the Eightieth Congress, and press most energetically, legislation for the admission of Alaska as the forty-ninth—or as it may be—the fiftieth State of the Union.

I am conscious of the statehood aspirations of our sister Territory of Hawaii, and I am most sympathetic with the statehood efforts which are being exerted by the distinguished Delegate from that Territory on behalf of his constituents. In no sense do we in Alaska consider ourselves as competing with Hawaii for a star on the flag or a place in the Union. I feel, as I am confident the people of Alaska feel, that the ultimate destiny of both Territories is statehood. Nothing would please me more than that Alaska and Hawaii should enter the Union together, adding the vast and rich empire of the north and the golden isles of the west to the proud sisterhood already enjoying the unequaled blessings of full membership in this most glorious Union.

AN AMERICAN PROCESS

Mr. Speaker, statehood has been the successful goal of the inhabitants of all the Territory of the continent between the Atlantic and the Pacific and between Canada and Mexico. Not since 1912, when Arizona became the forty-eighth State, has there been an addition to the Union. The process of orderly advance from Territorial status to statehood has been at a standstill for a third of a century, despite the fact that hundreds of thousands of Americans, with exactly the same ideas as other Americans about self-government and home rule, live in the noncontiguous areas of Alaska and Hawaii. To the residents of these Territories it is only logical that they should be admitted to the same privileges of self-government and of participation in national affairs enjoyed by the citizens of the States. Statehood is a natural development at this time for the two areas, Alaska and Hawaii, which have the advanced and special position of being incorporated Territories, and which have developed the general problems common to American territories in their progression toward full self-government and inclusion in the family of States.

Obtaining statehood is not the matter of a few months or even of a few years. The mere mechanics of the step require from 15 months to 3 years after the passage of enabling legislation by Congress. I would like to emphasize to my fellow citizens of Alaska that in their thinking about the statehood question confronting them they keep this clearly in mind. As the statehood association's report puts it—

> The question which every Alaskan should ask himself before going to the polls in October is not, "Is Alaska ready for statehood now?" but rather, "Am I in favor of statehood in principle, and if so, might Alaska be ready for statehood within the foreseeable future?"

It is my belief that a vote against statehood in October or anything less than decisive approval would bury all hopes of statehood for years to come. I do not expect this outcome, but I would like every Alaskan to keep the consequences in mind in his thinking about the statehood issue.

PEOPLE HAVE VETO POWER

Any act which Congress will pass providing for statehood for Alaska will contain the provision that the people of the Territory themselves must elect delegates to a constitutional convention and later must vote to approve or disapprove the proposed State constitution drafted at such convention. Alaskans should understand, therefore, that a vote for statehood in the October referendum does not commit Alaska unalterably to statehood or begin a process in that direction which the people of Alaska will not have abundant opportunity to stop later should they so desire. Full control over whether the Territory shall become a State will remain firmly in the hands of the people of Alaska until after their own election on ratification of a State constitution. At best, that is an event which is probably some years in the future.

All that is at issue in the October referendum is the general desirability of statehood and the general willingness of Alaskans to assume the responsibilities of self-government. I say that this is all that is at issue. It is a great deal. The decision which the people of Alaska are called upon to render is an historic one. The decision is a matter for each individual citizen's judgment and conscience. If the advice of their Delegate to Congress is of any assistance in arriving at that decision, the advice is most emphatically and earnestly that the vote should be "yes" in favor of statehood.

Note will be taken, I am sure, of the fact that the general tendency of the Alaska Statehood Association report is in favor of statehood. I am sure that the report for that reason will be criticized by those who are unalterably opposed. My own belief is that it would be impossible for any group or any individual to study the matter open-mindedly and not conclude in favor of statehood. The facts themselves are in favor of statehood.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken thus at length upon a subject which might seem at this time to be the interest not of Congress but of relatively few people living far away. But the struggle of a people for self-government, particularly when the struggle occurs in an area which has been under the American flag for more than three-quarters of a century, is one which I am sure should be of interest to us all. Certainly when the Delegate from Alaska reports to the next session of Congress a decision of the people of Alaska which I hope and which I believe will be overwhelmingly in favor of statehood, the matter will become one of direct and immediate concern of this body. Then shall we press forward with a persistence not to be denied until Alaska shall at last come within the circle of the sisterhood of States as one of the greatest.

Automobiles for Amputees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio broadcast over Station WINX, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. SELBY. This is Lyle Selby speaking to you from the studios of WINX. As a weary Congress moves into the last days of a hectic session, a number of bills are still on the docket. Some can easily be held over until another session. Others should be passed now, before this session is finished, to avoid working a hardship on those affected by them. Such a bill is H. R. 6304, a bill to provide automobiles for amputees.

In order that our listeners may know the facts about this bill, WINX has asked two veteran amputees from Walter Reed Hospital to be here tonight to talk to you about the bill, together with Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, of Massachusetts, who introduced the original bill to Congress at the request of the amputees.

With Mrs. ROGERS this evening we have Sgt. William A. Halligan, of Salem, N. J., who lost his left leg in France just before Christmas 1944, and is still in the hospital as a result. Here also is Sgt. Andrew J. Martin, another Irishman from Great Neck, L. I., who lost his right leg above the knee in a battle in Bremen, Germany.

Bill, I know you're interested in seeing this bill pass. I suppose you stand to benefit from it pretty much.

BILL. No, Lyle, as a matter of fact, it won't make any difference to me personally.

Mr. SHELBY. Why won't it, Bill?

BILL. Well, you see I'm going to get a car anyway. My mother has enough saved up to stake me to a car, so I'm all set that way.

Mr. SHELBY. So you're just here to help your buddies?

BILL. That's it, Lyle.

Mr. SHELBY. Well, why do you think it is so important for them to have cars?

BILL. Well, you see it's a mechanized world these days.

Mr. SHELBY. That's true.

BILL. And I needed a car before I lost a leg. Now that I'm slowed down I'll need one even more and I know the rest of the guys will too.

Mr. SHELBY. Andrew Martin, you've something on the tip of your tongue. Let's hear it.

ANDY. I just wanted to agree, but solid, with Bill. I don't need a car either.

Mr. SELBY. So your family are helping you too.

ANDY. No; I'm a lot older than Bill. I'm 33 and he's 10 years younger than that. I'd worked for quite a while before I went into the service, so I had some savings to use for a car.

Mr. SELBY. So neither of you need a car yourselves, but both of you are here to see that your buddies get a break; is that it?

ANDY. That's exactly the idea. That is right.

Mr. SELBY. I think that shows pretty good spirit from both of you. Now Mrs. ROGERS, we'd like you to tell us briefly just a few of the technical points about the bill and what its prospects are this Congress

Mrs. ROGERS. That's a pretty big order for a brief talk, Lyle, but here you are. In the first place, this bill of automobiles for amputees and paraplegics is not a Christmas gift in any sense. It is a practical, economical rehabilitation measure that should be adopted at once. Few have stopped to think about it in this way, but when a person has a limb amputated, the stump of that limb has flesh that is quite tender and remains so for some time. What is more the loss of weight of that missing member throws the whole body out of balance. As a result these veterans are easily thrown off balance by the slightest push in a crowd, and the tender flesh is wounded.

So from that standpoint alone, it is an economic measure to provide cars. It costs the Government $10.43 a day to hospitalize a veteran. Two or three such set-backs could keep a veteran, and has kept many, in the hospital for a year or more, at a total cost of $3,770. This, when the expenditure of half that amount would have provided him with a car, that would have kept him out of crowds. Of course, it should not be a matter of cost anyway.

When these boys went off to war, the Congress that sent them off promised to give them so much of an even chance as possible to get on on equal basis with civilians when they went back to civilian life.

When an amputee has to battle crowds on busses and streetcars and try to save to buy a car, he is operating under far too great a handicap. Most of the boys were too young to matter before the war so they had nothing saved up.

We have considered ourselves obligated to Great Britain and the Philippines and are taking care of their interests in a large way. There are less than 18,000 veterans who would need these cars. I believe it is time we also remembered to take care of our obligations to them.

This bill, H. R. 7171, has been reported out of the House Committee, as a Committee bill not as I originally drafted H. R. 6304, but with a proviso eliminating all those with amputations below the knee, and all arm amputees. I do no believe there should be this discrimination. All amputees need cars, all should be included. The public is solidly behind this bill. But it is important to get something passed by the House that the Senate can amend.

I have received letters and telegrams by the hundreds and people stop me on the street to ask if I can get this bill passed. Certainly these last days of Congress are rushed ones, but they should not be too rushed to remember those men who gave so much for us at a time the country needed them. There is no excuse not to pass the bill. They need us now. We must not fail them.

Government Pays on Unequal Basis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the farmers of this country have accomplished a tremendous job by increasing the production of food especially in the grain crops. They did this willingly and relied upon the promises of the Government for the price to be paid for their 1945 crop of wheat and corn, and upon this promise thousands of farmers made their crop immediately available.

However, the Government later offered and paid a higher price for the 1945 corn and wheat crop to send overseas. There is no reason why the Government should break its promise to those who produce food and I am asking that the Government pay all on the same basis for the 1945 corn and wheat crop, and I am including herewith a resolution from the Sandusky County Farm Bureau covering the matter of the injustice practiced by the Government in paying prices for the 1945 corn and wheat crop.

FREMONT, OHIO, July 24, 1946.

Hon. ALVIN F. WEICHEL, M. C.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was unanimously passed at a regular meeting held by Council No. 3 of the Sandusky County Farm Bureau Federation:

"Whereas the farmers of the United States, having faith in our Government, believed that the ceiling price established for wheat and corn would be the ceiling price for the 1945 crop of said wheat and corn, and

"Whereas thousands of farmers disposed of their crops of wheat and corn upon the basis of said ceiling prices, and

"Whereas the Government of the United States saw fit to offer a bonus and set a new and higher ceiling price for corn and wheat for the 1945 crop, benefiting the farmers who chose to withhold their corn and wheat from the market, be it resolved that we request our representatives in Congress to inquire into the merits of the inequality to the end that the farmers who sold their wheat upon the basis of the cheaper ceiling prices be reimbursed the amount of the difference between the former cheaper ceiling price and the higher present ceiling price."

Yours very truly,

SANDUSKY COUNTY FARM BUREAU,
COUNCIL No. 3,
GEO. W. BLOOM,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.

Bill for Amputees—H. R. 7171

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. WHITTINGTON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I opposed on yesterday a unanimous-consent request for the passage without debate of a controversial bill just reported authorizing the Veterans' Administration to expend $1,500 in buying an automobile for all World War II veterans who had lost one or both legs above the knee or had lost the use of one or both legs on the ground that such a bill involving the expenditure of some $30,000,000 should be carefully considered; that consideration should be given to other veterans who had lost one or both eyes or one or both arms, or who had been otherwise totally disabled, that if existing generous compensation and other benefits were not sufficient for the welfare of amputees and other totally disabled veterans, especially those who had lost both eyes and both arms, all should have consideration in providing additional benefits, and that a definite policy respecting automobiles should be thoroughly explored, and if finally adopted should be extended to other similar totally disabled veterans. Frankly, I am doubtful that buying automobiles for those unable to drive with no provision for repairs, operation, maintenance, or replacement, with barely a quorum present in the closing hours of Congress and without careful consideration and investigation, will promote the best interests of amputees. I believe in equal treatment of all veterans with similar disabilities. I have supported and will continue to vote for all benefits and compensations that will really contribute to the well-being of all wounded or disabled veterans.

I sympathize with amputees who have lost one or both of their legs above or below the knees, or who have lost the use of one or both of their legs. I also sympathize with other veterans suffering from the same or greater percentages of disabilities. I believe in treating all veterans who lost an organ similarly. This bill singles out those who have lost their lower limbs. No provision is made for the veterans who have lost their eyes, their arms, who have had bones taken out of their backs and out of their bodies, nor for those who have been otherwise disabled and wounded. This bill provides for special benefits to one class of veterans without providing similar benefits for other classes who have similar percentages of disability. We have recently increased compensations by 20 percent. I have always insisted that those who are wounded are entitled to our Nation's bounty. Veterans believe in justice. They believe in equal treatment. So do I.

There are those who say that the United States Government has not provided for amputees and for other disabled and wounded veterans. I have voted for all legislation in their behalf. I will continue to provide all needed and necessary benefits. Amputees who have lost both limbs now receive $200 a month. There has been an increase of 20 percent, as I recall, that will be applicable to them and others receiving disability compensation. They are entitled to occupational rehabilitation. The Government is providing it. They are entitled to hospitalization. The proponent of this bill has repeatedly asserted on the floor of the House that the Government has refused to make provisions for amputees and for other disabled veterans, while billions of dollars have been appropriated for the rehabilitation of foreign governments and foreign people. It is well to keep in mind that any appropriations for loans to foreign governments and for food for the hungry and starving of other lands are spent in the United States and thus increase the income of American citizens and provide employment for American workers. With deference, the statement respecting veterans is not only unfair to Congress and to the country, but it is utterly misleading.

Those who make such statements are misrepresenting the generous provisions made by the United States for disabled veterans, and are rendering the veterans themselves a distinct disservice. No government in all human history has ever made more generous provision for the disabled and wounded than the United States has made for the veterans of World War II. Congress has been lavish in expenditures. In fact, many citizens criticize Congress because of the large, and in some cases unnecessary, appropriations that have been made for the alleged welfare of veterans. I have always voted for adequate aid and appropriations for the wounded and the disabled. I have opposed discrimination. I believe that all who suffer from similar disabilities are entitled to equal consideration. I, therefore, insist that the pending bill should be recommitted to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation so that all veterans with similar degrees and percentages of disability if they are not now receiving adequate and comparable consideration, should be given similar benefits. I oppose discrimination between officers and enlisted men. The average veteran opposes such discrimination. I, therefore, voted for the payment of terminal leave in cash to enlisted men, and I have opposed the payment of such leave in bonds. Nothing will be more satisfactory to all veterans than equal treatment for all who have served their country.

If it develops that there is any discrimination and that Congress has not adequately provided for all amputees and other disabled and wounded veterans with similar degrees and percentages of disabilities, I will support and vote for any additional legislation that will provide for any additional needed benefits, not only amputees, but other veterans with similar percentages and degrees of disability.

Reorganization of Bankrupt Railroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly for July 29, 1946:

THE REED BILL—HOPE VERSUS ARITHMETIC—ONLY CERTAINTY IF STOCKHOLDERS GET ROADS IS ANOTHER VALUATION BATTLE

(By Harold S. Taylor)

The Reed bill to return bankrupt railroads to their stockholders for a new try at reorganization has passed the House and is currently in conference with the Senate to reconcile the differences between it and the closely related Wheeler bill passed there. Almost certainly the bill will soon be law.

This bill will have an effect like that of emptying a cageful of mice into a circle of large and active tomcats. Which cat will get which mouse is dubious, but a spirited cat fight can be guaranteed.

Like the closely related Hobbs bill which it superseded, the Reed bill holds out to owners of the affected railroads' old preferred and common stocks the hope that some of their dead equities may be brought to life by getting a cut of the high earnings of the war years. The arithmetic of the situation makes it appear more probable that speculative buyers are now paying by the sheet for paper that should sell by the ton.

In the progress of the legislation through Congress, restrictions have been placed on its scope. Once it would have affected all railroads undergoing reorganization, but the present Reed bill is limited to roads which have earned fixed charges on prereorganization securities for the past 7 years and whose gross income in one of the years 1942, 1943, and 1944 was $50,000,000 or more. Senator JOHNSON of Colorado, powerful member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, is fighting for a restrictive clause to make sure the bill doesn't cover the Denver & Rio Grande Western and will probably have his way.

This reduces the list to the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, the New York, New Haven & Hartford, the St. Louis-San Francisco, the St. Louis Southwestern, and the Missouri Pacific family of Missouri Pacific, Gulf Coast Lines, and International-Great Northern. Thus while there are seven railroads, there are five corporate interests.

The Reed bill cat fight will begin when lien holders and old equity holders begin again to debate what stocks have value and to whom that value should accrue. Stockholders who live beside or travel on such miraculously improved properties as the Gulf Coast Lines or the Texas-to-Kansas City route of the Rock Island insist that if the roads were worth the Interstate Commerce Commission valuations of 1940 or 1941 they must be worth millions of dollars more now. Also all the roads' treasuries are stuffed with cash.

Bondholders agree that the money spent for equipment and maintenance during the war worked wonders. But they count the many years' uncut coupons on their bonds, and say that is where the money came from for improvements and maintenance.

Broadly speaking, the hope of the stockholder under the Reed bill is to get something instead of nothing out of the reorganizing roads by offering the bondholder—whose package of reorganization securities has already been appraised in the when-issued market—a package worth a few dollars more.

The stockholder is working in a narrow cleft. One wall of it is the maximum valuation the ICC will grant to the railroad. The Hobbs bill provides that these valuations be subject to court review, and that in no case shall a valution be less than total investment in the property or the ICC's valuation for rate-making purposes, whichever is lower. It is improbable that any court will review to the extent of letting every valuation of every item of property be fought out in court. It is equally improbable that bondholders will countenance higher paper valuations without insisting that the paper they are taking in reorganizations be proportionately marked up.

The other wall of the cleft is the total of the packages the lienholders will insist on getting in any new plan before they give up their present claims. The stockholder's alpenstock for getting out of this cleft with part of the wartime increase in railroad values is the nuisance value of the further 18 months' delay in reorganizations already protracted as much as 12 years. The court-review-of-valuations clause may allow the stretching of this 18 months to as much as 5 years, some railroad attorneys believe.

The Reed bill provide that upon its passage the seven roads affected shall be returned to their stockholders, who shall have 6 months in which to prepare compromise plans for settlement with creditors. Then the stockholders get a year in which to persuade the bondholders to accept. At the end of the year, if no voluntary accord has been reached, the ICC shall either grant an extension of time for further negotiations or report to the Federal district court having custody of the property that no agreement is possible.

As to what happens after that, the bill isn't clear as to whether the district court may order an old-fashioned courthouse-steps sale to the senior bondholders or whether proceedings under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act shall start all over again. Some owners and dealers in first mortgages have been urging a change in the bill, to head off the probability that the ICC and the courts have been given a way to shuttle future busted railroads back and forth between Reed bill proceedings and section 77 until the bondholders starve to death. Counsel for large institutional holders have been warning that their principals couldn't afford, under such circumstances, to invest in the securities of any road which had ever been in financial difficulties. It would be ironic if a bill "to preserve investments" should close to capital market to all but the strongest half-dozen roads in the country.

Nuisance value of further possible delay, of course, varies widely from road to road and bondholder to bondholder. Counsel for owners of an important underlying mortgage of a reorganizing railroad said: "If the stockholder came to me and asked: 'What's it worth to you to get this thing settled without waiting another 18 months?' I would tell him: 'Not a damned cent. I have been waiting 12 years now and I'm used to it.'"

On the other hand, much of the ownership of defaulted railroad bonds has moved into the hands of speculators, especially since the rise in price began a few years back. These holders have profits, and may want to cash in before railroads fall out of favor with the general run of investors.

New York's mutual savings banks, which have been very active in getting the best possible deal for defaulted first liens of railroads, have been under indirect pressure from bank examiners for years to get rid of them. A show of hands on stockholders' compromise offers might find the savings banks' protective groups with smaller holdings to protect than they had several years ago.

The bondholder who has stuck through the reorganization from start to finish is inclined to value the common stock he will get for part of his overdue interest in the light of what guaranty it affords him that the common stockholder will not get away for a long end run with the company treasury. Any plan for increasing the voting power of junior claimants to earnings will be fought by these bondholders.

Road by road, these are the views of parties at interest, as they have come to Barron's since the Reed and Wheeler bills advanced to where it was obvious one would pass. No person is quoted, since it was impossible to quote everyone.

Missouri Pacific: Alleghany Corp., several years ago, sponsored a plan whereby the common and preferred stockholders could have edged back into the Missouri Pacific picture by paying for warrants. Then the ICC approved a plan with no value at all assigned to the old stocks. Now Missouri Pacific has a plan ready to be offered as soon as the Reed bill becomes law, letting the preferred and common stock back in without paying anything.

This has the appearance of a bargaining move, really aimed at a deal to get the stocks back in with warrants. Robert R. Young, Alleghany chairman, is reported around Chicago and St. Louis buying old Missouri Pacific at $5 a share. Alleghany recently accused Guy A. Thompson, trustee for the Missouri Pacific, and his brother Frank, trustee for the 'Frisco, of acting more like brothers than competitors in discharging their duties.

Whether this activity by Mr. Young will enhance the chances of a compromise reinstating the MOP stockholders is doubtful. It is more likely that John W. Stedman, president of the Prudential Life Insurance Co. and champion of the MOP bondholders throughout reorganization proceedings, will counter with a demand that bondholders be given more and more valuable securities for their interests. While the five series of refunding fives of the Missouri Pacific get packages nominally valued at an average of about $1,430, this total is reached only by tossing in about $277 of class A common (at $100 a share). The plan offers optional cash instead of common—at 22¼ a share!

Mr. Stedman has said that possibly the MOP stockholders deserve an opportunity to "put up or shut up," but his ideas of what they shall put up and what they shall get undoubtedly differ greatly from Mr. Young's.

Rock Island: A man high in the management of the Rock Island Lines before the reorganization says: "We feel that some of the increased value of the company, due to wartime purchase of equipment and cash built up during the war, should come down to the stockholders. We have no settled plan, but we intend to see if the prior lienholders won't take a little more than the ICC plan allows them, and let the junior lienholders and the preferred and common try to get together on the rest. We have a lot more railroad than the ICC will admit."

The holder of a large block of the old general mortgage 4's takes violent exception to this proposal: "We let the common stockholders put up $35,000,000 and come back in after the last reorganization. Then they stripped the railroad down to nothing, and ran all the shippers away with rotten service, to get back their $35,000,000. Do you think we are going to let the stockholders come back in this time for nothing, and play us the same trick? Sure, it's a great railroad now; the money I had coming to me went to make it a great railroad. If the ICC distribution of Rock Island's properties is upset, I'm going to fight all the way to the Supreme Court for every dime I've got coming to me—in actual value, not just the face value of paper."

This was a reference to the fact that while each $1,000 bond of the general mortgage has a claim to a basket of securities with a face value of $1,380.18, recent when issued market quotations on the basket total $1,122.72 bid. The bonds have received $189.14 in cash.

A man in close touch with the principal holders of one of the Rock Island's half-dozen underlying divisional issues said: "Neither Congress nor the courts can create value where no value exists. All this does is to let the equity holder sit down and talk to his seniors, where before the seniors and the ICC talked with the door shut on the equity holder. If the equity holder has some way of getting me out whole, or not quite whole, I'll play. But I am not going to take the same bundle of paper the ICC offers me, with bigger figures stamped on each piece of paper, and let the common come in that way."

Judge Michael Igoe, of Chicago, whose Federal district court has the Rock Island in custody, recently refused the ICC reorganization plan for the road, and returned it to the Commission with the suggestion that a bank loan for cash payment of the general mortgage 4's and the underlying division liens might leave more for junior creditors, but at the same time he warned them that they couldn't expect to be made whole.

St. Louis-San Francisco: The Frisco is deepest in the red, apparently, of all the reorganization roads. Only the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis underlying bonds are going to get their full claim in face value of bonds. Other prior lien bonds, in new bonds and stock, are short more than $60,000,000 of being even nominally satisfied, and the consolidated bonds are short of nominal satisfaction by another $50,000,000. Moreover, these figures are on a basis of the nominal capitalization of $247,838,608 for the reorganized road, proposed by the ICC. At quotations from $101 bid for the new first 4's, down to 22 bid for the new common, the when-issued market values the whole new system at around $160,000,000. The over-the-counter market price of old Frisco common—offered at 65 cents a share with no takers—would seem to reflect this stock's prospects quite accurately.

Yet there are romantic souls who still see some value in the old Frisco stocks. One such person declared that the market would support $75,000,000 of first 4's at par, and $50,000,000 of income 4½'s at 80. This man, a holder of both preferred and common, insisted that some of the Frisco's $42,000,000 in cash, and a $50,000,000 issue at 5-percent preferred, to be figured into an exchange with the junior bonds at 60, would let the old holders back for a share of new common and still keep the capitalization down to the ICC's maximum.

New York, New Haven & Hartford: The New Haven's condition is much less desperate than, for instance, the Frisco's. Yet, while there is some changing hands of old New Haven common at around $3, observers of the scene think the efforts of the last board of directors to get something for the old stockholders will get nowhere.

New Englanders are confirmed, even inveterate, investors in bonds, and these liens have a sanctity down East that newer and more venturesome sections of the country do not afford them. New Haven bondholders were the only group alert enough to get a member of the House Judiciary Committee to go to bat for them. Representative TALBOT, Republican, of Connecticut, sought to have the New Haven exempted from the Reed bill's provisions, but lost in committee and was by-passed on the House floor by a parliamentary maneuver.

Counsel for an institutional group said: "There's no value in the New Haven equity. The whole thing looks to me like a plot to run up the old stocks' prices so some people who got them for next to nothing can unload. My people aren't going to be panicked into a deal; they have waited too long to see this matter cleared up."

William J. Buckland, chairman of the last board of directors, says the old stocks have value, but he has not yet disclosed a plan to assert that value in a new reorganization plan.

St. Louis Southwestern: The Cotton Belt's reorganization plans, if any, are left nebulous by the position of the Southern Pacific as both a major creditor and the owner of about seven-eighths of the preferred and common stocks. Little chance for a catfight here. As a creditor for cash advances made the Cotton Belt up to 1935, when the smaller road finally admitted it was bankrupt, and as purchaser of a Cotton Belt note from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, S. P. will wind up under the I. C. C. plan as holder of 55 percent of the proposed 175,370 shares of new common, not quite 40 percent of the $18,752,447 new preferred, and $4,355,844 of new consolidated 4's.

This is quite enough for control, if the SP's main interest in the Cotton Belt is as a bridge to St. Louis and Memphis from Dallas and Shreveport. Moreover, the ICC plan would wipe out the minority stockholders' group, led by Walter F. Meyer, of St. Louis, which has been feuding for years with the large roads which have successively controlled the Cotton Belt for its value as a bridge line.

Meyer's contention is that the SP's huge stock interest in the Cotton Belt placed it in a fiduciary relationship toward the Cotton Belt, and that the SP didn't foster the Cotton Belt as a helpless and confiding ward should have been fostered. He told a Senate hearing that Cotton Belt common had been sold in St. Louis for $29 a share on the expectation that his suit against the SP, and a similar suit against the Rock Island, would eventually pay off.

The SP's legal department takes the view that its common stock interests take precedence over its lien holdings, and say that certainly the SP will have no part in the threatened action by some holders of senior bonds to have the Reed bill declared unconstitutional if it is passed and signed. Whether the SP will bestir itself to press an alternative plan is more than doubtful. No one will say so, but a guess that the majority stockholder would be glad to see the Meyer group diverted to fighting for a new reorganization plan is not warmly contradicted.

The Road Back—A Soviet Germany?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, reports from behind the iron curtain, or, as the Russians may yet call it, the steel—for Stalin—wall, are often sketchy and sensational rather than sober and detailed recitals of fact.

The following excerpted report made by the distinguished economist, Dr. Karl Brandt, of Stanford University, is therefore all the more valuable for its fidelity to factual detail obtained at first hand in Berlin. Under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD Dr. Brandt's address, which was given July 19, 1946, before the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, and was broadcast from radio station KLX.

If, as our Secretary of State said lately, we are truly "on the road back to peace," we are vitally concerned with what kind of peace it is to be and whether the word "peace" has the same meaning to Soviet commanders as it does to American citizens.

Dr. Brandt's observations on Soviet policy in occupied Germany have a direct bearing on the kind of peace now building. His warning is very clear that Soviet intention is to flatter German scientists, German military leaders, and writers into cooperation for future Soviet expansion, in which a Soviet Germany might aspire to equal status with the RFSR in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

What this might mean to the United States I suggested on the floor of this House last week—July 20, 1946—during the debate on the Atomic Energy Act, when I said:

We must not forget that within from 5 to 15 years the Russians are going to have all the atomic bombs they want. It will be 15 years if they have to do it alone, but probably not more than 5 years if they can communize Germany, or if Germany itself becomes communized.

Nor is the atom bomb the only scientific prize Germany can—if it will—provide for a partner. German technical knowledge combined with the vast, undeveloped, raw resources in the Soviet empire is the real goal on which Soviet hopes are set.

Dr. Brandt makes clear what chance they have of realization.

INSIDE RUSSIAN-OCCUPIED GERMANY

(By Karl Brandt, economist, Food Research Institute, Stanford University)

Mr. Chairman, members of the Commonwealth Club, the future of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, our military ally of yesterday, is the big issue in our foreign policy today—overshadowing everything else. Throughout Europe, too, there is open discussion of the question: Is war with Russia going to come? Is it an inevitable war, or one that can be avoided?

I strongly believe that such a war can be avoided, and that it would be criminal not to make even gigantic efforts to arrive at a modus vivendi with that upsurging world power. But I believe also that the first step in that direction must be to appraise clearly and realistically Russia's intentions and strategy.

What, then, is the situation in the Russian zone? As far as I could see, everything the Russians have done demonstrates a very determined, clear-cut, and realistic policy in perfect harmony with the manifest political, social, and economic aims of the Soviet Union. The application of these aims to the land, the people, and the productive assets in the areas of Germany where the Soviet Union is now formally at work, illustrates with what thoroughness, with what zeal, and with what adroitness a program of sovietization is being achieved. There are not necessarily any contradictions between the acts of Russian military government in Germany and the startling declarations of Mr. Molotov about Russia's plans for Germany at the Paris conference of Foreign Ministers a few days ago. In order to see this correctly, we must forget what we would rather believe, and instead examine dispassionately and fearlessly what the Russians are doing in their zone of occupation, where they and they alone are in charge.

Supposedly, the Russians have no chance whatever to win the Germans to their side at any time, because their troops treated the German civilians so mercilessly. I doubt the correctness of this assumption.

When the Russian front-line troops entered East Prussia, Pomerania, and Brandenburg, they behaved much like any battle-scarred, victorious front-line troops would have. It was reserve troops that followed who took the revenge for what the German army, and particularly the "special detachments" of the SS and the Gestapo had done to Russian civilians and to their land. It is the naked and disgusting truth that the commanding general who took Berlin issued an order of the day in which he specifically granted his troops the freedom of the city, later extending the order orally for an additional week, reminding them that any women or wealth they wanted was theirs.

This order was followed by wholesale looting and ransacking on such a scale that the orgies of the Japanese in Nanking were child's play by comparison. All homes were searched for valuables. Sewing machines, typewriters, radios, telephones, watches, jewelry, fur coats, clothing, and linen were taken. The steel vaults and safes in every bank were cracked by torches, and their contents removed. There were not many women in the city of any age who escaped being raped. Thousands of people committed suicide. All buses, streetcars, telephone switchboards and automatic exchanges, every foot of copper wire, trucks, and passenger cars were sacked.

This was the curtain-raiser to the Russian occupation. Yet it is a sad mistake to believe that we can count upon the German people in the Russian zone to carry on a policy of stubborn noncooperation or resistance against the conquerors because of their opening blows against the civilians. The burning resentment of the Germans is there, but the only way they can express it is to commit suicide.

After several months, the initial phase of the occupation came to an end. The demoralized troops were exchanged mostly for young recruits from Inner Asia, and more law and order was established. Today the occupation troops behave in a more disciplined fashion, although there is a good measure of lawlessness and arbitrary acts by officers, soldiers, and many thousands of Russian deserters. The latter gang up with German criminals. In general, military government law is enforced with no greater brutality against Germans than Russian MP's enforce it against Russian soldiers. That, however, is tougher treatment than any American MP would survive if he were ever to try it on GI's.

Aside from the troops, there are stationed throughout the Russian zone units of the uniformed NKVD, the dreaded Soviet political police, and under them work special detachments of the secret plain-clothes German police.

The two most drastic policies which the Red Army has carried out in its zone have been the exacting of reparations in kind, and the establishing of the so-called agrarian reform.

This process began before Potsdam, and has been carried on ever since.

The Russians ripped up the second tracks of all the double-track railroad lines, including the one between Berlin and Harpke on which the American military train to Frankfurt is operated. The Russians took the good engines and the rolling stock. While I was in Berlin they dismantled the whole central electric railway system, which included all installations and 200 electric engines.

While the American and British armies have demilitarized industries chiefly by blasting to pieces the condemned war plants, I have not found evidence that the Russians have demolished any war plants; on the contrary, they ship the machinery out of the country, leaving behind the cleaned-out buildings. The pattern of shipping out industrial plants is always the same: Russian engineers call on German managers and crews to restore the plant in question to full capacity. Russian experts help them. When the plant is really in operation once more, other Russians appear on the scene, close down the plant, and begin dismantling operations with Russian crews and soldiers. Only walls and concrete floors are left when this stripping process is completed. Doorknobs, pipes, faucets, wiring—everything—goes.

The Russians set a dead line for these operations, and for speed, work up a competitive spirit among the stripping crews, giving awards to those who complete their job ahead of the others. The result is that the work goes ahead with amazing speed, but there is also a stupendous amount of destruction of values which, by more efficient methods, could have been avoided.

Stripping has struck the coal mines, the power plants, the two largest German shoe factories, the largest stocking and sock factory, the sugar mills, farm machinery and fertilizer plants, the largest cornstarch and dextrose plant, automotive and bicycle factories, and many others.

Yet not every factory is dismantled. Some are working to fill Russian orders, and to some extent are even using Russian raw materials. These factories have a delivery quota to meet and have been promised permission to supply German market with whatever remains after the quota is met. The big Zeiss optical works at Jena operates overtime with 6,000 laborers, manufacturing equipment for Russia's Army, Air Force, and Navy. All goods manufactured for Russian orders are paid for by the German city administrations out of tax revenues.

The stripping of industries satisfies not only the demand of Russia's planners for further rapid industrialization in the USSR, but at the same time accomplishes a complete social revolution in Germany, which is a most necessary achievement if the Soviet aims are to be realized. The Germans in the Russian zone have already become prostrate proletarians who can do nothing except call on the government for help. They have been not only stripped of everything they owned or earned, but are made incapable of working at jobs—or the jobs they once held have simply been wiped out. That, of course, crushes any hope they might have of regaining by means of employment some of the things they lost. Their economic distress plays into the hands of the German Communists, and rule by the German Communists dovetails with Russia's foreign policy.

The agrarian reform is the other barrel of this gun. The large estates have been abolished. Their owners and managing personnel, except for those who fled or committed suicide, have with few exceptions been shot or deported. The livestock, including all the draft animals, the tractors, and all machinery of value, were shipped off to Russia. Many of the buildings and farmyards of the large estates are being used as barracks for Red troops. On paper, the land has been distributed among farm laborers—refugee peasants and others—in lots of 12 acres each.

Most of the fields are untilled because there is no draftpower or equipment with which to cultivate them. Since these large estates were a primary source of food for the cities, food shortages have struck throughout the zone.

Farmers are assigned delivery quotas for all products. Deliveries are paid for in prices which are still fixed at the same level as in earlier years.

Farmers are organized in a uniform system of so-called cooperative associations. Upon close inspection, these co-ops reveal themselves as corporations of public law, with a monopoly to supply farmers with things they need. Any politically undesirable elements may be excluded. If a farmer is excluded, that means the end of farming for him, because there is nowhere else he can obtain supplies of any sort. Because the co-ops have taken the place of the dealers, no dealer could receive supplies for distribution. These so-called cooperative associations are politically controlled by top German administrators who happen to be trusted Communists.

Agriculture, along with all other branches of the economic system, is under the rule of a Russian-controlled central administration located in the Russian sector of Berlin. Its chief figures are Communists. Its plans and operations are under the surveillance of the NKVD, and get approval from General Sokolovski's headquarters, which in turn receive instructions from Moscow. During the past 12 months, the Red Army has evicted 9,000,000 Germans from the areas which are, in theory, provisionally transferred to Polish administration, but in practice are annexed by the Polish satellite state. Simultaneously, these areas were stripped clean of any movable assets. This procedure has laid waste one-fourth of Germany's food production in a time of starvation, and it has dumped additional prostrate millions into the zones of occupation. This serves to multiply economic and social strife in those zones.

Contrary to the practices of the other three armies, the Red Army has fostered monetary inflation in its zone as a means of accomplishing the social revolution. When it entered Germany, the Red Army received 2 years' back pay in German occupation marks. A portion of the bank notes was supplied by our Government as Russia's share in occupation marks, promised to each of the powers. The Russians printed an additional, probably much larger volume, on plates which our Government gave them at their request. On top of this load came vast sums of regular German bank notes seized in the Reichsbank and all its branches, and in all the other banks. So long as people would still part with goods for money, this avalanche of marks served the purpose of prying loose additional goods from German civilians. This sort of inflation eats the marrow out of the bones of any society. All those who own anything get stripped of it.

The German newspapers are being revived, but in the Russian zone they are strictly controlled and strongly flavored accordingly. Soviet Russia has always exercised special state patronage over the arts and sciences. The Red Army, too, pays court to the arts. Theaters and concert halls in the Russian zone are given priorities for supplies and reconstruction. Of course, half the plays and films put on are pro-Soviet or German Communist propaganda. Scientists are treated with great courtesy, and assisted either in their work in Germany, or are invited to Moscow, and furnished transportation if need be. The Russians treat their German administrators and experts with respect as equals, supply them with good rations and that very important item, cigarettes. Their homes are protected against requisitioning by the Red Army.

Society has been reduced to a proletarian status and the only people enjoying better conditions are the civil servants. Politically, the one-party system is solidly established.

In summary, it is my impression that the Russian zone has become substantially sovietized in one single year of occupation, and has thus passed into the initial stage of "democracy" as understood in Russia—namely, the dictatorship of the proletariat.

In appraising the amazing success of the Russians, we must remember that they have some substantial assets. They never did bomb German cities, while we did. They actively supported the German underground and even accepted the aristocratic leaders of the Free German Movement, and pay its general officers, such as von Paulus and Count Einsiedel, the high compliment of employing them as instructors in their military academy in Moscow, while we rejected any cooperation whatever with the German underground, even when they were preparing to overthrow the Hitler regime.

An asset in another direction is the fact that the German economy in the Russian zone is now probably in as bad condition as it will ever be, and from now on can only improve. But the deterioration of the German economy in the western zones will continue, just as long as the area remains separated into compartments. The contrast will not go unnoticed on either side of the dividing line, by the civilians ruled under the respective systems.

One of the greatest assets the Russians have is the location of Berlin deep inside the Russian zone. True, Berlin is a four-power city, but at the same time it is the seat of Russia's central administration for her zone, and it is an island in the midst of her zone. For this reason, neither the British nor the French have found it advisable to set up military government headquarters for their zones in Berlin. America, on the other hand, has taken her zone command from Frankfurt to Berlin, and has combined it with the control council group.

We have the use of one Russian-controlled highway which is neatly studded every few miles with ornate signposts carrying quotations from Stalin's speeches in Russian and is patrolled from Berlin to Helmstedt, at the American border, by Russian sentries. We are allowed to fly planes through a narrow strip over this highway. We are also permitted to send two Russian-inspected trains a day—one each way—over Russian-controlled tracks. Our telephone and telegraph lines are known to be tapped by the Russians. The German secret police working for the Russians snatch Germans right out of the American, British, or French sectors of Berlin any time they so desire, and the other powers cannot do a thing about it. We are even unable to protect the life and liberty of German Social Democrats, who opposed the merger with the Communist Party, in our own sector. All we can do is to fly them into the American zone.

The greatest asset the Red Army has, however, compared with the American Army, is something else. The Red Army executes a clear-cut policy for which plain and unmistakable instructions are received from Moscow, and that policy cannot be criticized by anybody in Russia. The Russian public has no voice separate from that of the State. The American Army of occupation has very able leaders, and by and large a devoted and competent personnel, but it operates under a double handicap.

First, our foreign policy has been hazy and undetermined until very recently, in all matters pertaining to Soviet Russia's ambitions in Central Europe, and more particularly with reference to Germany's future. This latter handicap dates back many years.

Second, certain editorials, newspaper columns, and radio comments have been so much preoccupied with voicing a fear of the revival of Germany's military strength and a desire to destroy Germany once and forever, as well as a fear of conflict with Russia and the need therefore to appease her at any price, that at every turn our military government in Germany is raked over the coals.

As a result, this interference and constant stream of criticism from home, and the heckling by our fellow travelers, who have listening posts inside our headquarters in Berlin, prevents our military leaders in Germany from coping with the Russian tactics as they might otherwise do.

Of course, our present predicament in relations with Russia in Germany is the result of a 10-year prewar period in which we chose to ignore the accumulating dangers to our security. We were caught napping, and came close to the brink of disaster. When the Russians were near collapse, and were considering a separate peace with the Nazis, our President and the Prime Minister of Great Britain rushed to Teheran, and not only committed the United States and Great Britain to gigantic deliveries of war supplies, but also to the present division of Germany into its Russian and western zones. In their most critical hour, the Russians were tougher and more farsighted than we were. They realized that their temporary military weakness was their political strength. They demanded and received vast military supplies and enormous political concessions.

We were simply out to destroy Germany, the aggressor. From the outset, the Russians have been out to conquer, then to convert, and finally to win Germany.

If, in the last few months, we have reluctantly come to realize that the very basic conflict of interest between Russia and the western powers cannot be dissolved by sweetness and appeasement, we owe this largely to the brutal frankness and amazing pace with which the Russians pursue their interests. It is high time that we stopped being on the defensive at every turn against Russia's initiative and her surprises.

On the German issue, we cannot wrest the initiative from the Russians by blaming them for our disappointments, or by trying to force them by legalistic arguments to fulfill agreements which have always been vague and unworkable. The initiative will be ours only if we form a constructive policy of our own which has the solid support of the majority of the United Nations.

After thus clearing the ground, we should propose a constructive policy for the economic future of a democratic Germany which will answer sensibly and plausibly the key political question all Germans are asking: How can they get jobs and bread and gradually regain the basic needs for a decent livelihood?

We must supply enough basic food to stop disease, unrest, and starvation in the three western zones. We should propose to the other powers an early deadline for the return of all German prisoners of war. Of all the moves that any one of the four powers could possibly propose, one suggesting the return of former soldiers to their families will have greater weight with the German people than any other. Many of these millions of men have now been away from home for 6 years, and many have been prisoners for 5 years. As a matter of moral principle and justice, no move could be more appropriate.

We should propose the election of a German national assembly in the four zones, and see to it that a provisional German government is formed, and then sign a peace treaty with it.

We should treat the German anti-Nazis of our choice at least as well as the Russians do, and protect their homes against seizure by billeting officers, and otherwise secure considerate treatment for them as equals.

Secretary Byrnes is to be congratulated upon his determination to eliminate the borders between the occupation zones, but it is even more important to eliminate the probability of further surprise moves on the part of Mr. Molotov.

In sizing up the Russians, let me say this: As individuals, the Russians have all the traits that other people have. We have no quarrel with them. Many of them are most amiable, gifted, civilized people. As a nation, they have become world problem No. 1 because of their totalitarian, and as such, reactionary regime of state capitalism, which ignores the welfare of the individual, and surges for power and world domination.

As a modern power, the Russians today are the most overrated people in the world. We underrate the shrewdness of their diplomats and their tricky nineteenth-century methods. But as a modern power, they have neither the military nor the effective economic potential that would place them in that rank—and they know it. Their army had the men in World War II, but not the industrial equipment, to survive. We gave it to them. It may be, that in another 10 years of dire privation, the 170,000,000 Russian people will become a first-rate power. It may be that in another 10 years their fellow travelers in various countries can weaken their home governments and national defenses sufficiently to give the Soviet rulers a free hand at the establishment of world government, Soviet style.

But today this is not so. Today, we who, by great sacrifices, have saved them from military disaster, must see to it that they come to terms with us. We must abandon our fears about a future war, make up our minds about what we want, say so, and go after it like hard Yankee traders. Otherwise, we will get into war by gradually sliding into it on the slippery down grade of appeasement.

Housing Crisis

REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, there has been much talk during the past 10 or 12 months about the housing crisis.

My purpose today is to briefly review the housing situation and to emphasize the fact that no houses are being built and that the veteran is not fooled by the artful juggling of words by the Administration spokesmen, particularly the author of the so-called veterans' housing bill and the housing Administrator.

No attempt will be made at this time to discuss the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, which provides for Federal housing, as, according to the best available information, it is out of the picture as far as this session of Congress is concerned.

There is one basic fact this administration evidently has never learned, that is, in order to build a house it is necessary to assemble lumber, nails, plumbing, brick, plaster, and labor of the building trades on a vacant lot and start to work.

Legislation, blueprints, and good wishes do not build houses.

Last January the President created the office of Housing Expediter. By Executive order he granted vast powers to this individual, giving him virtual control of the entire construction industry. Then the Congress saw fit to add its approval to an extravagant program recommended by the Expediter by passing the misnamed Veterans' Emergency Housing Act of 1946.

In the propaganda campaign for the passage of the act and the speeches by the proponents on the floor during debate, it was claimed that the act would solve all building problems and build 1,200,000 houses this year. To this day, the Expediter has not driven one nail or laid a brick. What an ignominious failure!

In addition, the unsuspecting veterans were inveigled and betrayed into helping the schemers wheedle $400,000,000 out of the Public Treasury to scatter to the four winds on the pretense of building veterans' houses.

Well, the dismal facts are now before us.

In the utter confusion and frustration brought about by the maladministration of the control exercised under the authority granted by the War Powers Acts, construction is at a standstill, and the administration leadership—incompetent and helpless—can think of no solution except to yell for legislation.

Less than 10 percent of the veterans' houses started under the veterans' emergency-housing program have been completed because of failure of the Government to assure a flow of building materials.

A telephonic check of active builders in 23 States found the veterans' housing program badly stalled everywhere, the National Association of Home Builders reported. The survey showed that 92 percent of all veterans' houses started since inception of the program January 15 are either at a standstill or seriously delayed because of lack of materials.

In all cases, builders reported that shortages of critical materials are responsible for the bogging down of the program. None of them reported prospects for improvement of supply in the near future.

It has been found that mass production of prefabricated houses is not the solution of the problem. The general result has been that nobody is getting houses. Those who can build are prevented, or at least hampered, by a system of Federal priorities, and the priorities are directed to people who cannot build or whose good sense tells them that they are in no position to undertake the commitments attached to home purchase.

With due deference to the Expediter's zeal and good intentions, it is suggested that the way for him to facilitate building is to get himself out of the way of people who want to build and are trying to get together with the people who can do the building for them.

As I have repeated many times, the building industry, which includes the manufacturers and the building trades, in 1925 constructed the equivalent of 1,800,000 housing units without Government help or interference, and I repeat that they can do it again if they are free of Government regulations.

Communism Is Un-American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. JASPER BELL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Francis Cardinal Spellman from the July issue of the American:

COMMUNISM IS UN-AMERICAN

(By Francis Cardinal Spellman)

I believe in America, her freedom, her ideals, her traditions. My full trust, love, and loyalty are hers. I believe that communism violates these freedoms, is opposed to these ideals, transgresses these traditions, and is weakening our Nation's unity and wrecking our American way of life. If communism triumphs, Americanism will die.

My sole objective in writing this article is to help save America from the godless governings of totalitarianism, for I believe that every ism based on bloodshed, barbarism, suppression, and slavery is un-American. I believe that every real American, if he but knew the truth, would strive to defend this Nation from Communists who, wielding their weapons of intrigue and infamy, are imposing on our country their profane pattern of serfdom.

It is my firm faith that the first step in defense of American safety and unity is to break the conspiracy of silence envelcping and endangering her. What I state here about communism is known not to me alone, nor is it news to many in high places and in low, but most of those who know the facts speak in fearful whispers or in private round-table talks. This method will not cure the creeping paralysis of inertia attacking America nor rouse Americans to the actual menace of communism.

Too many Americans consider communism only a nuisance, and in their blindness become like moles that cannot see or ostriches that will not see, while others, in apathetic ignorance, consider it merely a philanthropic movement to improve the condition of the poor and underprivileged. If this were true, communism would be a pattern for perfect and peaceful living. But I have seen the tragedy of the unfulfillment of glowing Communist promises. I have seen cringing farming people who had been deported from their country, and on their faces were etched, not the happy imprints of the "four freedoms," but the horrible hoofprints of the Four Horsemen. I met them in Iran, in Palestine, in Kenya, in South Africa, and in Europe. Most of them were suffering from disease; all of them were suffering from starvation.

Over mountains and through valleys I watched streaming, staggering lines of starving aged men, agonizing women, frightened children, tiny, shrunken babies, the spawn and the spoils of Nazi-Fascist-Communistic totalitarianism. I saw them in the refugee camps and in the roadside gutters of this war-ruined world, and from their livid lips I learned terrible testimony of the mockery of the totalitarianism "paradise" from which they had been liberated. They told no tales of Communist plenty, equality, and justice. Theirs were stories of hunger, oppression, and death. Deprived of all but life itself, deluded and debased, they had been driven from their plagued and plundered homeland.

I have also seen the terror mirrored in the tear-emptied eyes of men, women, and children who, when told they were going to be repatriated, preferred suicide in exile to enslavement, cruelty, and death at home.

If these memories were yours, as they are mine, if you believe with me that freedom is the birthright of the great and the small, the strong and the weak, the poor and the afflicted, then you would be convinced as I that communism is the antithesis of American democracy.

"But that was far across the seas, in foreign lands," you say. "It cannot happen here." It can happen here, and anywhere and everywhere that communism, with its riot of rash promises, takes root. In America the seeds of confusion and disunion are spawning and spreading, and communism is growing. In their efforts to wean Americans from Americanism, Communists unanimously revile and defile everyone whose opinions and convictions differ politically, socially, or morally from their own. Their subtle, sinister schemings sway and mislead Americans who, in ignorance or weakness, yield to communism their loyalty to God, to country, and to their fellow man.

Often we fail to put upon the precious things of life their proper price. Freedom is one of these. But freedom is not a treasure which, once possessed, cannot be lost; and it will be lost for us and for our children unless it is cherished, defended, and preserved as it was fought for and won. The history of our United States is the story of the ceaseless struggle to keep alive this freedom and our ideas and ideals of liberty and democracy, and to defend them from enemies within and without her borders.

I, myself, saw the costly writing of this story during 140,000 miles of war-years' travel over the land, on the seas, and in the skies, living, talking, praying with thousands of our men of the armed forces. On nearly every foreign field of battle our men fought, suffered, and died to save America from foes outside her frontiers, and we, who through our soldiers' sacrifices were spared from the enslavement of totalitarianism, must now defend her from this same peril threatening us from within her boundaries. Our martyrs, living and dead, fought each day's fight, feeding their bodies, hearts, and minds with one thought: to go home to America because it was America. Through the flow of wartime, when each hard day was like another, that was the common bond uniting our boys each to all and all to America.

Why? Because to each, America meant the freedom to live, to love, to learn, to play, to work, and to worship the way his conscience taught. His was the choice. That was American the way for which he made his daily sacrifice of pain, loneliness, and loss. He did not like the mud, the sand, the sleet, the sweat, the suffering, blood, and death. Because he was afraid he was courageous. And he prayed. I know, for I knew thousands and thousands of our boys, and when they prayed they gave not merely lip service to God. They begged His strength in their weakness, His help in their fear, His mercy in their suffering.

Do you think our boys acted like pagans, atheists, or men disdainful of religion? I have seen men who, after black nights of bombings or battle, walked miles upon miles in the blistering sun of the desert or slogged through the sticking mud of battlefields to pay their homage to their God. These boys were not of my faith alone, but of every religious faith, and today they want, and they deserve, the right to worship as they wish, the right to rear their children in their own faith and not have imposed on them the materialism and atheism of communism. They have the right to know they have not spilled their common blood in fruitless waste.

When our soldiers talked to me of love of home, mother, family, and America, their hopes, plans, and promises were not mere mouthings, but the sincere, solemn pledges of men determined to keep faith with their country. In every corner of the fighting world boys gave me letters to take home. One I remember well, for, as the boy read it to me, I felt it should be addressed, not to his mother alone, but to every American. It read:

"Today we are faced with the greatest organized challenge to civilization that the world has ever known, and I count myself honored to have the right and the opportunity to fight against it. There will be much work, too, for you, for the home front must stand forever united after the war is won, or the tyranny of totalitarianism will rend apart the world we fought and died to save."

This warning to us was his last testament. He, like millions of our boys, fulfilled his pledge. They asked not to have back the lives they gave. They asked only that we who follow after may profit by the anguish they have borne. But we—have we not too soon forgotten our promises and prayers: if Danny comes home alive; if Sam's eyes see again; if Jim walks again? Then, in God's name and theirs, we promised to protect America as they protected her—against anyone and everything that would hurt or deprive her of her rights and freedoms—against any enemy who again would make our sons victims of war.

It matters little whether a land is overrun by alien armies and conquered by force, or whether it is devitalized by alien organizations, propaganda, and revolution inspired from within. Today those very evils our boys fought against have been planted in the vitals of America by Communists, as they abuse their freedom to deprive us of our freedoms. And many Americans, as truant children listening to the lure of gypsies, are fascinated and fooled as they follow the mysticism of communism.

Would you, whose son now lies in the hidden depths of the sea, dare to answer his whispered words: "Mother, is the America for which the floods of our blood mingled with the waves of the sea, safe for my son—the son I never saw?"

Could you, whose husband's broken body lies buried amidst the ruins in another nation's soil, look into the image of his sad eyes and honestly answer the question mirrored there: "Yes, Tom; America is freed forever from the bondage of the totalitarian tyranny you died to destroy."

Could you look into the laughing blue eyes of your young son and truthfully say: "Jackie, the 'four freedoms' your dad died to defend are safe for you and for all children?"

Could you watch your daughter with a new life beneath her heart and say: "Be strong. Your Joe died—not alone the pilot of his burning ship, but also a flaming light to the world of democracy and peace—and now his Joe will never need to sacrifice to war his dreams, his hopes, his life?"

Can you longingly look into a boy's sightless eyes, or wistfully watch a boy awkwardly work his wooden leg; can you see the restless, helpless bodies of the phyically and spiritually sick, and say to them: "The peace is won. America is safe. Your job is done"?

No, you cannot, because America is infected with the germs of communism, which, spreading its poisonous propaganda and false philosophies, is twisting and tempting the minds of good men until they, too, become serfs to the perjuring, pandering, spirit of confusion and chaos.

Today, Communists, suppressing and distorting the truth, are intimidating men and inflicting despotism on America, trying to convert Americans to communism. In Government, in industry, in labor unions, in our political and educational systems, even in the armed services of our country, Communists and Communist sympathizers hold responsible positions, while members of their party use the press, the radio, and the films to influence and divide us against ourselves.

They live under the American flag, enjoy the priceless privilege of being citizens of our Republic, while their own allegiance is pledged to an emblem representing a theory of government opposed to everything for which old glory stands.

They try to seduce us into believing that Americans can be Communists, but a true American can be neither a Communist nor a Communist condoner, and we must realize that the first loyalty of every American is vigilantly to weed out and counteract communism and convert American Communists to Americanism.

When some Americans parrot the Communist press and speak of Soviet democracy as a different type from ours, when they assert that we have no right to "impose" our brand of democracy upon others, one questions either their sincerity or their sense. Democracy is not "imposed." It flows from and survives only in freedom, which is the one element completely lacking in "democracies" under the iron rod and behind the iron curtain. Communists have inflicted their sinister influences and domination on every small, helpless nation which they "liberated" or conquered, and unless we awaken and unite our common interests and common efforts to save our common country, we too shall be conquered.

The first right of man is his right to life, and it is to the glory of American history that his also are the rights to religious, political, and educational freedoms. It is to the shame of Communist history that it violates these rights with fanatical fury. A man may have a natural dislike for the symbolism of the cross or the significance of the star of David. He may be opposed to certain political beliefs, or he may prefer one educational system to another. But must he, as Communists do, spurn the sacred, revile and befoul those who differ from them, and, through persecution and blood baths, deprive them of their liberties and life?

We are the beneficiaries of the sacrifices of American soldiers who, throughout our life as a nation, have fought for our God-given rights, our religious, industrial, educational, and social freedoms, freedom of speech and of the press, and we, their heirs, must never surrender them. My daily prayer, my constant hope, and my lifelong work is toward the goal that all men everywhere may be free. Hatred has no place in my heart, but love of my country is in my heart and inspires me to defend America against any system of government that would wrench our rights from us and destroy our democracy.

America is not immortal. I have traveled from earth's end to end, and I have seen the ruins of great cities and countries, civilizations that were seemingly indestructible, yet ruined thrcugh internal decay, and we must not delude ourselves that we can go on forever despite our enemies, and, above all, despite ourselves. Economic, civic, and political injustices are common enough among us. We have had our material, intellectual, moral, and religious differences and difficulties. We have had our crises to meet and our sins to repent, for America is not a paradise of perfect souls. But our country has not lost her soul. As Joe Louis said, "There are lots of things wrong with America, but nothing that nazism can cure." And I say, "There is nothing wrong that communism can cure."

America is no safer from mastery by communism than was any European country. There we witnessed the killing and enslavement of whole peoples by Communists who, with the shedding of blood, have become as if drunken with it. In this atomic age of discord, with nations not alone divided against one another but against themselves, where men make mockery of the meaning and majesty of faith, America must continue to stand as the symbol and sanctuary of liberty, secure in the strength of her unity. Again and again our sons have been called upon to spend their youth, their dreams, their blood, their lives in war to preserve our liberties and bring freedom to imperiled peoples of the earth—to make the world itself free.

In my journeying to the battle fronts I was privileged to talk with hundreds of men in our armed forces. Many of them have come to visit me since they returned to America, and one of these boys is now trying, through his own deep faith, to restore his family's faith in God and his own trust in his country and his fellowman. God grant he will, for there is no other road to peace for the lone soul or for the mighty nations of the earth.

When this boy enlisted in the Navy he was very young—only 19. At home he had left a twin sister and a younger brother, both of whom he had helped to educate and support. When he returned, 4 years later, he was a man—all his youth drained from him by the crush of war. And he found—what? Let him tell you:

"No years of battle could ever match the agony, the treachery, the disillusionment of home. I lived through the bitter days and years of fighting—just to get home. And I found home outwardly the same, but strange and broken within. Only my mother was the same.

"Two years ago my sister left her job where she worked evenings; she left the college where she studied days. She told my mother she was a 'publicist.' Two months ago I investigated, and found she was one of a dozen girls trained to write anti-American propaganda for the Communist Party. And nothing I said, nor the heartbreak she could read in my face, impressed her. Millions like me had sacrificed years of our lives to keep America safe for millions like her, but that did not influence her, because the Communists, with their rosy promises, had eaten into her and corroded her heart and mind.

"But that was but a foretaste of the shame and misery I was to experience when my brother, only 12, refused to go to church with me. One Sunday it was a stomachache; another, it was an earache. At last he told me the truth. 'I don't believe in God,' he said in his angry, childish voice. 'Boys and girls laugh at me and call me the praying fool. They said they could prove you lied to me about God, just the way you did about Santa Claus.' "

Still in the wake of war, we shall be guilty of our sons' betrayal and America's destruction if we do not stop the lust-born hates of Communist bigotry and greed that are sweeping like scythes across our Nation's face. Only when each man, himself, lives and helps his fellowman to live by the "four freedoms" will the cruel grow merciful and just, the bigot turn his fierce, foul hates to tolerance and love, the lustful shed his pride and greed, and each shall be friend to all, the foe of none, and truly live America's plan.

There is no middle course between democracy and communism. Americans believe that all men are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights, while Communists deny the very existence of God and man's God-given rights. In our country's concepts the dignity of each man depends upon his spiritual independence, while communism's concept is seeded in materialism and rooted in tyranny. It attempts to cure one abuse by substituting another. Wherever communism appears, slavery reappears. America and Americans need only to look at the record and the wreckage of those bigoted governments and peoples who became gods and laws unto themselves, in order to be convinced of the nobility of our own free and democratic Government and life.

Would we who are accustomed to complete freedom for both the press and the publisher in America, would we want to read one type of news or listen to one radio broadcast, regardless of the paper we bought or the station into which we tuned? Wherever communism rules, the press conforms, or dies, and radio is an absolute state monopoly.

More than one-half the families in America own automobiles, for necessity, convenience, or pleasure. But there is one benefit of the automobile which probably never occurs to most of us: the opportunity to roam the country freely, to go from city to city, State to State, or cross international lines, with little difficulty. Where communism is in power, only the mighty own cars, and when they do, they rarely roam, for even they may be under the strict surveillance of dragnets of spies.

In America we are free to discuss, criticize, and advise our Government. Would we want to live under penalty of imprisonment, or even death, for expressing our opinion about it, or be forbidden to change our places of residence without the permission of the police?

Do you believe that any man who spent the best years of his life in the hell of war on foreign soils wants his children's training and education prescribed by any dictator? Do you think he wants himself and his family watched and regimented? Do you think he wishes his whole life and all his labors controlled by the State?

In America, if a worker belongs to a union, he can bargain collectively with his employer, and unless he is a member of communist-dominated union, he is free to argue with his fellow workers. If he is dissatisfied, he can go on strike. During the past year we have had hundreds of strikes, some of them prolonged and widespread. And because some strikes are harmful to the employer, the working man, the public, and the country, thoughtful men have sought peaceful ways for realizing the just demands of the worker. But one aspect of the strike situation is usually overlooked: Strikes are possible because workers are free. No employer can compel a worker to be at his job, not even when the Government is the employer.

When the American citizen goes to work, it is to a job of his own choice, though it may not be entirely to his liking. No human system is perfect, and even under ideal conditions wrong men are given authority. Leaders can abuse their power. Bureaucrats can become indifferent to the welfare of those who work for them. But we have democratic methods of solving our problems, while under communism strikes are forbidden because they are considered a form of revolutionary sabotage, and the state, which is the employer, demands blind obedience, the only key to survival.

If we want to protect America against the invasion of communism, we must act wisely and promptly to check its poison propaganda through the antitoxin of truth and patriotism. It is not for me to cut a perfect pattern of Americanism. Our founding fathers, our soldiers, our patriotic citizens down through the years of our Nation's life have formed this pattern and left to us the sacred trust of living and preserving it. Nor is it my duty to seek out those pseudo-Americans who would rob Americans of this heritage. That is the responsibility of informed and competent men in our Government who are aware of un-American activities. But I feel that I would not be a true American if I did not express my conviction that no American can dare to compromise with the crooked courses of communism, or surrender to it, without jeopardizing the security of our country. I feel that I would not be a true American if I entered into the conspiracy of silence and did not raise my voice above those who, privately and in whispers, talk about communism, but neither act nor speak publicly against this insidious enemy of Americanism.

Place of Central Valley in the Social Prospect of Southern California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 27, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks, I include herewith a paper presented by Paul S. Taylor, of the University of California, before a joint meeting of the Pacific Southwest Academy and Southern California Economics Association, held at Occidental College, June 15, 1946:

PLACE OF CENTRAL VALLEY IN THE SOCIAL PROSPECT OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

(Paper presented by Paul S. Taylor before joint meeting of the Pacific Southwest Academy and Southern California Economics Association, held at Occidental College June 15, 1946)

My thesis is this: That the quality of the future society of Southern California is being decided in substantial degree at the present time by or through people who live outside its boundaries. Specifically, my subject is the influence exercised over your social prospect by that interior basin of our State called the Great Central Valley of California. My method is to examine in detail and as under a microscope two or three significant aspects of the relations of Central Valley to the social prospect of southern California.

The legislature, in biennial convention, determines by giving or withholding its approval to bills, whether and on what side the weight of the State of California shall be thrown into the social issues which confront this southern area. Therefore, it seems appropriate to take up first the manner in which Central Valley influences the use of the power of the State to shape solutions to your problems.

Do assemblymen from Central Valley align themselves on the same side of social issues as assemblymen from southern California? Only those occasions when they disagree need concern us, for only then does external power from the Central Valley take solutions out of your own hands, and overrule your own opinion of the proper way to solve your problems. For examination, I have selected three record votes of the State assembly at its fifty-sixth session in 1945.

First, is the compulsory health-insurance bill proposed by the governor, which died when the assembly refused by vote of 38 to 39 to withdraw the measure from committee for consideration on the floor. Extensive public hearings had been held on this measure and the switch of a single vote would have been sufficient to bring health insurance into the light of public deliberation and a vote. Los Angeles assemblymen voted 20 to 12 in favor of taking up the health bill, and by a smaller margin all southern California was in favor. The Central Valley delegation, however, sealed its fate by voting overwhelmingly, 2 to 12, against taking the bill out of committee.

Second, with somewhat less decisiveness, but in similar fashion and with the same effect, Central Valley assemblymen helped draw the teeth of the full-employment bill when they declined to permit the State to use its power to finance development of natural resources as an instrument in support of a full-employment program. Third, they helped defeat the attempt to establish a fair-employment-practices commission. Although lively hearings had been held, and despite the strong favorable vote from southern California, the assembly failed to give the three-fourths vote required to bring the bill to the floor.

If political opinion in southern California was in agreement with opinion in Central Valley that the proper way to deal with the hazards of illness and unemployment, and with race discrimination, was to kill the bills, my thesis would be without support. But the record says that southern California assemblymen supported all three measures as progressive steps toward solutions, while assemblymen from Central Valley stood with the conservatives to block them.

Southern California, then, must face the fact that conservative opinion predominating in the Central Valley now stands in its way, as a bar to progressive attack on some important social questions.

If it is your purpose to shape your own social prospect, the necessity for reexamining your relations with Central Valley is even greater than so far I have suggested. You face in the valley not simply a political opinion which is more conservative than your own. You face a Central Valley upon which the voters of California have conferred extraordinary political power. By constitutional amendment passed 20 years ago, they gave 47 percent of the State senators—virtually half the power of the Senate—to the 18 percent of the people of the State who live in the valley (1945). By the same amendment they reduced the representation of southern California, now having more than one-half of the population, to less than one-quarter of the senators. And Los Angeles, now having 39 percent of the State's population, was given only 2½ percent of the State's senators. At those times when Central Valley political opinion on social questions differs from your own, its opposition in the assembly is serious enough; in the Senate its opposition is crushing.

How did this unbalance between representation and population come about? How did it win approval from the people in California? Let us look at the record.

Exactly 20 years ago someone realized that the legislature—with an inertia which legislators frequently exhibit—had refused during three successive sessions to redistrict the senate and assembly in proportion to population shown by the latest census, as provided in the State constitution of 1879. Urban centers had been growing rapidly in numbers, until in 1920 the three metropolitan counties of Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Alameda together, held just over one-half the population of the State. Particularly in Los Angeles people were becoming restive over the failure of the legislature to reapportion. Having only 8 Senators out of 40, they regarded themselves as grossly underrepresented in the senate, and similarly so in the assembly. Therefore some of your citizens placed an amendment to the constitution before the voters of the State—proposition No. 20—designed to accomplish reapportionment of both houses of the legislature in accord with population.

Simultaneously, an alternative proposal was placed before the electorate—proposition No. 28. This amendment retained representation in the assembly according to population but established representation in the Senate according to territory. It was given the name Federal plan, and sponsored to the voters by one of the distinguished political scientists of the State.

The voters of the State of California, notwithstanding that people from the metropolitan centers were in the majority, chose this second plan in open election, first in 1926 and again in 1928. By their choice they accomplished these results:

First, they reduced the representation of Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Alameda Counties, with 56 percent of the State's population, from 19 senators to 3 (population figures 1945).

Second, they raised representation of Central Valley, with only 18 percent of the State's population, to 19 senators, giving Central Valley practically half the entire membership of the Senate.

Third, they laid the foundation for sharp and enduring opposition between the two houses of the legislature. Accepting at face value, the argument by supporters of the Federal plan for checks and balances, they put them into effect, and not mildly. Each nonmetropolitan senator represents on the average 107,000 people (1945); each metropolitan senator represents 1,656,000 people. Thus each nonmetropolitan person, by reason of his place of residence, was given 16 times as much power in the State senate as each metropolitan resident.

The extreme result of the Federal plan is even more astonishing. It gives 11,000 people in Inyo and Mono Counties equal representation in the senate with 3,584,000 people in Los Angeles (1945). Thus, a vote for the senate from Inyo and Mono Counties is worth roughly 326 votes from Los Angeles.

The effect of this disparity in representation within the senate is not measured simply in statistical ratios of people to senators. Since no measure can be adopted without consent of both houses, each house exercises a veto on acts by the other. This fact gives the senate, representing territory, the power to bring any piece of legislation proposing to shape your social prospect, whether passed by the assembly or not, to a complete stop.

Leadership of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce foresaw clearly that obstruction would be the result of the Federal plan. In an article published in Southern California Business, President Arthur S. Bent made this prophecy:

"Apparently this plan will align the senate as a rural body against the assembly as an urban body. It will make it difficult for needed legislation of a State-wide character to pass with such a class deadlock established. * * * This would be nothing more or less than class distinction. * * * It is a matter pure and simple of being an injustice and serving as a means of causing costly deadlocks in the legislature * * * if the voters blindly cast their ballots for the Federal plan, they will be disfranchising themselves and will be creating a condition that would cause havoc in State legislation."

That far-sighted protest was published in October 1926, before chambers of commerce throughout the State made up their minds to support the Federal plan.

Has President Bent's prophecy of deadlock come true? Let us examine the record of some more bills intended to shape your social prospect. A bill to regulate child labor passed the assembly without dissenting vote. The senate killed it noiselessly by declining to withdraw it from committee. Central Valley senators, representing 9 percent of the population of the State, cast one-quarter of the senatorial vote against the motion, and the remaining nonmetropolitan areas, representing 11 percent of the State's population, cast another quarter, sufficient, with some senators not voting, to kill the motion. It was to no avail that senators representing 69 percent of the State's population voted to take up child-labor legislation. The political power, of only 20 percent of the people of the State, resting on "territory," was enough to block them.

Similarly, a measure to extend the maximum unemployment compensation benefits from 23 to 26 weeks, which passed the assembly with but three dissenting votes, was supported by the Los Angeles senator representing 39 percent of the State's population, and by senators representing all told 63 percent of the State's population. The measure was killed by senators representing only 36 percent of the State's population, but who represent what the "Federal plan" has made more important—a great deal of the State's territory. A bill passed unanimously by the assembly to assure men and women equal pay for equal work was killed in identical fashion.

Evidently the power to deadlock bills, exercised by senators representing few people and great stretches of territory in Central Valley—and in other nonmetropolitan areas for that matter—is fully as effective as the President of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce in 1926 anticipated. Without doubt, the device of senate apportionment by territory operates conservatively when solutions to social problems are proposed.

Whether "conservative" or "progressive" solutions to these problems which confront southern California—and the rest of us—are the "right" solutions is not within the scope of my paper. My thesis is simply that the "progressive" solutions which southern California generally appears to favor, if the votes of your assemblymen can be accepted as indicative, frequently are defeated by the opposed political opinion of the minority of people who live in Central Valley—and other nonmetropolitan areas—a minority opinion upon which the device of senate apportionment by territory has conferred a conclusive power.

How were the people of California, especially those in metropolitan areas, persuaded in 1926 and 1928 to vote for a constitutional device which deprived most of them so effectively of the power to prescribe solutions to their social problems?

Farm organizations found it easy to take positions favoring Senate apportionment by territory instead of by population. The argument against apportionment by population, published in the 1926 official election guide to voters carried the name of a prominent agricultural employer. Farm journals such as the Pacific Rural Press and California Cultivator gave voice to the cause of territory against population, and so did the press in Central Valley and in nonmetropolitan areas generally.

Of course, nonmetropolitan support alone was insufficient to carry an amendment requiring popular majority, when more than half the population of the State lived in three metropolitan counties about to be stripped of power. To help win this necessary metropolitan acquiescence three great metropolitan dailies lent their assistance: The Oakland Tribune, San Francisco Chronicle, and, in 1928, the Los Angeles Times.

The Federal plan was adopted in the election of 1926, and apportionment by population which had prevailed since 1879, was repudiated. Of the 58 counties, apparently only fast-growing Los Angeles wanted to retain the basis of population. When it came time to vote upon the Federal plan a second time, in 1928, the alignment of its supporters was even more solid. President Bent's stand for "population" against "territory" was not repeated. The Los Angeles Times changed over. The great organs of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and the California Development Association in San Francisco which circulated largely in the cities were silent; but the Pacific Rural Press carried the word that "the chambers of commerce of every county have endorsed" the Federal plan (November 3, 1928). The distinguished political scientist again, in company with two legislators, signed the official argument for the federal plan.

Opposition to Senate representation by "territory" came from a Los Angeles citizen's group and from the State Federation of Labor.

Arguments used to promote the Federal plan were various, not always consistent with each other, frequently confusing, frequently designed to appeal to prejudice—and evidently very persuasive in their net effect.

Let us turn once more to the record:

Official argument to voters signed by a large-scale agricultural operator declared that representation by population would "place the great centers of population, comprising but 3 percent of the State's area, in complete control of the State legislature, thus depriving the great rural sections of the State, comprising 97 percent of the State's area, of any effective voice in the State lawmaking body * * * and permitting a part of the population [i. e., a majority] to control the entire State, which is an intolerable situation." (C. C. Teague.)

Official argument by a leading political scientist stated: "It rests upon a principle widely recognized in American Government and other governments that representation is equitably apportioned not according to population alone, but according to two factors—population and territory." (David P. Barrows.)

The California Cultivator: "Upon this issue hangs the future of farm legislation * * * That city people and city politicians have no sympathy for those engaged in agriculture is all too plainly apparent * * * 97 percent of the State would be disfranchised or practically so were the cities to control both branches of the legislature * * *" (November 13, 1926). The Cultivator employed phrases such as: "whether or not the farmers of the State shall have any voice in our future legislative affairs;" "giving the agricultural counties equal representation with the more thickly populated counties," (October 16, 1926); "well-balanced legislature in which neither the cities nor the countryside may predominate;" "prevent the possibility of our State legislature being dominated by the corrupt element usually present in these population centers;" "fair and equal representation;" "clean Government and fair play" (October 27, 1926); "97 percent of the State with but a minority representation;" "furnish a safeguard in the senate;" "equitable distribution of legislative power;" (November 3, 1928); "the corrupt element of these large cities" (November 17, 1928).

The Pacific Rural Press: "The farmers of this State built the cities, brick by brick and backache by backache. They not only build and support these cities but they are consistently robbed there in dirty, dishonest, antiquated produce markets. Do the cities give a care? They do not.

"Not only this but the cities are filled with traps where the farmer's sons and daughters are in danger of being robbed of something more precious than money.

"There are good people in the cities, of course, many of them—a majority of them—and they are just as clean and fine as may be found anywhere, but they are not a vocal majority in politics.

"If anyone challenges this, let him explain why workers in pursuit of personal liberty are daily beaten by gangs of thugs in San Francisco, and no one is punished.

"Or he may consider Los Angeles, where the district attorney accuses the supervisors and the supervisors accuse the district attorney, and the Governor accuses the district attorney and the courts, and the people protest but do not act.

"In the coming election the issue is whether the entire political control shall be taken from the rural districts and their capitals—the small cities and towns—and be turned over to the big city bosses" (October 30, 1926).

"The rival plan of the Los Angeles politicians provides for dividing the senate on the basis of population, just as the assembly is now divided. If this plan carries, the balance of power definitely passes into the hands of the Los Angeles politicians.

"It would seem that everyone in San Francisco would be for distributing power in the senate instead of centering it in the hands of the Los Angeles bosses, but politics makes strange bedfellows, and as the newspaper said regarding the suicide, the bullet penetrated his skull and lodged in the woodwork.

"Certain interests in San Francisco oppose it because they would lose six senators in the shuffle. Apparently they would rather lose all power than part with a modicum of patronage" (October 23, 1926).

"Federal plan reapportionment deprives the big city politicians of a few places at the public trough" (November 3, 1928).

From the Central Valley, the Bakersfield Californian: "We can understand that members of organized labor in San Francisco and Los Angeles and Alameda might be influenced * * * but no sound argument can be advanced with appeal to labor in other sections of the State to pursue a similar course" (October 2, 1928). "The influence of the powerful San Francisco unions * * * ought not to weigh with the toilers here in the San Joaquin Valley. It happens that in this instance, what is good for San Francisco and Los Angeles and Alameda is not good for Kern" (November 2, 1928). "* * * if labor is looking after its own best interests it has pretty accurate information as to whether or not senators out of Los Angeles are likely to be for them or against them * * *" "Labor is consistently for home rule; certainly labor in California does not desire to see the county of Los Angeles occupying too important a place in the framing of laws for the entire State" (October 6, 1928).

The Oakland Tribune: "Erroneously, the proposal has been called one of the country versus the large cities; erroneously because some of the foremost workers for the [Federal plan] proposal are residents of the metropolitan areas. If the [Federal] plan is adopted Alameda, San Francisco, and Los Angeles Counties will have one Senator each, just as will the other counties of the State, save a few which will be combined to make a district. * * * On the other hand, if [apportionment by population] is approved, the three largest counties will have the majority in both Houses and there will be no check or balance. * * * Practically, it might be argued that Alameda County, under the [Federal] plan, will lose three senators. On the other hand, it will have an equal representation in the Senate with San Francisco and Los Angeles. [Apportionment by population] would mean a big city legislature with one center, Los Angeles, controlling one-third of the vote. (October 23, 1926.) The Federal plan gives the largest counties control of the assembly and equal voice with other counties in the Senate. If the majority rule agitation were sincere there would be an effort today to change the make-up of the United States Senate." (October 27, 1928.)

The San Francisco Chronicle: "The hard losers [of 1926] are a certain element in Los Angeles that want that city to control the legislature in both houses. They have the sympathy and cooperation of certain politicians who would like to control both houses through controlling the delegations from the two big cities. [The Federal plan is] fair to both cities and the county districts." (October 17, 1928.)

In 1926 the Los Angeles Times, like the president of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, fought against the Federal plan, but by 1928 it had switched position along with the chamber of commerce. It advised its readers to accept the Federal plan which the voters of the county, in accordance with its advice, had rejected in 1926, and largely on technical grounds of the procedural difficulty of restoring apportionment by population, the Times counseled that they now accept the Federal plan.

In 1940 the Times reiterated its support of the Federal plan: "California's Senate is dominated by representatives of her agricultural areas; the assembly by men from urban and industrial communities. This establishes a balance for the compromise of conflicting interests for which, in the light of experience, it would be hard to find a satisfactory substitute." (January 22, 1940.)

One of the purposes of this paper has been, by examining the record of the 1945 legislature, in a legislative program to deal with social problems to find out how and at what points that balance for the compromise of conflicting interests is struck.

Among people who live in the Central Valley, and more or less unconsciously exercise the great power which senate apportionment by territory has placed in their hands, an issue of growing prominence is how best to develop the water resources upon which the valley depends. Whether to develop these resources through a single agency or several, and how to distribute the benefits of publicly developed power and irrigation water are questions which seem more important to people in Central Valley than whether or not the State had laws providing for stricter child-labor regulation, equal pay for equal work, extended unemployment compensation benefits, an FEPC, or even a strong full-employment bill and compulsory health insurance.

There is a progressive side and a conservative side to the issues of Central Valley water development, just as there are progressive and conservative sides to proposed solutions for your social problems in southern California. The great issues of Central Valley water development are threefold:

1. Shall development be unified, or shall single-stream plans by two or more agencies with differing purposes be put together to make a whole? The progressive solution is unified development; the conservative solution is to use the plans of various agencies.

2. Shall publicly generated power be transmitted over public lines to public distribution agencies as a device to obtain cheaper power, or shall the power be sold or transmitted over private utility lines in a way so as to merge it into present rate structure and levels? The progressive answer is the former; the conservative answer the latter.

3. Shall the 160-acre water limitation be maintained to promote family farms by reduction of land speculation and land monopoly, or shall it be repealed as a disturbance to the existing land economy of the Valley? The progressive answer is to retain the 160-acre water limitation and the conservative answer is to scrap it.

No one would say that those who vote progressive on one or two issues will do so on all; or that those who vote conservative on one or two will vote conservative on all. Exceptions can be named too easily. Yet it is plain that a tendency in that direction exists. With knowledge of the issues which now divide the people of the valley, you can chart your course. If, as the votes of assemblymen from southern California suggest, your people prefer progressive solutions to your own problems, and you wish to avoid obstruction of these solutions by votes from the Central Valley, you will take steps to encourage progressive solutions of the water problem of the valley. If, on the other hand, you prefer conservative attitudes toward your own problems, you will welcome the existing condition.

On the 28th of May 1946 the San Francisco News published a dispatch from Washington. Under the headline "Valley large land owners win another victory," the dispatch told how "big owners of the Central Valley" who "have frothed and foamed" over some research in the valley made by the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics, are about to see the achievement of the end they desired, viz, the curbing of research by the BAE. "They saw red when the valley study was mentioned during the fight of Representative A. J. ELLIOTT to repeal the 160-acre provision of the Reclamation Act," said the News. "Since then, ELLIOTT has fought appropriations for all farm research, including farm censuses."

I refer to this dispatch by way of explanation why in a paper on the Central Valley I place the following details under microscope for your critical consideration. The influence of Central Valley upon you is not confined to votes in the legislature, even when those votes are amplified on the principle of apportionment by territory.

The temper of political opinion in the valley can either promote or obstruct the use of those methods of fact gathering and analysis. Since this is a gathering under the auspices of scholars in the social sciences, it is pertinent to take note how, from the heat generated by Central Valley issues and by similar issues elsewhere, men seek to place obstructions in the way of using those methods of investigation which represent our professional contribution to the better understanding and amelioration of social situations; how they attempt, by the withholding or offering of Government appropriations and by legislative rider, to warp the direction of study and seek none too subtly to corrupt the professional integrity of our colleagues in Government service.

Once more, a look at the record.

In the summer of 1944, while Congressman ELLIOTT from Central Valley was trying to repeal the 160-acre water limitation, the regional office of the United States Bureau of Agriculture Economics undertook a field study of two valley towns, Arvin and Dinuba, the former based upon large-scale farms, the latter upon family farms. The purpose was to measure some of the differences between rural communities founded upon large-scale and those founded upon smaller-scale farms.

The study produced clean-cut results: 1. The proportion of business and professional people in Dinuba, the town resting on family farms, was double that of Arvin. 2. The proportion of farm operators in Dinuba was threefold the proportion in Arvin. 3. The proportion of landless agricultural laborers in Dinuba was less than half the proportion in Arvin, shrunk to only 29 percent instead of 65 percent. 4. The volume of local business based on virtually the same value of agricultural production, was 70 percent greater in Dinuba, the community founded upon family farms.

The mere prospect of results from such a study was sufficient to touch off blasts of opposition. Over the radio, people in the valley were warned that the study would be used to oppose repeal of the 160-acre water limitation, and were advised to refuse cooperation to the Government investigators. The questionnaire and investigators were pilloried as silly, and wasteful of manpower, paper, gasoline, and rubber in wartime. The author of the Elliott rider spread the questionnaire in its entirety upon pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, heaping abuse upon it. Fulton Lewis, Jr., told what he called "a little bedtime story" over national radio during which he read the five-page questionnaire over the air, intending to disparage the study with ridicule. The columnist George E. Sokolsky wrote about it, and a Michigan Congressman inserted the column into the RECORD. In this manner, the attack on the investigation was spread over the country, and people were urged to write the BAE for copies of the "silly" questionnaire.

None of those who so zealously broadcast disparagement and opposition to research, told what serious questions the investigation was designed to answer; none of them, so far as discovered, have made the slightest mention of its impressive results. The immediate effect of this political furor was certainly confusing to the public, but not harmful to the study. Of 451 persons who requested copies of the questionnaire, probably in response to the antagonistic publicity, only about 7 percent came from Central Valley where the study was made; most came from eastern cities. Only a half dozen people who were approached in the two valley communities declined to cooperate in providing information required to complete the investigation.

For those who hold to the integrity of professional research and believe in the value of its contribution to the solution of social problems, other results of this puffed-up attack on research are harder to view charitably.

A steadily growing hostility to research as carried on by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics has recently come to focus in a bill which at this moment is cutting drastically its appropriation for economic investigations. By the terms of a rider attached to that bill, social scientists attached to this Bureau, one of the greatest social and economic research agencies of the country, are forbidden specifically to use any portion of the 1947 appropriation "for conducting cultural surveys." The House version of the bill forbade all "social surveys," in the exact language requested by the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. The Senate version gave the respective land-grant colleges a veto over any Federal Bureau of Agricultural Economics investigation in the States. This astonishing abdication of Federal responsibility was struck out in conference, but that any such proposal could pass a committee of the United States Senate is warning of the lengths to which some Members of the National Congress are prepared to encroach upon the integrity of professional research.

A Congressman now complains that the BAE has not been wholeheartedly the servant of agriculture as it should have been. Another Congressman objects that the Bureau of Agricultural Economics has so much as seriously studied an alternative to the agricultural program designed to hold up farm commodity prices. A member of the powerful Appropriations Committee uses his position to deliver this warning: "I resisted efforts to decrease an appropriation some years ago and have always thought that sufficient funds ought to be provided for you; but during the last year or two a suspicion has grown up in my mind that you may not be working for the farmer; you may be working more for the consumer of agricultural products; * * * I am just not convinced in my own mind that your purpose is to help the farmer." (House hearing on agricultural appropriation bill, 1947, January 17, 1946.) In other words, our colleagues are told to find by their studies what is wanted, or else. Now they are facing the "or else", for the ax has fallen.

Of course, any such view of the place of scientific research as this, if it is to prevail for long, will defeat even the interests of those who advance it, for the results produced by any research agency which accepted it would soon be discredited in the eyes of a public apprised of the condition. But in the meantime, the corrosion and the mistakes will do incalculable damage.

My reason for presenting these details of lobbying pressure on research by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics is not only the nature of this gathering, which cannot ignore attacks upon our profession, but because in the forces behind them, Central Valley issues play a part. Pressure groups disturbed that research may not support high prices for farm commodities, or may find in favor of family farms and against industrialized farms in Central Valley, these are the forces that would place our colleagues in leading strings and harness our elected framers of public policy with blinders.

Health insurance: The vote selected to represent this issue (roll call 73) was on the Governor's health bill (A. B. 800). The vote was on a motion to withdraw the bill from committee to permit action on the floor. Failing to secure a majority on this vote, the bill died in committee. "Progressive" means votes in favor of the compulsory health bill; "conservative" means votes against it. 3 assemblymen did not vote.

Full employment: The vote selected to represent this issue was (roll call 57) on an amendment to weaken the full-employment bill (A. B. 2136) by declining to permit the State to finance natural-resource development when needed to secure full employment. "Progressive" means votes for a "strong" bill; "conservative" means votes for a "weak" bill. 7 assemblymen did not vote.

FEPC: With a three-fourths vote needed to pass, the assembly voted not to consider the bill (roll call 65). 3 assemblymen did not vote.

Assembly had passed motion 64 to 0.

Italy's Chance Fair, Bellamy Believes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the fifteenth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

Our European trip had originally been intended to end at Vienna, but at the request of several members of the party the Secretary of War consented to let the C–54 continue with the party to Trieste, Rome, and London before returning home, and this was the plan eventually followed.

I did not make as careful a study of the Italian situation as of the German and Austrian. We went to Europe primarily to study the occupation job being done by the United States Army in Germany and Austria, so that in a sense the trips to Rome and London were on our own.

But while we are on the subject let me sketch briefly what has happened to Italy.

On July 10, 1943, the United States and United Kingdom began a great military government experiment, democratic style, when civil affairs officers disembarked with the armies on the landing beaches of Sicily in the first breaching of the Axis forces of Europe.

The military government teams that went into Sicily were military units. The Allied Control Commission set up by General Eisenhower was also a military unit. The commission is still a military unit. It is part of the Allied forces in the Mediterranean theater, operating under the direct supervision of Allied forces headquarters and following the directives of the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

To gain its objective, the Allied commission established a national headquarters which always sits at the seat of the Italian Government.

As the Allied armies progressively freed more and more of the Italian Nation the Allied military government ran through various states: Initial military government, control under armistice terms, sympathetic supervision of cobelligerency, and lastly and most recently, guidance of a nation virtually restore to full sovereignty.

From the first the Allied Control Commission had to confront the two recurrent demands: The sheer practical need of food and the no less insistent appeal from the Italian Government and people for recognition and sympathetic encouragement of their desire for a new and democratic life.

Allied troops entered Rome on June 4, 1944, a little less than a year from the landing in Sicily. They found complete chaos. Although the city had been spared from Allied bombing and German depredations, the water pressure was low because of the damage to the main acqueduct feeding the city. Hydroelectric plants which supplied power and light for Rome had been thoroughly destroyed by the Germans, and there was very little electricity. The food was the principal problem. In fact, food trucks went in with the advancing AMG parties and 350 tons a day were moved steadily from the stock pile at Anzio to feed the population's 1,400,000 ration cardholders, swollen by refugees estimated at 200,000 to 300,000.

UPHILL FIGHT

There is not time or space to detail the uphill but successful fight which the occupying forces made to reestablish orderly life in Italy. There were times when the food supply was pitifully inadequate. The League of Nations health committee recommended in 1936 that 2,400 calories a day should be the caloric intake of a man or woman living in a temperate climate and not engaged in manual labor. Why there was not widespread starvation in Italy is a miracle.

There were some 24,000,000 persons to feed in southern and central Italy before the final campaign. Of these 18,000,000 could be classed as normal consumers, while special classes made up the rest. The ration scales differed for the latter categories. Normal consumers received from 822 to 906 calories in the foodstuffs allocated by ration cards and bought in the controlled market when available, which, unhappily, was not always the case. In September 1942, the daily caloric value of food bought by ration card was 1,600. In June 1944, when the Allies entered Rome, it was 510 calories. The rationed calories increased in July 1944 to 720, and in March 1945 had reached 904.

The special classes fared better. For example, hospital patients got 2,081 a day, and there were 181,000 patients listed.

On the whole, thanks to the natural resiliency of the Italian temperament and the intelligent work done by the Allied Control Commission, the Italians now seem in a fair way to work out their problem, although food will always be the most difficult problem of all.

Although one should avoid making generalization, it is only fair to say that the impression the Italians made on me was a pleasing one. There is so much sunny good cheer in the average Italian that it will not disappear completely even under the most gloomy circumstances, and so it was not surprising to find street singers solo mioing their way all over Rome, in spite of empty stomachs.

The Italians demonstrated a fatal weakness in their surrender to fascism and its first apostle, Mussolini, but it is impossible for the visitor to feel that their conversion to the chief Black Shirt's philosophy was as deep as that of the Germans to Hitler. They are a lighthearted people, tossed about on the winds of ebullient fancy. One can blame them severely, but not despair of their ultimate salvation.

When it comes to considering them as very permanent additions to the resolute democracies of the world, such as Britain and America, however, that is another matter.

GREATER THAN DESCRIPTION

Now let us talk about Rome, the eternal city, which everyone ought to visit sometime in his life if he can possibly arrange to do it.

The first afternoon there I spent meandering with two of my companions through the Colosseum and Forum. He would be a fool who would try to describe these great monuments of human glory after the famous writers who have described the scene from Byron down.

It is proper to say, however, that Rome is one of the few cities in the world which seems the greater on an actual visit than from any previous description which might be made of it.

To a historically minded person Rome is possibly the greatest city of them all. Here merged all the civilizations which preceded Rome, and here Rome forged a civilization of her own. Here is the greatest full-length portrait extant of the rise of a great nation and its slow decline and dissolution. Here is the perfect clinical laboratory for a democrat to study the causes which lead to the rise and the decline of democracies.

God help him if he, like me, seems to detect in our western democracy some of the signs of decay which led to Caesar Augustus. I sincerely hope and pray that I am wrong about this, and I apologize for bringing in this subject by the heels, but one can't help thinking about fundamental causes when standing in the Roman Forum.

WILD DOGS STILL HOWLING

I thought also about the mutability of all human institutions, including the institution of property. I thought of how the fat, well-oiled, and perfumed senators lolled around the baths of Hadrian on a lazy afternoon and discussed their investment in some aqueduct. One might well have said to another: "I believe public utilities are the soundest investment. I have just put a large sum into that new aqueduct bringing water to the city. Nothing can ever destroy the value of this investment." And yet the wild dogs have howled over the ruins of that aqueduct for a thousand years.

The next morning our party was taken for a private audience with the Pope. It was most impressive. I am not a Catholic, but nevertheless I could not help thinking very seriously about the vital position of the Catholic Church in the present world.

For the Pope himself, as a man, one can have nothing but the sincerest admiration, because he is a sincere man himself. Spare, with black eyes, he is distinctly the spiritual and not the fleshly type. He read to our group in excellent English an address about the duty of the press in a modern world, with which we all agreed. He then shook hands with each of us, the Catholics in the party kissing the ring.

The Vatican is one of the most marvelous buildings in the world, so far as art and art objects are concerned. Priceless paintings and sculptures fill every room. The Swiss Guard is the most colorful organization of its sort in the world, of course, and the procession from the main anteroom, where one waits before an audience, through 10 or 12 antechambers leading to the actual audience chamber, is a never-to-be-forgotten experience.

After the audience with the Pope we were taken to the Sistine Chapel, one of the architectural gems of the entire world.

All in all, Rome leaves an indelible impress on the mind.

That afternoon, after the visit to the Pope, we took an automobile ride around Rome and crossed the Tiber several times. I could not take the time to go to the spot where brave Horatius held the bridge, but was told that everything was there except the bridge. The river itself was full, but not in flood. It seems incredible in the days of long-range artillery and airplanes that a stream as narrow as this could have turned back a mighty army under Lars Porsena, back to the hills of Tuscany.

One of the pleasant happenings in Rome was my meeting with Maj. John P. Leacacos, long of the Plain Dealer staff, who has now been in the Army for about 3 years, stationed all of that time in Italy. He showed me about the shops and I found him most instructive and amusing. On my part I was able to give him a fill-in on the home news. He has a 3-year-old son in Cleveland whom he had never seen.

Hon. Harry Wilderman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARDIN PETERSON
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, during World War II, a great number of our citizens served on selective service boards throughout the country, taking their time in a heart-aching and thankless job. On January 21, 1946, the President of the United States awarded the Selective Service Medal to one member from each State who had been selected to have the award made in Washington. Later the medals were awarded to those who served throughout the country.

The Florida member selected was Hon. Harry Wilderman who, himself, was a veteran of the First World War, a member of the Three Hundred Twenty-fourth Infantry, Eighty-first (Wildcat) Division, serving with this outfit overseas as regimental supply sergeant. He has been active in the American Legion from the beginning and was post commander for 3 years. He has served as president of the Ybor City Chamber of Commerce and was one of the organizers and served as treasurer of the Verbena del Tabacco.

The award to him was not only an honor to this distinguished citizen but to many others like him in our State. The President, at the time the award was made, expressed his appreciation in the following remarks:

It is a very great pleasure and privilege to me today to be able to help honor you gentlemen for a thankless job well done. One gentleman who came up here wanted to know from me whether this medal would help him get by St. Peter as he had been told so often to go to the other place. He thought he ought to have some means of getting into heaven. I am very sure that this will help him get to heaven, and I advised him very strenuously under no circumstances to go to the other place, because in all probability those same people who told him to go there would be there to meet him. Another one of these able gentlemen told me that he thought I would have plenty of experience in the pin-up business. I thought I was rather too old for that, I told him, but if some of these younger men wanted some experience, this would be a good place to get it. You have done a job that was not a happy one, but which was absolutely essential for the winning of the war. You still have a job to do in assisting these veterans when they return from war to peace. And after that job is done and completed, you will have in all probability a chance to help implement a military training program which has been recommended to the Congress by the President. That also will be a job which I hope will contribute to the peace of the world and to the stability of the United States Government. We are having many troubles now, as you know, as a result of turmoil and dissatisfaction with wages and hours and conditions of work. But I am not a pessimist. I think that this country is too great to allow personal disturbances and interior turmoil to prevent us from enjoying what I consider to be the greatest age in the history of the world. I am not alarmed at the necessity for assuming the responsibility to see that atomic energy is used for peace instead of for war. I am not alarmed at any condition with which this great Government of ours is faced. Any nation which could organize for war, as this peace-loving Nation did organize for war, and make the immense contribution which we made to that great undertaking is not going to fail in the contribution that it has to make for the peace.

I want to thank you gentlemen again, in the name of the Government of the United States, for the contribution which you have made toward the winning of this great war.

Congress Has Approved 196 Laws Affecting Veterans and Their Dependents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the magnitude of the veterans' problems is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that the Seventy-sixth, Seventy-seventh, Seventy-eighth, and Seventy-ninth Congresses enacted 196 laws affecting veterans and their dependents.

These measures were approved since September 16, 1940, up to the closing days of the Seventy-ninth Congress, which adjourned on Friday, August 2, 1946.

During the Seventy-sixth Congress, 8 laws were passed; during the Seventy-seventh Congress, 64 laws were approved; in the Seventy-eighth Congress, 67 laws were placed on the statute books; and in the Seventy-ninth Congress, which has just closed, 57 laws were approved.

For the benefit of American veterans everywhere and other persons interested in laws affecting veterans and their dependents, I ask permission to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the complete list of the laws approved.

This list of laws and the history of this legislation was compiled by G. H. Birdsall, legislative assistant at the Veterans' Administration, and was distributed by Members of Congress through the courtesy of Earle Chesney, veterans' liaison officer on Capitol Hill.

Anyone particularly interested in securing one or several copies of these laws may write to his Congressman or United States Senator.

I invite the veterans and other citizens of the Ninth District—northwestern Minnesota—who are interested in any particular measure, or several of them, to direct their requests to me. Just write a card or letter to United States Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN, 205 Post Office Building, Crookston, Minn.

The chart of the veterans' legislation follows:

Our country has been a haven for the oppressed since its beginning. Our founding ancestors came here because they believed in freedom and were willing to risk the unknown to win freedom of thought, of action, and of worship. Today the United States is the richest and most powerful country in the world. When I say that, I say it very humbly, because it means that we must live up to all the responsibilities which wealth and power impose.

We have fought and won the most devastating war in history. We fought it, not for glory but that we might continue to live in a world where democracy, our way of life, could and would be maintained.

Through no fault of their own, but because of Nazi brutality and terrorism, there are thousands upon thousands of displaced persons in Europe; men, women, and children torn from their homes; their homes only too often a pile of rubble in a waste of fields where once there was a village. Many, tragically many, of these people have no family left, nowhere to go, no ties to which then can cling while rebuilding their broken lives.

We hear, and quite properly hear, a great deal about the displaced Jewish people. We are asking, and quite properly asking, that 100,000 of them be given entry to Palestine. But we must remember the many others, the Poles, the Hungarians, the displaced people from all the countries between Germany and Russia, the Greeks who have been starved and mistreated. I need not enumerate each group.

As far as is possible displaced persons should and are being returned to their original homes. But there will still be left many who have no place to which to return. From knowledge of my own district I realize that many Americans of Polish, Greek, and Italian ancestry, to name just the more numerous groups in my own district, have relatives among the displaced persons. They are anxious to bring these relatives to the United States. Under our quotas we would normally have received over 100,000 more immigrants than we did in fiscal 1945–46. Surely we can afford to permit this same number of displaced persons to come to our country to work and live. Our consular officers are experienced in the granting of visas. We can be confident that they will grant entry only to individuals who will give as well as gain from life in America.

Not only would such action save untold human suffering. It will be one more step toward solving the problems of settling Europe, and of lessening the necessity for large forces of occupation. It will be proof to the world that we are more than willing to pay the necessary price of peace, the price of tolerance, of humanitarian understanding, and of realistic use of our riches to the end of world-wide freedom, justice, and peace.

German Press Is Not Free, Bellamy Says

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the fourteenth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

Since my return to America I have been asked by so many as to the present status of the German press that I am venturing to write an article on the subject.

Possibly I am doing so because all newspapermen believe that an honest flow of information to the people of a country is a prerequisite to the democratic way of life.

It is a well-known fact there was no free press in Germany under Hitler and that he, like all other tyrants on their way up to power, moved in on the free press early in his operations, because he knew that he could not succeed in his design to set up an absolutist state if there were a free press. This has been the invariable pattern of the road to despotism.

But one would be less than frank if he did not hasten to add that there is no free press in Germany now, in the sense that a German editor can say what he pleases, as an American editor can.

And I do not see how there can be until the active elements of nazism have been completely liquidated from the German scene and the danger of that country's falling back into such a foul philosophy has been eliminated.

Some of the members of our party expressed regret over this fact and had to be reminded that we had just won a war against a relentless, resourceful, cunning, and cruel foe.

HEIGHT OF FOLLY

One of these fine Americans, acting on the generous impulse which we all feel, asked how on earth we could expect to inculcate principles of democracy in a defeated nation when we, by our own acts, denied them some of the fundamental trappings of democracy, such as the free press and free elections. But the answer given was the one I have indicated above, that they are not ready for it yet and that it would certainly be the height of folly for the American conquerors to permit a Nazi-controlled press to rise in Germany and become a rallying point of a great Nazi rebellion.

Similarly, in the matter of the civil government set up in Germany. The original burgomasters and oberburgomasters, the original ministers president, the officers of the Laenderrat Cabinet, were all picked by the victor. It has been a source of great satisfaction to the American who labored so hard to reconstitute civil government that a large percentage (I believe the figure is over 80 percent of the burgomasters chosen by the American commanders were re-elected by their fellow Germans in the first free elections held since Hitler assumed power).

And yet the elections are not really free, and can never be free while the army of a foreign power is present in Germany.

UNPLEASANT BUSINESS

We may as well admit all this. It is part of the unpleasant business of ruling conquered countries. But we have either got to go through with it and put our squeamishness to one side or allow someone else to do it who will not be squeamish at all.

In American-occupied Germany there are at present 32 licensed daily newspapers, that is, licensed by the American commanders, with a total daily circulation of 4,131,814. They are divided among papers in Bavaria, having a circulation of 1,793,086; in Greater Hesse, of 940,760; in Wurtenberg-Baden, of 844,975; in Berlin, 400,000, and in Bremen, 152,933.

The towns which now have licensed daily newspapers are as follows: Aschaffenburg, 2; Augsburg, 2; Bamberg, 3; Bayreuth, 1; Coburg, 2; Garmish-Partenkirchen, 1; Hof, 2; Ingolstadt, 1; Kempten, 2; Landshut, 2; Munich, 3; Nuernberg, 1; Passau, 1; Regensburg, 1; Rosenheim, 2; Wuerzburg, 2; Darmstadt, 2; Frankfort, 3; Fulda, 1; Giessen, 2; Kassel, 5; Marburg, 2; Wetzlar, 2; Wiesbaden, 2; Heidelberg, 3; Heilbronn, 2; Karlsruhe, 2; Stuttgart, 3; Ulm, 3; Berlin, 4; Bremen, 1.

The best statement on the aims of the American military government in handling the press problem in Germany is to be found in a speech made on April 14 by Brig. Gen. Robert A. McClure, director of the information control office of the military government in Germany in connection with the granting of a license to one of the 32 licensed newspapers in the American zone, namely, the Frankfurter Neue Presse.

ENCOURAGEMENT OFFERED

"Freedom of speech and a free press are things which Germans have not had in their recent history; they do not have them now, and they will not have them in a complete sense in the immediate future," he said. "But they will be given means and encouragement to develop them. For example, bodies of German experts are eventually to be set up, to act independently of German governmental agencies, to assume the administration of licensing and other operational matters in the field of information control so long as such licensing is necessary.

"But military government directives will continue to define policies and military government authority will continue to enforce them. Furthermore, at military government direction, the drafting of a law, based on a reinforced version of article 118 of the Weimar constitution, guaranteeing a fundamental freedom of expression, but outlawing libelous material, is being undertaken in the Laenderrat. This is all in accordance with the Potsdam agreement.

"We look forward to the time when German information services will be completely free of administrative controls and will be subject only to general provisions of denazification and to such laws guaranteeing freedom of expression as I have just mentioned."

NO SUBSIDY WANTED

"Democratic methods of thought and the American journalistic standard of factual, honest reporting, with a complete divorcement of news from editorial opinion, are among the things we want to see in the new German press. But there are some things, too, which we do not want to see. Obviously, they are headed by the ideas to which we are inflexibly opposed and against which we fought and won the greatest war in history: nazism, racism, militarism, and the belief that the individual is nothing and the state is everything. But there are other things which we also do not want to see. We do not want a subsidized or controlled press in any form, certainly not by government, but also not by possible pressure groups, whether political parties, industry, or church. We would like to see the German press politically intelligent and politically outspoken and coherent, but we do not want German newspapers subsidized. For there it loses its freedom at the very beginning. In such cases (and at present these cases are in the majority) where there is only one newspaper in a community, we believe that it should make its space available to all parties; in fact, no newspaper can call its news columns honest and unbiased unless they report conflicting phases of political opinions and action.

"I must also state my strong belief that there is no space in the German press of today for name calling and mud slinging. That is not only because of physical limitation—four- and six-page newspapers need every column inch for the reporting of the news of their communities, of Germany, and the world—but it is also a moral fact; a fact based on principle The power and prestige of the new German press will suffer heavy damage if the tactics of yellow journalism are in any way adopted.

A REFLECTION OF LIFE

"I have said that newspapers ought to report accurately the news of their communities. They must do more than that; they should reflect the life and the needs of their communities. They should be a living, driving force working for the social good. To assume leadership in civic affairs, to point out evils, to help reconstruction, to encourage people to improve themselves and their communities; those are duties of a free press, whose editors must regard themselves both as leaders and as servants of the people.

"The thing with which we are most concerned now is the beginnings—we want the seed to be planted and to develop. We want to see German editors and publishers use real journalistic initiative and enterprise—the inquiring and critical mind is the hallmark of all great editors and reporters. We do not want blind acceptance of surface facts; they should be dug into and examined so that in the end the essential truth is produced. For example, simply because an item comes from DANA, the official news agency, it need not be treated as the gospel, incontrovertible truth; it should be questioned, critically examined. That is the very spirit of good journalism.

"In America, the free press is a sacred trust of the Nation as a whole and a free newspaper is a sacred trust of its publisher, its editors, its reporters. In granting a license to the Frankfurter Neue Presse I am passing this trust on to you and I regard the act very much in the light of a symbolic passing on of the torch of democracy. I hope and believe that Germans here and elsewhere will use this trust intelligently and with a solemn sense of civic responsibility as a means of liberating their minds from the ideas which for so many years have dominated and oppressed them."

IN NO MAN'S LAND

Certainly no American can cavil at this statement of objectives. The American commanders make a strong point of the fact that there is no censorship prior to publication in the German press, but that the utterances of the German newspapers are carefully scrutinized and the offenders promptly brought to book.

No, this is not a free press. It is a press in the no man's land between the absolutely controlled press under absolutism and the free press in democracy. Whether it ever progresses beyond this no man's land will depend on the Germans themselves. That is, always provided America stands by her word and remains in Europe to see the job through.

The Office of Information Control also handles periodicals, books, and the radio.

In the comparatively brief period of the occupation to date, the radio has been rehabilitated to the extent that almost complete broadcast coverage has been effected for the United States zone. Our forces found studios destroyed and transmitters blown up, and under these conditions rebuilt the stations and operated them.

At present, the radio in the American zone of Germany is strictly controlled by Americans. It has not been thought wise as yet to entrust any German or group of Germans with the complete management of a radio station and access to the air.

It is axiomatic that all Germans specially qualified for radio were automatically disqualified because of an active part in the Nazi Party. Germans who operated under the Nazis and who were forced out for political reasons will have to be given almost as much training as novices. It is inconceivable that technically qualified radio executives, writers, producers, and technicians can be fully trained in the short period of a year or two. And it is equally inconceivable that these same Germans can be fully reeducated and cleaned of Nazi doctrines in less than a score of years.

Schools, press, periodicals, radio, and motion pictures, which are also under the control of the Director of Information, are all part of the general problem of reeducation. It is one of the most challenging as well as one of the toughest parts of our job in Germany.

China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday July 27, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include a radio broadcast by Mr. Sumner Welles, former Under Secretary of State, made on Sunday, July 28, 1946. Mr. Welles has clearly stated the facts as I believe them to be in China today.

The news from China this week is exceedingly grave. Reports are coming in that major hostilities have broken out on the northern side of the Yangtse River between the armies of the Central Government and the Communist forces. Some of these clashes have even taken place in the neighborhood of Shanghai and within a few miles of Nanking, the capital of the National Government. The effect which this development may have upon the interests of the American people could hardly be overestimated in its potential significance.

For four generations China has been the scene of a continuing struggle between the major powers for political and economic predominance.

Throughout this long history of the exploitation and domination of the Chinese people the United States has stood out as the one major power which consistently upheld the principle of the open door and consistently maintained that the independence and integrity of the Chinese people must be preserved.

Any civil war in China, particularly under present world conditions, inevitably offers the opportunity to one major power or another to seek through such a conflict the means of establishing its own predominant influence within China, and to obtain a strangle hold over the political and economic life of the Chinese people.

It was for that reason that President Roosevelt throughout his term of office, foreseeing that China would probably be disrupted by contending factions after the defeat of Japan, persistently pursued a policy intended, through the exercise of friendly American assistance, to promote Chinese unity and to help the Chinese people during the transition period after the war to get firmly upon their own feet and be afforded the chance, without outside interference, to establish a unified and representative national government.

As we all know, the civil war which now impends in China is not like those which have so often disrupted China in the past. This is not a civil war brought about by Chinese war lords in control of provinces and fighting between themselves in order to extend their regional supremacy. This is the result of two conflicting political forces which have sought for control for nearly 20 years. China's greatest modern statesman, the progressive and revolutionary leader, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, succeeded in establishing the control over China of the republican government created by the Kuomintang Party. After his death, the leadership of the party was assumed by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek who today is at the head of the Central Chinese Government which we and all of the other major powers have recognized as the National Government of China.

In 1927 the Kuomintang Party split, and the leaders of the Communist faction, after first establishing themselves in southeast China, gradually, and with an ever increasing military force, marched up through central China until they eventually entrenched themselves in northwestern China in the Province of Yenan. There, under the leadership of three exceptionally able men, they have continued to consolidate their position. Within the area under their control they have carried out a farsighted and practical program of industrialization, of agrarian reform, and of many other measures which have given relief and great practical benefits to the peasant classes of China whose condition in the past has been so desperate. The outstanding leader of the Communists, Mao Tse-tung, refused during the years of the Japanese invasion to permit any open outbreak between his armies and those of Chiang Kai-shek on the ground that "Chinese should not fight Chinese" until the Japanese invaders had been thrown out of the country.

During the months which passed after the defeat of Japan many unsuccessful efforts were made by the American representatives in China to bring about some understanding between the Communists and the Central Government. These efforts were wholly unsuccessful until at the beginning of 1946 President Truman wisely and courageously issued a public statement urging the Communist leaders of China to agree to place their armed forces under the control of a unified Chinese Government and simultaneously urging Chiang Kai-shek to bring about the end of a one-party rule in China, and to set up a truly unified parliamentary government in which all Chinese political parties would have legitimate representation. At the same time the President sent to China as his special ambassador General Marshall, and we are all of us familiar with the patient and persistent efforts which General Marshall has made as mediator, and which at the outset seemed to be destined to be successful in bringing about a lasting truce between the Central Government and the Communists, and in furthering the establishment of that unified Chinese Government which both Chiang Kai-shek and the Communist leaders had officially stated they would join in supporting.

The Yalta agreements, through which an understanding was reached between the United States and Great Britain, on the one hand, and the Soviet Union, on the other, as to the nature of the far eastern peace settlements once the victory over Japan had been gained, brought about as a consequence a treaty signed at Moscow between the Chinese Central Government and the Soviet Union. By that treaty China agreed to the settlements which Russia desired affecting Manchuria and Outer Mongolia and in return received the assurance that the Soviet Union officially recognized the national government headed by Chiang Kai-shek as the one government of a unified and centralized China. By this pact the Soviet Union made it clear that it would join with the United States in supporting the regime of Chiang Kai-shek, and that there should thereby be no longer any legitimate grounds for the suspicion that Russian help would be given to the Chinese Communists against the National Government. The hope seemed bright that the way was opened by which the United States and the Soviet Union could cooperate and refrain from any action within China which would tend to foment, rather than discourage, civil war, with all of its attendant tragedy for the Chinese people, and with all of its risks of an even greater clash between the major powers.

Unfortunately, matters have not turned out that way. There can be no question that many of the more reactionary elements behind Chiang Kai-shek have made every effort to block the attempt of General Marshall to bring about a lasting truce and to find the means of hastening the creation of that unified democratic government in China which alone can permanently avert civil war. But there have also unfortunately been many signs that as a result of increasing tension between the Soviet Union and the United States with regard to questions in other parts of the world, the Chinese Communist leaders have been advised by Moscow to refuse to agree to equitable and constructive solutions of their disputes with the Chinese Central Government. And what has been even more evident perhaps has been the impediment to China's internal peace arising from the continued presence within China of large bodies of foreign troops.

A very great wave of popular indignation swept China when the Russian armies refused to evacuate Manchuria upon the date agreed upon for their removal. The Chinese people, who have suffered for so many years aggression and spoliation from other stronger powers, are very naturally prone to respond to antiforeign propaganda. Today that agitation is being directed against the United States.

The United States during the war against Japan necessarily provided the Central Government of Chiang Kai-shek with vast quantities of war matériel. The Chinese Communists have also received military supplies from Russian sources, a large part of which consists of the military equipment surrendered by the Japanese armies after their defeat. But more than that, the United States agreed last summer, after the victory over Japan, to station American armies in China so that these might help the armies of the Central Government to disarm and evacuate the Japanese forces. These American troops are still in China. And, while I believe there is not the slightest justification for the charge that their actions respond to any considered policy of our own Government, the steps taken by some of our officers have afforded a pretext for the claim made by the Chinese Communists that American forces have been used to strengthen the Central Government and to weaken the position of the Communists.

The issue came to a head with the broadcast made a few weeks ago by the Communist leader, Mao Tse-tung, when he publicly charged that the Americans were openly helping the Central Government against the Communists and demanded the withdrawal of all American forces from Chinese soil. The reaction to this broadcast was immediate. It has marked the beginning of a wave of popular feeling against the United States. This broadcast has now been followed up by a very significant statement issued to the press a few days ago by the widow of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, who herself is the sister of Madame Chiang Kai-shek and of the present Prime Minister of China, Dr. T. V. Soong. Madame Sun Yat-sen's statement, as her very rare public statements usually do, went right to the point. She charged that reactionaries were deliberately fomenting civil war in China in order to bring about war between the United States and Russia. She declared, with oriental eloquence, that "the first flame of a world conflagration is burning in our land and it must be quenched lest the fire destroy the world." She demanded, as the one means of preventing such an outcome, as the Communist leader Mao Tse-tung had already demanded, that the United States immediately withdraw its troops from China and refrain from supplying any further military supplies to Chiang Kai-shek.

No name is more revered in China than that of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. This statement of his widow has necessarily had a far-reaching effect upon the masses of the Chinese people.

By coincidence, as these reports of the outbreak of civil war in China were published, I received a letter from an American press correspondent now in China written some weeks before. In that letter he expressed the conviction that the continuation of American military assistance to the Central Government had worsened the chances for a true political settlement between the Chinese factions of their own problems, and had greatly increased the probability that an armed clash would take place. As he phrased it, "I don't see how we can expect two unequal boxers to negotiate peacefully if we, the United States, behind their backs are filling the gloves of one with lead slugs."

The dilemma with which the United States is now confronted is almost insoluble. It is not made any the easier of solution by the virulent broadcasts now coming over the official Soviet radio charging that America is deliberately fostering civil war in China.

The United States can most certainly not acquiesce in the attempt of the Soviet Union or of any other major power to dominate China. On the other hand, in her own interest and in the interest of world peace, the United States cannot afford herself to persist in any position within China which can legitimately give the impression to the Chinese people or to any other foreign power that the United States is, in fact, attempting for her own ends to establish some particular kind of government over the Chinese people because such a government would be more favorable to America. Our policy has, in my judgment, been inspired by true friendship for the Chinese people and it has been shaped for the purpose of insuring the unity of China.

But for those very reasons the United States is under the obligation to examine today the position in which she finds herself in China, and to rectify any steps which this Government's officials may have taken and which may give just ground for the belief that the American Government is giving undue assistance to one Chinese faction against the other, and is thereby preventing rather than helping the Chinese people themselves to reach a solution of their own internal problem and to determine their own destinies.

Exercise of a Public Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to a constituent:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: With registration day upon us I feel it is my duty to ask you to go to the polls and exercise your public duty. If you are not registered you cannot vote in the November election.

It was once said by a great American: "When the people are as constant and faithful to their political rights as the slums and the grogshops, the pool rooms, and the kennels; when honest, industrious, temperate, thrifty citizens are as zealous and prompt and unfailing in political activity as the ignorant and venal and mischievous, or when it is plain that they cannot be roused to their duty, then, but not until then—if ignorance and corruption always carry the day—there can be no honest question that the Republic has failed.

"But let us not be deceived. While good men sit at home, not knowing that there is anything to be done nor caring to know; cultivating a feeling that politics is tiresome and dirty, and politicians vulgar bullies and bravoes; half persuaded that a republic is the contemptible rule of a mob, and secretly longing for a splendid and vigorous despotism, then remember it is not a government mastered by ignorance, it is a government betrayed by intelligence; it is not the victory of the slums, it is the surrender of the schools; it is not that bad men are brave, but that good men are infidels and cowards."

My plea to you is to register and exercise your American citizenship by voting in this most important election in November.

With kindest personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM J. GREEN, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

Farmers Are Entitled To Have Experienced Men in Department of Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the years I have spent in Congress have given me an opportunity to study and evaluate the interdependence of the farmer, the factory worker, and business. Each group renders a service to society. The dependence of one group on another becomes more apparent as I study the variety of legislation that has been presented to the Congress.

The fact that we in the United States have not since 1925 produced all the food necessary to meet the consumptive demand in the United States, with the possible exception of 1942 and 1943, was difficult for me to believe when I first heard the statement. However, authentic governmental reports from the Department of Commerce and the Department of Agriculture prove this statement.

Another interesting fact is that factory pay rolls and the national farm income equal each other and go up and down together.

It is also an interesting fact that the national income has been seven times as much as the national farm income year after year. In other words, if the farmer is prosperous all the other groups are automatically prosperous.

I also find that 40 percent of the manufactured goods consumed in the United States are purchased by the rural people of our country. This is an important fact and should never be overlooked in determining our economic policy.

There are two disturbing factors when it comes to obtaining the facts about agriculture. One is that there appears to be an attempt by the Department of Agriculture under the present administration to issue propaganda rather than facts. In the second place it has been very surprising to me to find that the top level officials of the Department of Agriculture are not agriculturally trained men. For example, the Secretary of Agriculture has had no real agricultural training; the Under Secretary of Agriculture is a lawyer from Denver; the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture is a druggist from Oregon who owns a farm; the Chief of the Production and Marketing Division is a Harvard Law School graduate, who, though he distributes millions of the taxpayers money, according to his service record, has never had 1 day's experience in producing anything nor marketing anything. Is it any wonder that agricultural problems are so little understood and no proper solution found, when the top level officials have such backgrounds? I wondered why the administration did not select some farmers who have had many years of practical experience with farm problems and place them in the key places of agricultural responsibility.

I am more convinced every day that the big problem of the farmer is to see that the farmer is represented here in Washington in the top agricultural positions by men who have a real and sincere interest in the welfare of the farmer, and who have a practical background that would enable them to give the farmer the consideration he deserves. Agricultural problems cannot be properly solved unless the men charged with the responsibility of finding a solution are men of experience.

George H. Rooney Is the Candidate of the Communist Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, early in 1946 the Communist Party committee of New York State said:

Congressman BARRY, Fourth District, Queens County, must be defeated at all costs. We will form a labor combination to fight him in the Democratic primaries and in the general election.

In June 1946, the Communist Party in Queens County, formed the Citizens Committee for George H. Rooney for Congress.

On July 3, 1946, Communist Party members throughout Queens received telegrams from party officials asking them to report at their respective headquarters that evening. They were then informed that they were being mobilized to work for the election of George H. Rooney for Congress. They were then transported to Rooney's headquarters and instructed how to canvass and obtain signatures for Rooney's Democratic primary petition. Mimeographed instructions were given to each Communist canvasser. By July 9, the Communists had obtained over 7,000 signatures for Rooney. Most of the people who signed these petitions were misled and had no idea that Rooney was the candidate of the Communists.

Rooney, who lives outside our congressional district, is the business agent of local 450, of the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, which is probably the most notorious Communist-controlled union in the United States. It always follows the Communist Party line.

Prior to his affiliation with this union, Rooney was an organizer for the Transport Workers Union, headed by Mike Quill, also a notorious Communist Party line follower. According to the Transport Workers Union bulletin of July 1946, Rooney took part in the famous sit-down strike in the Kent Avenue powerhouse, which established the TWU on the BMT.

There are several thousand well-trained Communists in Queens County.

I have been reliably informed that they intend to canvass in my district until primary day, August 20. At that time they intend to bring in thousands of Communists from all over the city with cars to bring out the sure vote that they have canvassed and convinced through misrepresentation and lies that Rooney is the candidate that the Democrats should nominate. They believe that there will be a light primary vote cast and that they will, therefore, be able to win the election through the apathy of the majority of enrolled Democrats. As you know, this technique has succeeded in both the Democratic and Republican primaries in Manhattan.

I, therefore, urge every enrolled Democrat who believes in Americanism and is opposed to communism to vote in the primaries on August 20 and repudiate my Communist-sponsored opponent.

If you feel that I have not represented your views properly in Congress, then you can vote for my Republican opponent in November if you believe that he is better qualified to do so.

Communism, in my opinion, is the greatest internal menace to free America today. A Communist would betray his country at any time, in peace or in war, if it served Russia's interest best.

State Department Recognition Extended Hon. Thomas E. Martin, of Iowa, for His Contribution to Psychological Warfare in World War II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, on April 16, 1946, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement regarding the outstanding service rendered by Members of Congress in the field of psychological warfare in World War II. One of the four most outstanding of these service records was made by Hon. THOMAS E. MARTIN, of Iowa, and I was privileged to read two letters that Hon. William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State, wrote to Congressman MARTIN commending him. I have also been privileged to read Mr. MARTIN's reply to the first of these letters and I have requested Mr. MARTIN to give me permission to place these three letters in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the further information of Congress and the Nation regarding the splendid and patriotic service Mr. MARTIN rendered in this field.

The letters follow:

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, April 15, 1946.

The Honorable THOMAS E. MARTIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MARTIN: Congressman KARL STEFAN recently wrote me, asking for a list of the Members of Congress who had assisted in international radio broadcasting for psychological warfare.

A member of my staff compiled a list of all Members who contributed statements or news commentaries for wartime broadcasting. At the head of the list are four Members of Congress who contributed daily broadcasts throughout the war. You were one of the four.

I know that if Elmer Davis were still here he would want to extend to you his gratitude for this national service.

After your years as a professor of military science and tactics at the University of Iowa, it must have been a source of special satisfaction to you that you were able to apply this knowledge in the defense of the United States, while at the same time serving as a Member of Congress.

I send you my personal congratulations.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM BENTON.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 17, 1946.

Hon. WILLIAM BENTON,
Assistant Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BENTON: Thank you sincerely for your good letter of April 15 and for your kind comment regarding my small part in helping with your great program of psychological warfare during World War II.

I deeply appreciate the rating you gave me in the list you sent to Congressman KARL STEFAN and I assure you that it was a privilege and a pleasure to join with you, Mr. Elmer Davis, and Mr. Davenport, in this important work.

THOS. E. MARTIN.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, April 22, 1946.

The Honorable THOMAS E. MARTIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MARTIN: I have your note of April 17.

You shouldn't thank me for my praise of your international broadcasting during the war.

I think the people of the United States should thank you and every other Member of Congress who served as a radio commentator in order to shorten the war.

I wish there were some way to give a military medal for service like yours.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM BENTON.

H. R. 6722

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BRENT SPENCE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 6722, the Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation bill of 1946, referred to as the veterans RFC, provides for the promotion of maximum employment, business opportunities and careers for veterans in a free competitive economy.

Veterans employment is the most serious problem confronting the Nation today, as housing, food, and clothing are dependent upon veterans having suitable employment and a living wage—said Commander in Chief Stack, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in support of this legislation.

To say it is my sincere desire to aid in establishing assistance for veterans is as unnecessary as to further amplify the old and trite statement that the country owes an obligation to its fighting men and women which it must carry out to the best of its ability. Such desire and realization is common to all Americans, and is certainly a dominant thought in the hearts as well as in the minds of all Members of this Congress.

One of the foremost problems confronting this body and our country today is proper treatment of our veterans so as to insure that those opportunities which they have lost through military service are made up, and that they are given such assistance and encouragement as may be within the power of the United States, to resume their rightful places in the economy of our country, and such aid as may be necessary to help them reestablish their lives in as uninterrupted a fashion as is possible.

We all know that World War II was not of our asking, that it was forced upon us, and that at great sacrifice and expense we carried it through to a successful conclusion. Writers and historians are replete with criticism of the previous settlement of World War I and continuously blame the leaders of government for their failure to create a just and lasting peace after World War I, and cite such failure as the direct cause of World War II. If that mistake has been made, we can only hope that it will never be repeated again in the history of the world. And if the mistake will be repeated, certainly those least to blame are the members of our armed forces, who bore the greatest burden and contributed the greatest sacrifices toward the successful culmination of World War II.

This great Nation of 140,000,000 people through scientific selection by the highest physical, mental, and educational standards extracted for service—many voluntarily before call—in our armed forces, approximately 15,000,000 of the best citizens of our country. All of you, by family and warm personal friends, were brought in close contact with the effect of our military mobilization. It was necessary, and the great bulk of those who served did so with a sincere desire to contribute their health, strength, and effort to save our Nation and civilization. Our Army was composed of a cross-section of the best of our young people, many of whom have returned disabled, broken in health, disrupted from their normal pursuits, with interrupted educations, job opportunities, and business training.

The cost of war will never be measured exactly in dollars and cents, but we know that it has cost the country more than $300,000,000,000 and great quantities of our natural resources. However, we have saved that which is far more precious than even our great natural wealth, that is, our democracy and our freedoms.

Some people have said that many of our veterans benefited directly by their contacts, training, and experiences during the war. I sincerely wish this could be true in the case of every individual veteran, but unfortunately the reverse is true, as the figures show that in the cases of millions of veterans the direct losses both in education, training, and experience in business can be directly traced to a career interrupted by the war.

We have gone to great length in establishing our GI bill of rights with its educational and rehabilitation provisions. It is an excellent act, it is functioning, and it is materially aiding many of our returning veterans. However, our obligation to the returning veteran is not such that we can stop here. There is a great gap between a temporary educational feature and restoration of full job and business opportunities, which this country owes its veterans. This wide-open gap will be supplemented by this proposed veterans corporation.

Out of the 15,000,000 veterans of World War II there are 7,000,000 without reemployment rights under the law. Most of these veterans have never worked before and have no employment of any consequence to return to. There are 500,000 disabled veterans who want to work, but cannot find employment. Yet, we know, by experience, that a disabled veteran usually makes the best worker once suitable employment is found and retraining is provided for him. The provisions of this veterans corporation will enable these veterans to become self-sufficient, self-reliant, and to become an asset to themselves, their families, and to the Nation.

General Bradley, Veterans' Administrator, on June 10, 1946, said that:

> Four million veterans will be unemployed next fall unless new jobs continue to be created.

At the same time he pointed out that:

> It is time we stopped indulging in the sacrifices of veterans and worked harder instead to fulfill their wants, and time we took stock of the promises we made while they were overseas.

Our most valuable assets are our people and our democratic mode of life. Our vast technical knowledge, genius and ability is conceded to be worth far more than even our tremendous natural resources. A great percentage of that valuable ability, genius and technical know-how is directly vested in the 7,000,000 men about whom our Government is at this moment directly concerned. The question naturally arises as to how we can best safeguard and employ this immeasurable talent.

H. R. 6722, which has the direct purpose to encourage, aid, and assist all veterans in obtaining their just job opportunities and employment rights, and the dependents of those who gave their lives to preserve our country in establishing and maintaining gainful occupation and self sufficient careers in business, industry, trades, agriculture, foreign trade, scientific development, research and education.

This bill, however, has one further and very necessary element. We expect that it will do all of the foregoing under our system of competitive free enterprise without displacing others. Were we to aid one class exclusively at the expense of another, we would be shortsighted indeed, and such is not the purpose of this bill. While we have the greatest country in the world and the best system of government, coupled with the greatest knowledge and resources on the face of the globe, we must still provide for all of our people. We must look with favor upon the claims of all our citizens to just aid and protection.

This is a very unique opportunity for both veterans and organized labor to create unity in the Nation. Under this veterans program organized labor and veterans can pull together as a double horse team pulling the economic wagon out of the mire of a restricted economy and toward an ever expanding economy and full employment for all. This bill will mean fuller employment for all, instead of the veterans' organizations and organized labor competing for the limited available employment. The Veterans' Employment and National Economic Development Corporation Act will be the half-way mark immediately in gainful full employment for all, without cost to the taxpayers, as this legislation provides for self-liquidating and self-supporting enterprises and projects in our free enterprise system. It will create new job opportunities and careers for veterans, increase our standard of living and help restore to our public those articles which have been in demand for the last few years due to the necessity for wartime production.

If we provide the means of enabling 7,000,000 veterans, whom I am told have no reemployment rights, to gain a foothold in job opportunities, business opportunities and professions, to recoup their losses while serving in the armed forces, we shall have gone far not only in paying our debt to veterans, but to stabilizing our economy, and I repeat, toward reaching the half-way mark, promptly, in full employment.

The Congress and the Nation have not discharged their obligation to the veterans nor to the people until we have helped our veterans make their readjustment into civil life.

Of 7,000,000 veterans who have no reemployment rights, there are at present nearly 2,000,000 drawing unemployment compensation, adding billions of dollars unnecessarily to our already overburdened taxpayers. Following the passage of this act the taxpayers will be saved at least $1,000,000,000 on unemployment compensation alone.

Veterans do not want charity. Unemployment payments and bonuses, at best, are only temporary palliatives. Based upon similar experience, this "Veteran RFC" should not cost the taxpayer one cent, but should show a profit to the Nation. The Veterans' Corporation will loan money at 4 percent and Treasury will obtain the money at much lower rates of interest, thus providing an ample spread to defray all costs of administration and operation. It can therefore be seen that neither the Government nor the taxpayers will bear any part of the cost of this important program.

This bill seeks directly to utilize wartime and unused facilities and surpluses throughout the Nation and abroad that are suitable and can be employed profitably to afford opportunities for unemployed veterans, to help reduce the backlog of demand for goods and services, and to help meet the domestic shortages and increasing new demands throughout the world for American goods and services; to create profitable business, professional and occupational self-sufficient opportunities for veterans toward reducing to a minimum the need for unemployment compensation; to foster an ever-expanding economy toward preserving our system of government, our freedoms, and our national security by utilizing fully our veterans who were selected from the cream of American manhood and womanhood; to assist qualified veterans to engage in useful and profitable enterprises, services, professions, or trades in other countries, thereby cultivating those countries to become our customers and friends; to stimulate profitable activity and attract the investment of private risk capital in enterprises within marginal areas in industry, business, agriculture, service trades, transportation, education, foreign trade, and in scientific fields toward increasing employment of veterans; to assist State, community, and private agencies in financing self-liquidating projects which will utilize profitably the services of unemployed veterans; to stimulate enterprises and projects where gainful work opportunities, occupational therapy, and self-reliant careers will be opened to disabled veterans; in addition to the usual Treasury methods, to invite public subscription to the funds of the Veterans' Corporation in order that the people of the Nation—who are sympathetic to veterans' needs—may feel that they are partners in this enterprise; to stimulate the maximum use of our untapped natural resources in all geographical areas within the United States, its Territories and possessions, so as to afford opportunities for veterans and to enrich the Nation; and to facilitate the establishment of necessary useful and profitable new enterprises in the various communities of the Nation that will insure the veterans against unemployment in recessions or depressions; and to assure the fullest possible development of all our Nation's peacetime resources to stimulate an ever-expanding base of our national economy for the increasing benefit of all our people.

I want to add that of the approximate 15,000,000 who served in our armed forces most have served overseas. During such foreign service they have created a respect for our Government and institutions and have stimulated direct demand for goods and materials which have heretofore been known almost exclusively only in this country. This bill specifies aid in foreign trade. What better way can we foster and encourage international good will and enduring peace among the 45 smaller nations of the UN who look to us for leadership, than by taking direct and immediate advantage of this opportunity and of the contacts made by our veterans during this war?

The mere passage of any act, or setting up of any agency or rehabilitation program will never, as we all know, compensate to any perfect extent our disabled veterans, or extinguish the obligation of this country to them. But as far as humanly possible we should seek to aid and assist all disabled veterans to make sure their future lives are more attractive and enlarge their business opportunities to make them self-sufficient.

The great purpose in this bill is to stimulate the maximum utilization and development of our abundant natural resources in all geographical areas and within our Territories and possessions so as to afford opportunities for veterans and to enrich the Nation. Our public lands, particularly in the West, and the great Territory of Alaska deserve attention under the development aims of the proposed bill.

Also we have hundreds of thousands of enemy patents, processes, and trade secrets which we captured at great cost in lives, blood, and sweat. Who are most entitled to the benefit of this new stock in trade? Is it the large corporations or monopolies that do not need them, or should the veterans have first call on these business, professional, and trade assets?

Commander in Chief Joseph Stack of the Veterans of Foreign Wars declared, also in support of this bill, that:

There has been too much conversation about jobs for veterans and too little action.

Senator TUNNELL in introducing this identical bill for himself, Senators WALSH, RADCLIFFE, GUFFEY, MORSE, and BRIGGS, said:

The emergency (veterans' employment outlook) is alarming. Believe it or not, but at this hour there are nearly 2,500,000 veterans claiming unemployment compensation. The number drawing unemployment compensation is expected to increase, as there are 1,500,000 more men who will be discharged shortly from the armed forces * * *. On account of the time they have lost in war service, veterans will have a greater difficulty in getting into and staying in business than the average businessman and professional person.

The proposed Veterans' Corporation is charged specifically with solving the veterans' short-range and long-range problems without displacing other workers. In fact, the very nature of the projects contemplated would provide employment and business for others as well as veterans. The Veterans' Corporation would create jobs and economic opportunity through loaning powers and technical advisory services to self-liquidating projects, established businesses that can employ additional veterans in agreement with existing labor contracts, and new businesses that will employ veterans. And, naturally, the Corporation will make loans and give technical advice to veterans themselves who are qualified to conduct a business. Among the features of the bill are provisions to enable veterans to trade abroad to supply the great new demand for American goods and services. They have helped liberate many of the countries where they can now trade. They can promote friendship and confidence in countries such as China, Korea, the Philippines, India, Iraq, Iran, Turkey, and France. In countries that are now open to Americans and to our veterans we can open vast new and perpetuating markets for American goods and services. This will create fuller employment for veterans and for all American workers, businessmen, and professional people.

The objectives of this bill, carefully and conscientiously carried out, will materially aid us to maintain full employment within our own country, increase the standard of living and by the additional opportunity offered to the encouragement of foreign trade, make a new contribution toward maintaining a just, durable, and lasting peace.

We've Been Asked How Revised Price Controls Will Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the United States News for August 2, 1946:

WE'VE BEEN ASKED HOW REVISED PRICE CONTROLS WILL WORK

Price control, under the law now in effect, is to be uncertain and confusing at best. A wide variety of differing standards and controls will apply to different types of producers, distributors, and landlords. It will be a case of every man looking out for his own opportunities and interests.

Emphasis of the new law, if administered as Congress intends it, is to be placed upon the earliest possible decontrol of the greatest possible number of prices. Whether this intent of Congress is carried out will depend upon the attitude of the Price Administrator and the Secretary of Agriculture, and upon the attitude of a majority of the new Price Decontrol Board.

What Congress has done, broadly, is this: It has revived control of prices for most goods and services. It has revived rent control on a national basis. It has voted about $1,000,000,000 in subsidies that can be used to reduce prices below the free-market level. It has provided a profit formula for pricing industrial products. And it has set up formal decontrol machinery, with standards to be followed.

DOES THIS MEAN THAT PRICES NOW WILL BE PUSHED BACK?

They can be. A roll-back of prices and of rents to the levels that prevailed on June 30 is specifically authorized in the new law. Whether prices actually are rolled back, and to what extent, will depend upon decisions of the Price Administrator, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Price Decontrol Board. A number of pricing orders have been prepared by OPA. In many cases, these will push back price ceilings to June levels. Others will allow some rise in former ceilings.

WHAT OF FOOD PRICES, WHICH ROSE MOST?

Certain food items stay out from control until August 21, possibly longer. These include meat, dairy products, soybeans, cottonseed, and items made entirely or to a large extent from them. They also include grain and livestock and poultry feeds made from grain. If the new Price Decontrol Board has not ruled by August 20 on whether or not price ceilings should be restored on these items, controls can go back, with OPA fixing the actual ceilings. The Board is not supposed to order recontrols unless prices have risen unreasonably, or the commodities are in short supply, or the public interest would be served.

Other food items on which controls cannot be restored until after August 20 are eggs and poultry, and products processed from them. In these cases, controls cannot be restored even after August 20 unless the Decontrol Board specifically orders it.

WHAT ABOUT OTHER FOODS?

Except for these foods specifically exempted, other food items can be placed back under controls at any time. Some may be given higher ceilings, others returned to June 30 price levels. This means that ceilings can be restored immediately for foods processed from grains, such as flour, bread, and cereals. But controls cannot be restored until after August 20 on dairy and meat products, such as butter, cheese, ice cream, canned meats, etc.

ARE ANY INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTS EXEMPT FROM CONTROLS?

Only in a few instances, and this exemption may be temporary. Most industrial products did not rise in price since June 30 and there will be no roll-back, but they stay under control unless freed by OPA.

Petroleum and its products and tobacco and its products stay out from control at least until August 21. And control cannot be restored for these unless the Price Decontrol Board orders it because of unreasonable and inflationary rises in prices or because of scarcities. This means that there can be some rise in the prices of gasoline and crude oil, as well as in prices of cigarettes and cigars, without an OPA crack-down in the form of restored controls.

WHAT ABOUT THE MAXIMUM AVERAGE PRICE PROGRAM?

The MAP program stays dead. OPA no longer can order clothing manufacturers to use part of their materials to produce medium- and low-priced clothing. But OPA still has power to control the prices of individual garments.

NEXT, AS TO RENTS, HOW ARE THEY AFFECTED?

Here there will be a roll-back. In general rents go back to June 30 levels in the 520 areas where controls were in effect when the old OPA law expired. OPA, however, has no power to order refunds of higher rents collected for the short period when controls were not operating. But the agency may order refunds of above-ceiling rents collected for August and later months. Leases signed since June 30 and involving above-ceiling rents are voided.

Landlords who began eviction proceedings against tenants in the interim, contrary to OPA rent regulations, are required to drop these proceedings unless the tenants actually have been evicted. Tenants evicted between June 30 and July 25, however, cannot regain possession. OPA advises tenants in rent-control areas who have received notices to vacate to get in touch with local rent offices.

CAN RENTS BE RAISED?

After the first roll-back of rents, some increases in ceilings may be allowed. OPA officials have expressed the opinion that there must be more liberality in rent ceilings. Some landlords, therefore, may be able to get their ceilings raised in the weeks and months ahead.

ON RESALES, DO RETAILERS AND WHOLESALERS FACE A SQUEEZE?

No, not necessarily. Congress says that margins of retailers and wholesalers cannot be reduced below those that prevailed last March 31. This is tighter on distributors than the vetoed bill, which would have assured retailers and wholesalers the mark-ups or discounts they used last January 1, before three months of absorbing this year's rising costs. But distributors cannot be squeezed by further cost absorption in future pricing orders issued by OPA.

OPA must restore prewar profit margins for dealers in "reconversion" items, production of which was sharply cut back during the war, such as automobiles, farm implements, refrigerators, radios, and other household appliances. This will result in higher retail prices for some of these items.

WHAT OF THE PROFIT FORMULA FOR MANUFACTURERS, ABOUT WHICH THERE IS MUCH TALK?

This formula, just as the above profit formula for distributors, is much changed from what was called for in the vetoed bill. For manufacturers, producers, and processors, OPA must establish ceilings that reflect the average total costs for an industry of each product plus the industry's average profit margins on sales in the year 1940. This takes into account higher production costs since 1940. The period on which pricing was based under the old law was 1936–39. The vetoed bill would have used October 1941, as the price-basing period, when industry was beginning to feel the wartime boom in business.

DOES THIS FORMULA GUARANTEE A PROFIT FOR EACH PRODUCER?

No. An individual producer is not even guaranteed return of his total costs if he is a high-cost producer. Ceilings are to be based upon an industry's average in costs. And these costs will be determined by OPA on the basis of costs of a reasonable number of typical producers, manufacturers, or processors.

WHAT DISCRETION DOES OPA HAVE IN ADMINISTERING THIS FORMULA?

OPA is given considerable leeway in administering the profit formula. It usually does not have to allow a price increase if an industry already is receiving its average production costs, plus a reasonable profit, and if a higher ceiling would not increase production or would slow down production of some other needed item. The new law does not say what is considered a reasonable profit. That is left up to the Price Administrator.

In addition, OPA can turn down applications for price adjustments when it considers that a particular industry is operating under abnormal costs that are likely to be reduced within the near future.

WILL SOME PRICES BE ADJUSTED UNDER THIS FORMULA IMMEDIATELY?

Not necessarily. The new law gives OPA 30 days to make any price changes that are called for. Changes under the pricing formula for manufacturers, producers, and processors do not have to be made until 60 days after an industry advisory committee asks for higher ceilings and submits data to support its petition. Thus, it may be more than 2 months before some of these price adjustments are made.

HOW WILL DECONTROLS WORK?

Specific rules are laid down by Congress for gradually dropping controls between now and June 30, 1947, when OPA is scheduled to be abolished. Congress orders that price controls be removed from any item, agricultural or nonagricultural, when its supply approximately balances its demand. The Secretary of Agriculture decides when ceilings should be abolished on agricultural products, including fish and other sea food. OPA decides for other items.

Furthermore, all controls must be removed by next January 1 from all items that have no important bearing on the cost of living or business costs. This means industrial as well as farm products.

WHERE DOES THE DECONTROL BOARD COME IN?

This Board can overrule either the Price Administrator or the Secretary of Agriculture in deciding when controls shall be removed. And controls that have been eliminated cannot be restored without written approval of the Price Decontrol Board. Thus, the attitude of the three members of this Board will have an important bearing on the future of price controls.

WITH SOME FOODS DECONTROLLED, CAN RESTAURANTS RAISE PRICES?

Prices of meals in restaurants, hotels, and other eating places are placed back under ceilings even though some major food items are not now under control. Prices of meals are based upon the cost of acquiring foods served, plus the customary margin. This means that prices charged by eating places often will be higher than levels of June 30. Restaurants can adjust their prices according to this formula without taking each price change to OPA.

DOES THE NEW LAW PROVIDE ANY OTHER SPECIAL PRICING FORMULAS?

Yes. One important rule involves pricing of cotton and woolen textiles. Here, manufacturers' ceiling prices must include the cost of the raw cotton or wool, based upon the parity price or current cost, whichever is higher, plus the average mill conversion cost and plus a reasonable profit. This provision is expected to raise the prices of some clothing, particularly that made from cotton.

Another special pricing formula involves softwood logs and lumber. Ceiling prices for these logs must be high enough to allow producers to recover at least 90 percent of the cost of production, rather than the 75 percent figured heretofore by the Office of Price Administration. For lumber, producers must be permitted to recover their current cost of production. This means higher prices for consumers.

HOW ABOUT WAGE STABILIZATION UNDER THE NEW LAW?

Controls over wages and salaries are restored by the law, and the Wage Stabilization Board goes back into action. Approval of wage increases that will be used as the basis for seeking higher price ceilings, under the new rules, usually will be required only in industries where price ceilings are in effect.

CONGRESS ALSO VOTED TO RESTORE SUBSIDIES. HOW WILL THESE WORK?

Congress authorizes subsidy payments up to $1,000,000,000 during the present fiscal year, which is less than half the amount paid last year. Subsidies, as a rule, cannot be paid on items that are not under price controls. Thus, payments cannot be made befor August 21 on meats and dairy products that now are decontrolled. Subsidies can be paid, however, on sugar, rubber, copper, lead and zinc, and oil from stripper wells.

WHO DECIDES ON SUBSIDY PAYMENTS?

The Price Decontrol Board is to decide when subsidies are to be restored, and the amounts of payments. But no payments can be made on items that were not being subsidized on June 29. And all food subsidies must end by next April 1.

HOW DOES AN INDIVIDUAL GO ABOUT GETTING PRICE RELIEF?

Petitions for price adjustments usually will be handled by getting industry advisory committees to file applications with the OPA, the Secretary of Agriculture, or the Price Decontrol Board. The Board can be asked to review rulings of OPA and the Secretary of Agriculture. It will hold hearings, and its decisions will be final. The Board is required to hand down its ruling "at the earliest practicable time" after a hearing. Individual applications for relief, however, still can be filed by persons or firms.

Appeals also can be made to the Emergency Court of Appeals if OPA does not approve an increase in manufacturers' ceilings within 60 days after application is made by an industry advisory committee. This Court now has power to force the Office of Price Administration, within 30 days, to make a price adjustment that it considers is justified.

Issues Involved in Military Government of Hawaii Discussed by United States Federal Judge

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an essay by United States District Judge J. Frank McLaughlin on the issues involved in the military administration of the Territory of Hawaii under martial law during the war, including the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus that finally found its way to the Supreme Court of the United States. Having been one of the two judges who participated in the early consideration of these issues, Judge McLaughlin's talk, delivered originally to the Social Science Association of Honolulu, constitutes an extremely thoughtful and valuable contribution to the discussion of this very important experience.

The essay of Judge McLaughlin is as follows:

AND HOW THEY DID IT

(By Hon. J. Frank McLaughlin)

That it may not exactly be an essay, is not, however, to be blamed upon General MacArthur, who just a short while ago called back to Japan the man whom I had for months arranged to have speak to you in my place.

I shall concern myself tonight with the settled habeas corpus cases. My remarks will be critical of the Army. Strong words will be used. They will be used to counteract the questionable doctrines which have been broadcast for the past 5 years—and to help you better appreciate the legal importance and significance of what happened here. My objective is to so tell the story that we shall ever be on guard to see that never again does it occur anywhere in America.

I speak as a private citizen—and as one who also holds our armed forces in very high regard within the area of their legitimate operations.

(NOTE.—For oral delivery May 6, 1946, before the Social Science Association of Honolulu, T. H. The title has reference to the Honolulu Advertiser editorial of March 16, 1946, expressing the view for the community that, though the Supreme Court did not like what the Army did in Hawaii, "They did it—and we liked it." J. Frank McLaughlin.)

AND HOW THEY DID IT

When even today habeas corpus is mentioned it usually results in stirring up a hornet's nest. Possessing a constitutional immunity, I propose to do more than merely mention habeas corpus. It has been written: "They did it—and we liked it." I would like to show you "How they did it."

Of the Supreme Court's decision in the Insular cases, Mr. Dooley remarked that it gave the Constitution a pain in its fourteenth amendment, and he went on to intimate strongly that if indeed the Court did not read the newspapers, it certainly followed the election returns.

Had Mr. Dooley a voice today his author, I am sure, would have had it ring out clearly in praise of the Supreme Court's decision in the recent habeas corpus cases. He would acclaim the decision as a victory for the ageless potent Constitution, adding no doubt that the Court had relieved most effectively the Constitution of an acute tyrannical pain in its Bill of Rights.

The Supreme Court does not, of course, follow election returns—not even those from the county of Maui. But, on the other hand, I regret to say neither would the results of a current Territorial election, confined to the better educated voters, follow the Supreme Court's recent habeas corpus decision.

The Supreme Court having settled the issue, I am free to speak, and this I propose to do, for when with transparent humor it is remarked that the operation was a success, but the patient—Miss Liberty—died; when not a few but many otherwise substantial citizens adamantly subscribe to the editorially expressed view: "They did it and we liked it"; when General Richardson asserts in a public address that after all the Army acted in good faith, for it must be remembered that it was the civilian governor, not the Army, who declared martial law on December 7, 1941; when Secretary of War Patterson in a public letter to a Congressman also expresses the same view, and further asserts that the Army's position in Hawaii was not one taken to usurp power, but was one based upon a conviction that under the circumstances the procedure condemned by the Supreme Court in the Duncan and White cases was authorized by law, yet in the same letter also says that not until the decision in these cases was the point of law settled; when the then governor tells you that his attorney general drew up his December 7 proclamation that day—and when also he tells you that he told the President what he had done and that the President approved; and when you, the American people, either believe these things or are asked to accept them as facts, then, gentlemen, the time has come to speak plainly, to refresh your knowledge of basic American principles, to look at the record, to see how they did it and to ask ourselves in all seriousness if we can truly say we liked it and approve of the method by which they did it.

Before revisiting the engagements of the "battle of habeas corpus," let me make clear a few preliminary points.

It is not my intention to single out General Richardson for personal criticism. I regret that he is not here with us this evening. Because he is not, I shall be pleased to send him a verbatim copy of my remarks. He will readily understand that what I criticize is the military system of which he was a part, and that for his public acts and actions he is no more exempt from criticism than I am.

Let me also say that it is not my intention to offend those of you who I know hold contrary views and will probably remain unmoved by what I have to say. Like jurors, I know you will give me a fair hearing and evaluate the facts which I shall bring to your attention in relation to the Constitution to which I know you unreservedly subscribe.

And as you hear me recount how it was done, please remember:

1. That I do not for a moment assert that everything that the Army did here was illegal; or at least could not have been done in a legal manner, under Executive Order 9066 and the act relating to military areas (March 21, 1942 (18 U. S. C. 97a)), and the act relating to enemy aliens (July 6, 1798 (50 U. S. C. 21–23));

2. That though upon the merits there is a difference between the internee cases and the provost court cases, they stand upon the same basis in relation to applications for writs of habeas corpus.

3. That, as I have indicated officially, there is a reasonable basis for believing that the declaration of martial law on December 7 was lawful; and finally, please remember—

4. That the Constitution is the fundamental law of the land at all times, whether we be at war or at peace; that it is applicable to all, from the humblest citizen to the President, and hence is no respecter of race, creed, color, title, rank, or position; that the Constitution grants to the Federal Government all of the powers necessary to wage war and to wage it successfully; and that in time of war or great public danger individual rights must yield in the face of necessity and must yield to the extent necessary to the Nation's paramount power of self-preservation.

With these essential preliminaries anchored down, let us revisit the scene of the legal battle and see what happened and how it happened.

At 11:30 a. m. December 7, 1941, the Governor of Hawaii, Joseph B. Poindexter, invoked the Hawaii Defense Act because the United States had been invaded by the armed forces of Japan by an attack upon this island. The tense, critical situation warranted beyond question the invocation by the Governor of the extraordinary powers conferred upon him by the M-day law. His declaration of an emergency was well grounded—too realistically, indeed—upon open and notorious, apparent facts. His action was lawful and in harmony not alone with the act of the Territorial legislature, but it in turn in this particular at least was within the scope of the powers of the Constitution. Though to be sure no one knew what would happen next, war was in fact upon the doorstep and the Territorial government was prepared to meet and did meet it as to affairs which in time of war were within its jurisdiction. At the same time, despite the disastrous, foul blow which had been struck, our armed forces were doing their best to cope with the existing factual state of war. They needed no formal invitation or request to be asked to defend America or any part of it. Their duty was at hand and they were discharging it as best they could. In connection therewith the armed forces were receiving without the asking superb volunteer cooperation from the civilian residents of Hawaii. The civilian defense units were trained, prepared and in action. Throughout the Territory there was fear, but far less confusion of mind and of action than in the armed forces.

The Hawaii Defense Act had been passed by the Territorial legislature during a special session in September 1941. You can well recall with me how the armed forces had pleaded with the Territory to pass such legislation during the previous regular legislative session, and that the bill failed to pass for reasons unrelated to its recognized merit. And you will remember, too, that Governor Poindexter rushed back from the mainland in September 1941, and speedily called the legislature into special session, for Washington had let it be distinctly understood that if the Hawaiian Legislature did not have the good sense to lay politics aside and pass this special legislation which was much needed in the eyes of the armed forces for the adequate protection of Hawaii in time of an emergency such as war, then such a bill would be introduced in Congress and passed over the heads of the Hawaiian legislators.

The legislature was called into special session and General Short appeared before the legislature and told it that the bill should pass, for in time of war, for which then we should be well prepared, he did not want to have to be bothered with civilian affairs for he would have a superabundance of things military to attend to and that the passage of such a bill would give the Territorial Governor extensive powers to handle civilian affairs in time of war without the necessity of declaring martial law.

(NOTE.—The next few paragraphs were written before April 26—the date on which Governor Poindexter released to the press his long-delayed account of December 7. Because Governor Poindexter's statement is not fully in accord with my understanding of the full facts, I have left the succeeding paragraphs as originally written on April 25, 1946. (J. Frank McLaughlin.))

What happened next has not yet been written upon the pages of history. But when it is written it will disclose that upon the afternoon of December 7 topflight Army officials called upon Governor Poindexter with a document long since prepared by the Army for his signature. This document is well known to you, for being in effect told to "sign here," Governor Poindexter signed it at 3:30 p. m., December 7, 1941, and it became the Governor's proclamation placing the Territory under martial law plus. So sure were the Army officials that Governor Poindexter would sign their document prepared months in advance that General Short's proclamation as Military Governor of Hawaii had also been prepared far in advance, and was in the hands of publishers for printing that afternoon some substantial period of time before the Governor's proclamation was signed and received for publication.

With these plans secretly prepared long in advance of the event which by training and experience the armed forces were supposed to be prepared to meet, it is not out of order to ask why General Short misled the Hawaiian Legislature with regard to the Army's designs upon the Hawaiian Government in time of war.

I have said that by Governor Poindexter's proclamation martial law plus came into being. I have likewise said elsewhere that on December 7 by this proclamation Governor Poindexter abdicated. I have also said that history would treat him more charitably. Both of those statements are true.

General Richardson and Secretary of War Patterson were, to be sure, correct in saying that the Governor of Hawaii declared martial law. It is what they did not tell you—the American people—that is the important thing. They both failed to give you the real facts and the full facts. They did not of course mention that the Army went back on its word to the Hawaiian Legislature. They did not tell you that it had said one thing while preparing to do another thing. They did not tell you that they prepared Governor Poindexter's proclamation for him and induced him to sign it, reluctantly. They did not tell you either that he finally agreed to do as they asked with the understanding that the effect of the proclamation would be for maybe 30 days. They did not tell you either that Governor Poindexter declared—lawfully—martial law but the Army went beyond the governor and set up that which was lawful only in conquered enemy territory, namely, military government which is not bound by the Constitution. And they did not tell you, either, that generals succeeding General Short refused to honor General Short's 30-day agreement with Governor Poindexter. No, oh no, they, after being soundly spanked by the Supreme Court upon a related point, tried by concealing the full facts to pass the buck to Governor Poindexter. History—which only he can tell in minute detail and which I hope he does soon tell—fully (added after April 27) will indeed treat him more charitably.

That on December 7 there was a reasonable basis for invoking through the Organic Act constitutional powers to declare martial law and to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is not open to very much argument. Had the period been placed right there, the Constitution would have joined its ample powers to the war effort in Hawaii. But it was the plus that threw the Constitution into the discard and set up a military dictatorship, military government, which every textbook and decision, of which there were several from the Supreme Court, and which even their own Army rules and regulations clearly recognized was lawful only in conquered territory, territory taken from the enemy. I am sure that I need not remind you that though it has been invaded, Hawaii, United States of America, never has been and never will be conquered by an enemy.

What was this plus? It reads as follows:

"And I do hereby authorize and request the commanding general, Hawaiian Department, during the present emergency, and until the danger of invasion is removed, to exercise all the powers normally exercised by me as Governor.

"And I do further authorize and request the said commanding general * * * during the present emergency and until the danger of invasion is removed to exercise the powers normally exercised by judicial officers and employees of this Territory."

Now remember your history—the same American history that they were teaching the first week of December 1941 and now teach at Punahou, at Farrington, and elsewhere, and let me ask you whether or not under our American form of government the Executive ever has judicial powers. If he has not, how then, may I ask, can he give them away? The answer obviously is that he cannot give what he does not have, and you will remember that an independent judiciary is one of the outstanding features of our Constitution, concerning which Mr. Justice Story once said:

"Where there is no judicial department to interpret, pronounce, and execute the law, to decide controversies, and to enforce rights, the Government must either perish by its own imbecility, or the other departments of government must usurp powers, for the purpose of commanding obedience, to the destruction of liberty. The will of those who govern will become, under such circumstances, absolute and despotic; and it is wholly immaterial whether power is vested in a single tyrant or in an assembly of tyrants."

There was a surplus too. It is found in General Short's proclamation of December 7. It consists of his announcing to the citizenry of Hawaii that he was its military governor. They surely did not ask him to assume any such unconstitutional fictitious office. They—the orderly people of Hawaii—had not even requested martial law. And surely not one word of Governor Poindexter's proclamation, despite its unlawful grants of powers which he did and did not have, asked General Short to be a military governor and to set up a new form of government in Hawaii. Yet in his proclamation General Short, referring to Poindexter's proclamation says that Governor Poindexter asked him to "assume the position of military governor."

What happened next? In accordance with section 67 of the Organic Act, Governor Poindexter notified President Roosevelt by radio that—"I have today declared martial law throughout the Territory of Hawaii and have suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. Your attention is called to section 67 of the Hawaiian Organic Act for your decision on my action."

And on December 9 President Roosevelt sent Governor Poindexter this radiogram:

"Your telegram of December 7 received and your action in suspending the writ of habeas corpus and placing the Territory of Hawaii under martial law in accordance with United States Code, title 48, section 532, has my approval."

If the facts were in accord, all would have not only been well, but lawful, too. But Governor Poindexter failed then and so long as he was Governor of Hawaii to tell the President what he had really done or what the Army had done and was doing. As the Supreme Court remarked, it is doubtful if the President ever knew what actually was done here until 1943. By then it was already too late to do anything abrupt. Face saving is not peculiar to any one race—or organization. But note that the President of the United States did not, as so often has been said, approve any such a thing as military government for Hawaii. He could not have had he wanted to, without violating his oath of office.

Before we turn to the courts, it is interesting as well as amusing to note in passing that under his proclamation Governor Poindexter continued to have and to hold—solely—his extraordinary M-day powers, which in a mild sort of way he exercised with respect to Office of Civilian Defense matters, and that after he had used the only power which he reserved to his office, the Military Governor published approval of those M-day defense regulations.

The courts of the Territory—note I say Territory—were on Sunday, December 7, ordered closed by General Short in an oral order to Chief Justice Kemp, who in turn orally passed it on that day to the Territorial court system, and followed it up December 8 by posting an announcement on the judiciary building that the Territorial courts were closed by order of General Short. Of course, the fact is that the Territorial courts were open December 8, that all honored Judge Kemp's message, and were for the most part—not all—technically closed. By the end of the day, the Territorial courts were actually all closed for business out of a spirit of cooperation, for all knew that the law gave neither General Short nor Judge Kemp authority to close the courts.

But General Short had to have the courts closed. He no doubt at least remembered that the Milligan case said that martial law cannot exist where the courts are open. So to protect his usurped power he had to close them and he—not necessity—closed them. By General Orders No. 4 on December 7 he set up an unconstitutional provost court system to try, without the constitutional safeguards, anybody for anything. And they did it, too.

You have, I am sure, observed how carefully I have stressed that it was only the Territorial courts that were illegally closed. The General said not one word about the United States District Court for the District of Hawaii. And I can tell you now that it was not closed, and never has been, and never will be. I can also tell you that the Army thought they had closed it, yet at the same time the Federal Government was filing land condemnation suits for the Army and Navy. And I can likewise tell you that General Green came over personally to see Judge Metzger, and finally admitted to him that the Army could not close a Federal court, but asked for his cooperation and got it.

But—when on December 16 the Army decided to allow, mind you, the independent judicial branch of the Government to function within a very limited scope, then it assumed that it had closed the Federal court, for it purported to give it back its land condemnation jurisdiction, and only that. Should you doubt me, read General Orders, Nos. 4 and 29.

The next thing the Army did to the courts was that on January 27, 1942, it realized that it had taken over a little bit more than it could handle and it needed the services of the judiciary. So it opened the courts up a little bit wider—again presuming to include the Federal court—but it purported to do the astounding thing of then and there making the courts agents of the military governor. The judges of our courts of record, appointed by the President and confirmed by the United States Senate, members of the judicial branch of the Government holding a commission from the President of the United States, apparently could not be trusted, their patriotism seemingly was in doubt, so they purported to them agents of the military governor—without their consent, I may add. A complete nullity, indeed.

All of the time civilian affairs in the Territory of Hawaii were of course in a deplorable condition, for as the late Mr. Chief Justice Stone observed places of amusement were open and the schools and churches were open and functioning, but not as agents of the military governor. Hollywood school teachers and God fortunately did not need a license from the military governor.

Things remained in this state of legal affairs for some time. But on February 4, 1942, the saloons were allowed by the military governor to open for business. A man could get a drink, but he could not get a writ of habeas corpus. On February 19 one Dr. Hans Zimmerman tried to get the latter, for he had been placed in such a position by the Army that he could not even get the former.

Having been picked up on the suspicion of being dangerous to the internal security of the United States and held in custody by the Army, Dr. Zimmerman, acting through his wife, for he was held incommunicado, petitioned the United States district court for a writ of habeas corpus. He alleged that he was a citizen of the United States and as a civilian was being unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the Army. The petition was presented to the court, and in open court Judge Metzger denied the petition in these words:

"I feel that the court is under duress by reason of the order and not free to carry on the function of the court in a manner in which the court conceives to be its duty."

What did he mean? Did he mean he was under duress because the courtroom was filled with Army officers bearing side arms and MP's with guns walked outside in the corridor? Perhaps he had this in mind, but that was not what he meant. He meant that General Orders No. 57 which said no court, including the United States district court, should issue a writ, was backed up by a gun which prohibited him from doing what the Congress of the United States had told United States judges to do, to wit, to forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it appears from the petition itself that the party is not entitled thereto.

So sacred is the citizen's constitutional right to test for cause the legality of his imprisonment that Congress said to United States judges to issue it forthwith, as all imprisonments are presumed in point of law to be unlawful unless justified. The Queen in Alice in Wonderland shouting "Off with his head" may be humorous in fiction, but throughout the ages it had happened too often—and Congress knew it—and so said forthwith a proper application shall call forth the writ directing the jailer in the name of the United States of America to come into court and justify in law his restraint of the petitioner's liberty. If he can and does, the petitioner goes back to jail. If the jailer fails, the petitioner is given his release from unlawful confinement.

Zimmerman appealed to the Ninth Circuit Court and the denial of the writ was sustained in no uncertain terms.

In the meantime, the Army moved Zimmerman to the mainland. There where no martial law existed and the laws of the United States were in full, unimpeded operation, he tried to apply to another United States court for a writ. So the Army at once moved him back to Hawaii where by force they controlled the suspension of the writ. Of course we must pass by the fact that they took Zimmerman out of here because under international law they could not keep him in a theater of war. But they did.

But passing by his return to Hawaii, what in good faith did the Army do next in the Zimmerman case? It released him. It released this dangerous citizen—this man who was dangerous to the internal security of the United States—it gave him back his freedom when it again took him to the mainland but upon the express condition that he, a citizen, keep out of Hawaii, United States of America, for the duration. Why, you ask, did the Army release Zimmerman? Because, gentlemen, Zimmerman had appealed from the Ninth Circuit Court to the Supreme Court of the United States upon constitutional grounds and the Army would not face the Supreme Court. That is why.

Let me next unravel the Glockner and Seifert cases, filed July 30, 1943.

Glockner and Seifert were situated identically as had been Zimmerman. They, too, were citizens held in custody by the Army upon suspicion of being dangerous to internal security. They also applied for writs of habeas corpus.

Pausing here, we may here note that General Emmons had, of course, succeeded General Short, and General Richardson had succeeded General Emmons as Military Governor. The Japs had been defeated at Midway in that historical naval battle which both Army and Navy officers admitted lifted the threat of invasion from Hawaii. General Emmons had stated that Hawaii was safe against invasion, and without so much as "by your leave" to the Military Governor the Territorial Legislature had held a regular session.

This was the state of affairs in July 1943 when Glockner and Seifert petitioned for writs. Before the court was called upon to act upon them, by his attorney, the acting United States attorney, General Richardson, came into court and moved that the petition be dismissed. The General had jumped in with both feet, much to his subsequent regret. He was in court submitting himself to its jurisdiction without fully realizing it. The motion was denied, and the writs issued.

The United States marshal was directed to serve the writs upon the general. With writs in hand, bearing orders from the President of the United States, the marshal's deputy went to politely serve General Richardson. He went to the general's "Little White House" where "OMG" is still engrossed in cement. In a courteous manner, the marshal asked to see General Richardson. The general, through his attorney, knew he was to be served and had told the palace guard not to let the marshal in. Permission to see the military governor of Hawaii hence was refused. The marshal, knowing that the general was inside his office, nevertheless waited upon the lanai. In the due course of time the general came out—rapidly—surrounded by guards. The marshal started to approach him with the writs. He was grabbed by the general's military aides, pushed about, and held while General Richardson ran to his waiting automobile and was driven away hastily to Fort Shafter. The flag above the White House still fluttered in the breeze. The marshal was denied admission to Fort Shafter. Everywhere General Richardson went, he carried with him his guards to protect him from the man bearing orders from his Commander in Chief. Secretary of War Patterson was here while the general dodged service. For him, General Richardson gave a luncheon at the Pacific Club—a private club. He surrounded the place with MP's and members of that club that noon could not get by the MP's without satisfying the MP's that they were not United States marshal's representatives.

After several days of dodging service, General Richardson called off his guards and allowed the marshal to serve him. Upon the day finally appointed for the general to produce the petitioner in court, the court was informed by the general's attorney that he had been instructed by the general "to inform the court that under no circumstances will the petitioners be produced before this court" and asked leave to file for the general a written return under oath in which the general stated that the general held the petitioner, for he deemed the petitioner, "Walter Glockner (Seifert, too) will be dangerous to the public peace and safety of the United States if released from custody and internment, and allowed to remain at large." Since the general had ignored the writ, the court refused to allow the written return to be filed, so the general allowed the newspapers to publish it.

For his refusal to obey the writ, Judge Metzger on August 24 cited General Richardson into court for contempt. The citation was served upon the general directing him to show cause, if any he had, on August 25, 1944, why he should not be adjudged in contempt of court. Again the general did not appear and Judge Metzger found him to be in contempt and ordered that he pay a fine of $5,000. This court action occurred at 10 a. m.

Judge Metzger had been off the bench but a short time, when he and I were both served by a military policeman with the infamous General Orders No. 31, called affectionately by some a "court plaster." Under a variety of possible penalties—including death—the military order directed the court, and Judge Metzger by name, to undo everything that had been done and not to dare move forward in these or any other writ cases. Clerks, attorneys, and everyone else were covered by the blanket order. The court openly ignored the general's order. Nothing was undone and a forward step was taken. But the general did not carry out his threat to imprison a United States judge. By the terms of his fantastic order, he should have. Do you remember that the Roman Emperor Caligula, 1 of the 12 Caesars "published the law, but it was written in a very small hand, and posted up in a corner, so that no one could make a copy of it." Well, in General Orders No. 31 the military governor of Hawaii stated that military orders "heretofore or hereafter issued * * * regardless of whether or not such order or orders are published in the newspapers of the Territory of Hawaii" were the law of the land and must be obeyed under pain of the penalties set forth in order No. 31. The general, I am informed, signed General Orders No. 31 prior to 10 a. m., August 25, 1943, and if so, Judge Metzger violated it both before and after 10 a. m. on that date. Why did not the general cause the judges of the United States district court to be arrested for violation of General Orders No. 31? The answer is obvious.

It is, I know, hard to believe that all this happened, and that there is still more.

Bear in mind that General Orders No. 31 remained in full force and effect. Nobody was supposed to even breathe habeas corpus under pain of the severest of military penalties enforceable in a provost court—a controlled court. It was in these days that during all hours of the day and night Judge Metzger received so many phone calls from people threatening to horsewhip and kill him, that General Richardson, to his credit, got out by request a special restricted order ordering personnel in his command to stop talking about the cases and to leave Judge Metzger alone.

The next unbelievable thing that happened was that at the War Department's insistence a special assistant to the Attorney General, E. J. Ennis, accompanied by Colonel Hughes of the War Department, Judge Advocate General's Division, arrived in Hawaii to get the cases back on the track, it was said. This is how they did it. They begged of Judge Metzger permission to take Glockner and Seifert very quietly to the mainland and to set these dangerous men free—so long as they kept out of Hawaii. In return for such permission to take the men beyond the court's jurisdiction, Mr. Ennis told the court that the General was willing to relax General Orders No. 31 so as to exempt the Glockner and Seifert cases but only those two cases, if Judge Metzger in turn would allow the Army to set the men free on the mainland. To this Judge Metzger said "No," not unless General Orders No. 31 was wiped out completely would he condone the removal of the men from the jurisdiction of the court. General Order No. 31 was quietly wiped out the next day by General Order No. 33. To this very day the War Department will shudder if disgraceful General Order 31 is even mentioned, for it was concocted right here—not in the War Department.

Upon a showing that General Richardson in refusing to obey the writ had acted in accordance with General Marshall's instructions—which of course did not make it right but it did put General Richardson in a better light—Judge Metzger upon Mr. Ennis' plea reduced the General's fine to $100. President Roosevelt then pardoned the General thus proving that even the Commander-in-Chief and President of the United States agreed with the court that the General had been guilty of criminal contempt.

In February 1944, though the Army claimed the privilege of the writ was still suspended, in the Batchelor case a writ was issued. To it the Army paid no attention, though the petitioner was a Federal prisoner. The point of law was, however, the same. The Army claimed that the privilege of the writ was suspended without exception.

The next case to engage our attention is the Duncan case, March 14, 1944. You know the facts. Duncan assaulted a marine sentry inside the gate at Pearl Harbor. Existing Federal law gave the United States district court jurisdiction of the offense, but it did not get it, for that court was being ignored by both the Army and the Navy. Duncan could also have been tried before a Territorial court as the Territory has concurrent jurisdiction over Federal reservations, though it usually yields it to Federal authorities. Duncan was tried for the offense in the provost court for Pearl Harbor, set up for the Navy for control purposes by the Army. Questioning the provost court's jurisdiction over him, Duncan applied for a writ.

An order to show cause why the writ should not issue was made and served without difficulty. However, soon after the case was filed not a few people labeled Mr. Anthony, Duncan's lawyer, a traitor. So vicious did this public criticism become that later during the trial Mr. Ennis, speaking for the Attorney General, publicly and in court censored those who held such un-American thoughts by saying:

"One point in closing that I do not want to forget to mention is that, so far as the Department of Justice is concerned—and I want to speak for the Department of Justice and the Attorney General in this respect—that we, of course, do not feel that the bringing of an action of this kind is in any way an attempt to take an antagonistic or unpatriotic or improper attitude towards the Government.

"I would like to state for myself, and I know for the attorney general of the department, that we consider it a helpful thing for an attorney to have the courage of his convictions to present to the court the issues as he sees them. And we feel that the interest of a member of the bar, and of the bar generally, in pursuing these questions, which were honestly and fairly debated, is commendable and furthers the interest of all of us in living under a regime of law."

Mr. Ennis might well have been even a bit more specific and have also said that he highly disapproved of Colonel Morrison's (now General Morrison) having called to his office, after the case was filed, several of the important clients of Mr. Anthony's firm where the colonel asked them if they knew and realized what their lawyer was doing, and to use their influence to get him to withdraw the case.

At the Duncan trial the star witnesses for the respondent were Admiral Nimitz and General Richardson. With your American history as a background, and with principles of logic in mind, recall with me that under oath General Richardson testified:

1. That the further the Japs were pushed back in the Pacific the greater became the danger of an attack upon Hawaii.

2. That civil courts were slow, political influence a factor, and that to enforce his military orders he must have absolute control of the courts.

Admiral Nimitz' testimony was as important for what he didn't say, as for what he did say. In his opinion, the only probability were attacks by stealth—nuisance attacks. That is all he said. The admiral did not support the Army's two major contentions. He was requested to, but refused—in very apt and precise language.

As illustrative of the military mind which tolerates no examination into reasons, recall that when General Richardson was cross-examined he became very agitated and forcefully shaking his finger at Mr. Anthony, he said: "And I feel that you are trying to weaken my authority out here." To this Mr. Anthony replied that he was simply trying to see to it that his client got a fair trial under the Constitution.

The result of the district court trial was that Judge Metzger issued the writ, and the respondent appealed to the ninth circuit court. You have, perhaps, read Judge Metzger's decision in the Duncan case. Maybe since you have read the Supreme Court's decision you have noted that though it agreed with Judge Metzger's conclusions that the military had no jurisdiction to try a civilian for a civilian offense, it did not mention Judge Metzger's point that Governor Stainback's proclamation of February 8, 1943, ended martial law in the Territory. That the Supreme Court did not does not mean that Judge Metzger was wrong on that point. It simply was not necessary for the Supreme Court to reach that point in order to arrive at a decision. In connection with Judge Metzger's point, however, perhaps you might be interested to know that testimony is available to establish that between the last draft and the final document agreed upon in Washington, without bothering the President except for some signatures to prepared letters, the sentence expressly continuing martial law was dropped—perhaps accidentally. So it is that there may be a difference between what was intended and what was actually said.

Next came the White case. We can pass that for it has not much color except that it shows the extent to which the Army's yearning for power took it. White was a stock broker, tried and convicted in an afternoon upon oral charges of embezzling a client's funds. A case of absolutely no military significance.

The Duncan and White cases were both appealed to the ninth circuit court. The full court heard the appeals—quite an unusual circumstance. The circuit court roughly reversed the district court in both cases. Judge A. L. Stephens heard the arguments but did not join in the decision—nor did he dissent until after the Supreme Court rendered its decision. Then he filed nunc pro tunc a dissent which he had previously prepared.

The Government argument in behalf of the Army in the ninth circuit court that the Constitution of the United States did not apply to Hawaii rolled off the backs of many, and the cases wound their way—beset en route with delays—to the Supreme Court.

While the Duncan and White cases were in the ninth circuit court there was another habeas corpus case. It did not attract very much notice but it was strenuously contested and was in its own right of special importance for two reasons:

(1) It involved in part a criminal charge pending against the petitioner prior to the war, and

(2) It involved a date prior to the battle of Midway.

You may recall it—it was the Spurlock case. Spurlock was a civilian war worker, an American of African descent from Alabama. He was arrested in November 1941 for a minor offense: assaulting a civilian policeman under questionable circumstances. He had been released upon bond. When war broke out, his case remained on the police court calendar untried. When the provost courts took over—and they did just that—they took over all pending criminal work in all the Territorial courts, police courts and courts of record. So after the war, Spurlock was haled into the Honolulu Provost Court and arraigned on the prewar charge. He plead "Not guilty", but was found guilty in characteristic provost court fashion. Though they had no probation system, the provost court placed Spurlock on probation. Spurlock returned to work. Later he got into trouble again, and was again required to face the provost court on a charge growing out of a "cutting affair." He was charged with a felony under the Territorial laws. Bond was denied him, and after 4 days in jail he was brought into the crowded provost courtroom. The Infantry colonel presiding said to him: "Oh, I see you are back! You are up on probation." The charge was read and the colonel instantly said: "Five years at hard labor. That is all. Take him away." He could have said, "Off with his head!" Not 10 minutes elapsed between the time Spurlock left jail until he was back there. He had not even been asked if he was guilty!

When Spurlock applied for a writ it was, after the hearing, granted. Spurlock was released upon bond. The Army appealed. The Ninth Circuit Court reversed without an opinion, Spurlock applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, and here, gentlemen, is what happened next. Remember Spurlock was at liberty upon bond, and the court had granted him permission to accept a job as a cook aboard a merchant vessel and to go on it into the war zone. He actually went on a supply ship to Saipan as I recall it. Now when the Supreme Court granted his application and agreed to review the case, General Richardson pardoned Spurlock. We will pass over the question of the source of his pardoning power and let us read his pardon itself:

"2. Whereas, it appears to the best interest of the United States that the execution of so much of the sentence of said Frederick L. Spurlock as remains unexecuted on this February 3, 1945, be remitted so that he may engage in work that will promote the national defense of the United States;

"3. Now, therefore it appearing proper, it hereby is ordered that so much of the sentence of the said Frederick L. Spurlock as remains unexecuted on this February 3, 1945, be, and the same hereby is, remitted."

The Army's attorneys then told the Supreme Court that the case had become moot, which by the Army's action of course it had. Here, too, is what the Army's attorneys told the Supreme Court:

"In the case at bar the Solicitor General advised the War Department, properly it is believed, of his doubts as to the correctness of the decision below, in view of the problem raised by the findings of the district court to which reference has been made in the text. The Solicitor General has been advised that these doubts were communicated to the commanding general, but that the commanding general has stated that other grounds for remission were taken into consideration by him."

Did the Army in good faith truly believe in the legality, the constitutionality of its acts? Did it really wish an ultimate ruling from the Supreme Court? Or was it bluffing, stalling, threatening, dodging, and evading while it ground your rights and mine under the butt of a gun? The record speaks for itself. I feel sure that had the Duncan and White cases not attracted such wide-spread national attention and concern, Duncan and White would have been pardoned. However, it could be that in voluntarily relinquishing his position as military governor, as President Roosevelt to his knowledge was en route to Hawaii, the general lost upon his own theory the power to pardon.

The Supreme Court's decision is, as I have said, a victory for the Constitution. The men who wrote in the Declaration of Independence: "He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power," rest easier in their graves. You should rest easier in your homes. If what they did here was right, it could be done at any time in any other part of the United States. You may not realize how close to military dictatorship we came. If you do not, read the Supreme Court's dissenting opinion.

Yes, "they did it." They did it intentionally. They did it with design aforethought. They did it in knowing disregard of the Constitution. They did it because Hawaii is not a State. They did it because they did not have faith that Americanism transcends race, class, and creed.

So "they did it"—with a gun.

Wagner-Ellender-Taft Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. SAVAGE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House have been deprived of an opportunity to vote on the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. That bill, which is essential to the veterans' housing program, remains in the Banking and Currency Committee. It was urgent legislation. It was desperately needed to assure homes for the millions of veterans who are victimized in the present housing shortage. Time alone will not bring them relief. Only bold action by this Congress could have helped them. Their only hope remains in this Congress. For that reason, the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill must be considered urgent unfinished business.

In reaching the difficult decision that time did not permit consideration of the bill at this session, the Committee on Banking and Currency took no action prejudicial to prompt and decisive action on the bill at the earliest opportunity. Only an excessive work load of the committee prevented its action prior to this time. The Committee continued its efforts to complete hearings and report the bill up to the last minute that there remained a possibility for House action. If the Congress is called back into session, this bill must be taken up then. At the latest, it must be acted upon at the earliest possible moment when the new Congress convenes.

Let us not delude ourselves. When we go home we shall face criticism for our failure to act on this bill. The veteran who is living with his wife and children in crowded and insanitary quarters will not thank us for our inaction. The veteran who searches everywhere for a decent home at a price he can afford will not thank us. The veteran who is forced to a slum dwelling will not thank us. We cannot avoid their criticism. Our explanation that we did not have time to act on this bill will not satisfy the veteran who spends hours out of each day seeking a home. To that veteran we can have little to say that will excuse ourselves or be of comfort to him.

Let us recognize frankly that we are in this position because of the calculated opposition of certain highly organized real-estate interests to any realistic housing program. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent by the real-estate lobby to defeat the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. That lobby has done its utmost to make it appear that the people, too, are opposed to the kind of housing program the bill will provide. They have failed in that, for few pieces of legislation have received such broad and earnest support from the groups that most truly represent the public interest. The opposition to the bill has, however, succeeded in delaying its enactment. The obstructionist tactics of a minority of members of the Banking and Currency Committee delayed and disrupted hearings week after week until finally time ran out. For the moment, the will of the people, and I truly believe, the will of the Congress, have been nullified by a subtly conceived strategy of filibuster and obstruction by the reactionaries on the committee.

The Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill has not been defeated. It remains as unfinished business of the Banking and Currency Committee, and as a continuing responsibility of this Congress. Let that selfish minority which has opposed it know that we who take seriously our obligations to the people and most especially to the veterans of this country, intend that the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill shall be brought before the House. I am confident that when that day comes, the House will enact it into law.

The History of Fort Kearney

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, old Fort Kearney, located in Kearney County, Nebr., is important not only in the history of the West, but in the history of our Republic. In response to a request that I made, the National Park Service has looked into the matter of its restoration and preservation.

I wish to include in my remarks a letter to the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments, and also an abstract of the history of the fort by Dr. Lyle Edwin Mantor.

JULY 23, 1946.

ADVISORY BOARD ON NATIONAL PARKS, HISTORIC SITES, BUILDINGS, AND MONUMENTS,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the Nebraska delegation in the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectfully call your attention to the historic significance of old Fort Kearney, located in Kearney County, Nebr.

This place is rich in the history of our country, next year will be the one hundredth anniversary of its founding. It was an outpost in the settlement of the West and was on the Old Oregon Trail and also on the first transcontinental telegraph line. We urge your Board to restore and improve old Fort Kearney as provided under Public Law 292 of the Seventy-fourth Congress or such other law as is applicable.

Respectfully submitted.

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator.
KENNETH S. WHERRY,
United States Senator.
KARL STEFAN,
Member of Congress.
A. L. MILLER,
Member of Congress.
HOWARD H. BUFFETT,
Member of Congress.
CARL T. CURTIS
Member of Congress.

THE HISTORY OF FORT KEARNEY[1]

(By Lyle Edwin Mantor)

Migration westward during the eighteen forties made necessary the establishment of military posts along the Oregon Trail to afford protection to emigrants passing over the trail and to strengthen the claim of the United States to the Oregon region. The chief purposes of this study are to trace its history during the 25 years of its existence and to present an account of the significance of this post as a factor in the development of the West. Fort Kearney was located at the eastern fringe of the Indian country and was called upon to protect emigrants, passengers, and freighters, until the opening of the Pacific railroad made such protection unnecessary.

Difficulty was experienced in the selection of the first site for the new post. It was finally located at the mouth of Table Creek, on the Missouri River in 1846. The outbreak of the Mexican War, at the time the fort was to be garrisoned, left no Regular troops available for this duty. Volunteers from the State of Missouri were pressed into service and formed the first garrison. The War Department soon realized that the Missouri River site was not properly chosen with regard to the route taken by western emigration. The Missouri River was not crossed so far north, but the larger part of the emigrants crossed at Westport, Leavenworth, or St. Joseph. Removal of the fort to the traveled highway was necessary. An exploring party sent out in the fall of 1847 selected a more suitable site for the fort. After a thorough reconnaissance the engineer officer in charge recommended a place at the southernmost point of the Platte River, where the Oregon Trail touched that stream. The fort was moved to the new location in the spring of 1848. The land upon which the post was located originally belonged to the Pawnee Indians, and had been partially ceded to the United States in 1833. Steps were immediately taken by the Government to enter into a treaty to extinguish the Pawnee Indian title. The Missouri Mounted Volunteers, moved from the Missouri to the Platte, were used in the work of constructing the buildings for the new post. The little timber available proved to be of poor quality for lumber. It was necessary to build some of the buildings from sod and adobe bricks, which were cut and dried by the soldiers. Unaccustomed to such work, they did not do well, and not much was accomplished. The close of the Mexican War, for which the volunteers had been enlisted, caused them to be withdrawn from Fort Kearney for discharge. They were relieved by a detachment of mounted rifles, upon whom fell the task of completing the buildings begun during the summer.

Nearly 50,000 emigrants passed over the Oregon Trail during the gold rush of 1849. There was little Indian danger until Fort Kearney was reached, but westward Indians were apt to be encountered at any time. Most of the gold seekers were inexperienced travelers and found it necessary to reorganize their trains at the fort. Often, from wagons too heavily laden, they discarded every possible item of equipment, and sometimes even food, to lighten loads for the long journey ahead. The stop to rest the animals, to repair outfits, and to reorganize trains, made the fort a very busy place during the travel season.

Emigration begun in the forties continued through the fifties. A major portion of the overland travel to California and Oregon passed over the Oregon Trail. Fort Kearney became a fixed and established point on that trail, its garrison affording protection in time of Indian danger and its storehouses providing food and supplies to stranded or impecunious travelers far from home. The commanding officer at the fort was authorized by a law to issue or sell supplies from the Government warehouse, upon requisition, to such persons as he deemed worthy of aid. The officers were very careful about approving such requests, but despite this, many applications were accepted. Large numbers of persons were inexperienced in plains travel, and because of unwise selection of goods, found themselves in need when Fort Kearney was reached. Accident or robbery deprived others of food. The fort rendered necessary aid in these cases and an important service to those in distress.

Unrest among the Sioux Indians west of Fort Kearney became noticeable during the summer of 1854. Guards were furnished for emigrant trains and depredations by the savages were reduced to a minimum. The following year a large force was sent to subdue the Sioux. Fort Kearney, with Forts Laramie and Pierre, were used as bases of operation in this campaign.

Conditions in Utah caused President Pierce to send an army, under Brig. Gen. W. S. Harney, to that territory in 1857. While no troops were ordered upon this campaign from the garrison at Fort Kearney, the fort became the scene of great activity during the operations. The western posts were not sufficiently manned to furnish the needed troops. The regiments were assembled at Fort Leavenworth, and from there ordered west. Forts Kearney and Laramie were used as concentration points for men and supplies.

Increasing population on the plains and in the mountain regions created a need for better communication. Mail service was slow and the western military posts were unable to communicate rapidly with their department commanders. During the fifties contracts were let for more rapid mail service, but even with this improvement nearly a month was required for orders to reach Fort Kearney from headquarters at St. Louis. Post returns required five weeks to go from the fort to the Adjutant General's office in Washington.

With the inauguration, in the spring of 1860, of the Pony Express, Fort Kearney was brought into much closer touch with high command. Connecting as it did with the telegraph at St. Joseph, the express brought important communications from that point to the fort in less than two days. The Pony Express station at Fort Kearney was the point of departure into the Indian country, and many of the riders, including William Campbell, William F. Cody, and others, had narrow escapes from the Cheyennes and Sioux.

By November, 1860, the Missouri and Western Telegraph Company had built its line westward as far as Fort Kearney. Here the express riders took the communications coming in over the wire and rushed them westward. The telegraph brought the fort into instantaneous communication with its headquarters and greatly increased the effectiveness of the post. The next spring saw work of construction on the telegraph line pushed westward. From November, 1860, until August 1861, Fort Kearney was the western terminus of the telegraph.

The outbreak of the Civil War had an immediate effect upon Fort Kearney. All Regular Army troops were withdrawn for service in putting down the rebellion, and volunteer regiments, largely from the State of Iowa and the Territory of Nebraska, replaced this garrison. Ordnance was likewise ordered transferred to Fort Leavenworth leaving that post without cannon. Located near the dividing line between free and slave territory. Fort Kearney was the scene of many an impassioned argument between northern and southern sympathizers. The commanding officer of the fort at the outbreak of the war was a native of Virginia and an ardent southern man. He soon left the service of the United States and later served as a colonel in the Confederate Army.

Desertions from the volunteer regiments stationed at the fort were numerous during the war. Many of the men had enlisted with service at the battle front in mind, and were disappointed at being assigned to duty away from the theater of war. Homesickness also prompted many desertions from the post.

Withdrawal of Regular Army regiments and their experienced officers from Fort Kearney and the western posts, was an open invitation to the Indians to resume warlike activities. During the summer of 1864 a number of outbreaks occurred both east and west of Fort Kearney, in which great property loss was suffered, and a number of settlers lost their lives. In the outbreaks along the Little Blue River, southeast of the fort, as many as 25 settlers were slain and several women and children carried off captives by the Indians. Troops were sent there from the post, and they, with several regiments from Kansas, drove the Indians away. At Plum Creek, west of Fort Kearney, a wagon train was burned and several men killed. Troops were sent from the fort upon receipt of telegraphic notice of the attack.

The Indian outbreaks made necessary the establishment of several outposts which were garrisoned and supplied from Fort Kearney. Detachments were sent from the fort and from these outposts to protect the settlers and to drive off the Indians. During these outbreaks it was not possible for the stage coaches to operate and for several weeks no travel was possible. With the resumption of travel it was necessary to send armed escorts from Fort Kearney to protect the passengers and mail from Indian attack.

Toward the close of the Civil War a company of Pawnee Indians was recruited by the Army for scout duty. The Pawnees were willing to enlist for service against their enemies, the Sioux. These troopers were a picturesque military outfit but were efficient soldiers. They were stationed at Fort Kearney and were used in the operations along the Overland Trail.

Several companies, enlistments of former Confederates, were stationed at Fort Kearney in 1865. These men had been taken prisoners of war and had been confined in the prison pens of Chicago and Rock Island. They had had enough of fighting in the Confederate Army and did not wish to be exchanged. Desirous of getting out of prison, they were willing to enlist in the United States Army provided they were not required to fight against their brethren. They were sent West for duty against the Indians, and in this capacity rendered faithful service.

Fort Kearney had, by the early sixties, become an important station on the stage and freighting routes. The roads from the Missouri River towns joined there and all of the vast traffic of the plains by way of the Platte Valley route concentrated at that point. From Fort Kearney westward the route of the carrying trade followed the great military road along the south bank of the river. In 1860 more than 20,000,000 pounds of freight passed the Fort, requiring 40,000 oxen, 4,000 wagons, and more than 4,500 men to handle it. As many as 500 heavily loaded wagons passed Fort Kearney in a day. Had it not been for the protection afforded by the fort, this vast movement of freight would not have been possible.

Passenger travel past Fort Kearney was very heavy. Here the stage line from Omaha, which followed the route along the north bank of the Platte River, joined with the line from Atchison, which followed the Oregon Trail up to the fort. Often passengers from Omaha found it necessary to wait several days at the fort for a west-bound stage with room for them. The stage company had, besides its station, a huge storehouse, barns, and shops. Here also was located one of its largest and best stations for the serving of meals to passengers.

After the Civil War the volunteer regiments were withdrawn from Fort Kearney to be mustered out and Regular Army regiments sent to garrison the post. During the process of moving the volunteer troops eastward as high as 1,400 men were stationed at the fort. With the arrival of the Regular troops efforts were made to put down the Indian uprisings which had begun during the latter part of the war. Numerous details, sent from the fort, reconnoitered the country and sought hostile Indians. Stages and freighters were given guard escort and small garrisons continued at the substations established at the beginning of the Indian outbreak.

There being no direct route to the newly discovered gold fields in the southwestern part of the Territory of Montana, the Government resolved to open a road by way of the Powder River Valley. To carry this plan into execution, Col. Henry B. Carrington of the Eighteenth United States Infantry was selected and Fort Kearney was made the base of operations. The Eighteenth Infantry was recruited to strength and sent to the fort during the winter and spring and the expedition left Fort Kearney in May 1867.

At that time Maj. Gen. John Pope was commander of the district of the Missouri, which included the Department of the Platte, in which Fort Kearney was located. He believed that the population west had outgrown transportation by wagons and that the Government should render material aid in the building of railroads. The plains could not be settled and the military posts there would have to be maintained as long as there were Indians in the region. Fort Kearney would be needed for a long time to come. He designated the fort as the point of rendezvous for all trains destined for Denver City or Fort Laramie, by way of the Platte River route. Westbound wagon trains were not permitted to go beyond Fort Kearney unless sufficiently strong to withstand Indian attack. The provost-marshal of the fort was held responsible for the concentration of the smaller trains into greater strength before permitting them to proceed into the Indian country.

Completion of the Union Pacific Railroad past Fort Kearney in the late sixties made passenger travel more comfortable by train and safe from Indian attack. Fares, at 10 cents per mile, were about half that of the stage. Freight rates by wagon from the Missouri River to Denver were much higher than by rail, but despite this fact some freighting was done by wagon, to points not directly on the railroad, for several years after the railroad was built. The building of the Pacific railroad, and the consequent abandonment of the overland route as an artery of travel, made military protection no longer necessary. The garrison at the fort was greatly reduced.

While the railroad was being built the fort furnished guard details to protect the construction workers. Even after the road was finished past the one hundredth meridian, occasional Indian danger made the continuance of such protection necessary. The garrison at Fort Kearney always stood in readiness to meet all demands made upon it for guards.

Military posts established on the public domain were placed upon reservations 10 miles square. The reservation at Fort Kearney included slightly more than the 100 square miles. Scarcity of timber for lumber and fuel made it necessary to reserve the heavily wooded inlands in the Platte River for a distance of 16 miles, rather than 10, to insure an adequate supply for use at the fort. Since most of the troops stationed at the post were mounted, forage for the horses was a serious problem. Except for the first few years, when the garrison was small, no persons were permitted to camp on the reservation, where all grass was required for the mounts of the troops.

In appearance Fort Kearney was not unlike other western frontier posts. The site of the fort proper was located about a half mile south of the Platte River, midway north and south within the reservation boundaries, 2 miles from the western edge and 8 miles from the eastern. The buildings, constructed of native lumber and adobe, were situated around a rectangular parade ground 4 acres in extent. The flagstaff stood in the center of the parade ground.

The Indian outbreak of 1864 caused the district commander to erect, adjacent to the fort, earthworks surmounted by a wooden stockade. This enclosure comprised an acre and was sufficient to protect the entire garrison in case of Indian attack. While Fort Kearney was never attacked by the Indians, a sentinel was fired upon in August 1864.

In addition to the military buildings at the fort, the Overland Stage Line had been permitted to erect such buildings as were necessary for its business. The post sutler also had a building near the parade ground as did the postmaster, Moses Sydenham, who also operated a book and stationery store. The telegraph office shared the quarters of his bookstore and was one of the most active places about the post.

Merchants were not permitted to establish themselves upon the military reservation but the post sutler had the exclusive privilege of selling to the troops. Two villages grew up at the eastern and western edge of the military reservation, beyond the jurisdiction of military authority. The one to the west, Kearney City, or Dobytown, was nearer to the fort and was the more important. It derived its name from the adobe material with which the buildings were constructed.

Dobytown consisted of 12 or 15 buildings, the majority of which were disreputable places. Whisky was the principal article of commerce. There were several large outfitting stores including those of Brown & Lydell and Anson Michel, which catered to the needs of the emigrants and freighters passing through. These establishments did a considerable business until the railroad made freighting a thing of the past. For a time Dobytown was the principal outfitting point west of the Missouri River.

Soldiers from the fort, and those en route to posts west, formed a large percentage of the customers of Dobytown stores. Whisky could not be purchased from the post sutler, except under stringent regulation, if at all. But many customers in Dobytown saloons wore the uniform of the United States. Other goods not sold by the sutler were also purchased from the nearby merchants. With the passing of the fort, Dobytown was also abandoned.

The life of the soldiers at Fort Kearney was similar to that of troops at other western posts. The early years appear to have been spent in almost as great isolation as that of a ship at sea. Mails were slow and irregular and communication between the soldiers and relatives and friends back home was difficult. Movement on the plains almost ceased during the winter months. Through the cold weather the post was even more isolated than during the travel season.

Drill and ordinary garrison duty made up the daily routine of the soldier. The men, when used for duty not strictly military, such as cutting wood, putting up hay, or doing construction work, received, after 1866, extra pay. Escort and scouting duty also occupied much of their time. One of the most hated of all assignments was that of escort to the slow-moving ox trains. Protecting the less monotonous stages was less objectionable.

Discipline immediately after the war was very lax. Desertions were surprisingly frequent from the volunteer organizations, as many as 11 men deserting in one day during the summer of 1865. Even the commissioned personnel of the post was not entirely free from deserters. With the coming of Regular Army regiments, most of which had enviable records of service during the war, discipline was again restored.

The introduction of the breech-loading rifle after the war caused Fort Kearney, in common with other posts, to be used as a proving ground for the several models then being considered for adoption by the Army. At the same time the relative merits of ammunition manufactured by the Ordnance Department, and that by private firms, was tested.

By 1870 it was realized that the need for Fort Kearney as a military post had passed. A few years previously Gen. William T. Sherman had visited the fort and had considered strongly ordering its abandonment at that time. During the last years of maintenance the post was garrisoned by but 50 men. Early the following year the War Department ordered Fort Kearney abandoned as a military post, and the removal of its garrison to Omaha barracks.

Squatters settled on the military reservation and the site of the old fort was put to agricultural uses. One of the squatters on the fort land was a former sergeant who had been stationed at the post. In 1873 William O. Dungan, also a former soldier, but never stationed at Fort Kearney, bought the squatter rights to the land upon which the fort had been located. He removed his family there from Illinois and built his house on the old parade ground.

Numerous attempts were made to secure congressional assent to the disposition of the 65,000-acre reservation as a whole. Some attempts were made to have it ceded to the State but these were unsuccessful. It was even proposed by Moses Sydenham and others to remove the National Capital to the reservation and to name the new city thus created New Washington. This plan was not favored in the East, and never received serious consideration by Congress.

In 1876 an act was approved transferring the reservation to the Department of the Interior for settlement under the homestead law. The land was surveyed and opened to entry the following year. Mr. Dungan filed on the quarter upon which the fort had been located. By applying time spent in the Army during the war he was able to prove up his entry in less than the usual 5-year period and to receive a patent from the Government conveying title to the site of the old fort.

The tract remained in Mr. Dungan's possession until his death in 1922. A short time prior to this, historically minded persons undertook to secure the site of old Fort Kearney as a State park. Mr. Dungan's demise threw his estate into litigation. Further efforts were held in abeyance until legal matters could be adjusted. When it was apparent that the land would be sold at a referee's sale interest was again aroused and steps taken to purchase the site for park purposes.

With the organization of the Fort Kearney Memorial Association in 1928, the prospect of creating a State memorial park became more real. Efforts were at once begun to procure the necessary funds for carrying out this purpose. The money was subscribed largely by the citizens living in the vicinity of the old fort, and the 40 acres upon which the building of the post stood, were purchased.

Title to the tract for use as a State park was tendered to the State of Nebraska by the association. On March 26, 1929, an act was approved by the State legislature accepting the tender and creating therefrom a State historical and scenic park and bird reserve. The following December, Gov. Arthur J. Weaver personally visited the park and accepted officially the deed to the site of the old Fort Kearney.

General Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. KOPPLEMANN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, this Congress is being severely censured for not taking final action on the general housing bill. There is still time to act. I hope that the Banking and Currency Committee will reverse its decision and permit the measure to come to a vote on the strength of the evidence presented to the Senate committee and on which the Senate approved the bill. We must not permit a mistaken belief, that because it is long-range legislation it can safely go over until next session, to lull us into ignoring the urgency of this bill. To be sure, the measure has important long-range aspects, but it has immediate implications for the solution of our present housing crisis as it pertains to the vets. We have enacted legislation designed to spur the output of building materials, but have failed so far to provide tools to use these materials in a balanced housing program.

Most of the housing now under way is beyond the financial means of most veterans. Moreover, most of it is housing built for sale. The veteran who can buy only at a moderate or low price, or the veteran who needs an apartment rather than a house, tramps the streets in vain to find evidence of anything we have done for him.

I am daily receiving letters, bitter in their disillusionment over the promises we made to the boys while they were in uniform and our failure to keep those promises insofar as providing the means for their establishing homes once they had returned to take up again the threads of their civilian lives.

Unless we act promptly to provide for a balanced housing program, tens of thousands of veterans, who have no alternative and must have some place to live, will be compelled to buy at a price they cannot afford, and before they are settled down and ready to assume the heavy responsibilities of home ownership.

Delay in enacting the general housing bill, which provides a variety of tested aids toward producing the types of housing that veterans need, will inevitably bring in its wake a disastrous wave of foreclosures, loss of homes and savings, and disillusionment.

The bill provides methods that the great majority of people concerned with housing, and the American people as a whole, are convinced must be adopted and utilized now.

The liberalized insurance provisions of the bill, the extension of the mortgage period, and the reduced interest rate will help bring the finished house within the means of the veteran who needs it.

The assistance the bill offers to local communities to help them provide public housing for veterans who cannot afford decent housing of any kind would help solve our housing problem, not next year nor the year after, but this year. The program under the law will go into action as soon as the measure is signed.

The measure provides housing of low and moderate scale for veterans on farms.

The sum total of the best thinking on urban redevelopment stemming from the experience of many years is embodied in the bill to make it possible that new housing may be constructed within the confines of a city instead of scattering it to outlying areas, sometimes miles away from where the veteran works.

The benefits of vast research on everything from materials to site planning, which would help to lower the cost and improve the quality of housing of all types is available now through this measure.

The bill on the whole is practical and offers common-sense applications of the basic principles of any sound housing program. To fail to act on this bill means that we will fail to utilize a program which is imperative to meet the needs of veterans today.

It is a big program, but the times are big and our problems are big.

What Randall Dam Means

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. CASE. of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, when General Pick touches off the charge that breaks the first ground for the beginning of construction of Randall Dam, a new era opens for South Dakota and for the Missouri River region.

This will be the largest construction job ever undertaken in South Dakota. Its cost will be in the neighborhood of $70,000,000.

As such, it will be twice in dollars the cost of the Black Hills Ordnance Depot, constructed by the Army at Provo or Igloo, as it is now named, previously the largest single construction job in the State. Incidentally, that job was also done under the supervision of General Pick when he was division engineer in the early stages of the war before he went to India to build the Ledo Road.

And the Black Hills Ordnance Depot, in turn, was twice the size of any other single construction job undertaken by the Federal Government in South Dakota, and was equal to all the other wartime installations, the Rapid City Army Air Base, the Sioux Falls Air Corps Technical School, and the satellite fields of Mitchell, Pierre, and Watertown.

The ordnance depot was equal to those combined, and now Randal Dam is to be twice the job of the ordnance depot. That will give some idea of what is being begun today.

Aside from the impact of a huge construction job, what will this dam mean to South Dakota? What to the Missouri Valley?

The primary purpose of Randall Dam is flood control. The control of Missouri River floods is the principal justification for the building of this dam by the Federal Government.

But get this point clearly: very little if any of the flood-control benefits will come to South Dakota soil.

The benefits to come from flood control are for Sioux City and below. The farm lands of Nebraska and Iowa, 3,000,000 acres of which were inundated and many hundreds of thousands were ruined for many crop years by the floods of 1943 and 1944—they will benefit.

The cities of Sioux City and Council Bluffs and Omaha and Kansas City whose industries were closed and whose homes were isolated—they will be the beneficiaries.

The key railroads of the Nation that operate between Sioux City and Omaha and Kansas City—they will benefit.

And the benefits from floods controlled and waters made available for river transportation, these will repay the costs. The damages in the 2 years of floods, 1943 and 1944, in the area below Sioux City totaled over $100,000,000. That was dollar damage and does not count the dangers to life, the interruptions of commerce, and the general injury to a nation at war—an injury which the overseas enemy would have spent a great army to achieve.

But for South Dakota, the building of the dam and the creation of a huge lake, what will it mean to the State that furnishes the site for the dam and 108,000 acres of land which the lake will cover? Some of that land is choice river-bottom land, rich for producing corn. The big lake will require the moving of the railroad bridge at Chamberlain and the moving of a highway bridge on White River which will be backed up for many miles. What benefits will there be to South Dakota for the permanent flooding of these acres and the reorganization of her internal life that will be required?

The answer must come from two sources: An abundance of cheap power and the creation of cheap water transportation. Unless we get those benefits in large measure, Randall Dam will be an expensive dream for South Dakota.

I am purposely making that statement today because I think the responsibility rests upon those who guide the destinies of South Dakota to see that we do get those benefits. So I repeat it: Unless South Dakota gets an abundance of cheap electric power and cheap water transportation, the construction of Randall Dam and Reservoir will have been an expensive dream for South Dakota.

We can demand and get those benefits, however.

As of April 1, 1934, South Dakota stood thirty-sixth in rank among the States of the Union for percentage of electrified farms. We had electricity on but 3.5 percent of our farms. Six years later, although an additional 2 percent of our farms had electricity, we had dropped from thirty-sixth and forty-seventh among the States in ratio of electrified farms.

And as of June 30, 1945, although 11.5 percent of our farms had electricity, we still ranked forty-seventh among the States in proportion of electrified farms to total farms in the State.

The explanation is that with large sources of power in most other States, they were ready to take advantage of rural electrification when it came along. We were not ready, and of course our wide-open spaces do not invite speedy electrification. Some of the ranches, of course, will only be served by local plants, but the field for extending the service of electricity to our people is large.

For this reason, in all my contacts with the development of the plans for harnessing the Missouri River in South Dakota, I have stressed the possibilities of cheap power for our people.

Back in 1935, before I was elected to Congress, I spoke and wrote of the Missouri River as our greatest undeveloped natural resource. Partly I had in mind its possibilities for irrigation, but largely power and irrigation as far as the Randall Dam is concerned.

But there will be no irrigation from Randall Dam. Our only chances for irrigation benefit from the Missouri River development in South Dakota must be found from higher up on the river and on the tributaries. So we must look to power and transportation for the benefits from Randall Dam and Reservoir.

There will be some scenic and recreational possibilities, of course, but they could be obtained much more cheaply by direct development of the river bottom if that was all we were after.

Now, then, in power—what is the prospect?

Brig. Gen. R. C. Crawford, Acting Chief of Engineers, and himself a former division engineer of the Missouri division, in a letter written July 24, 1946, assures me that power will be a part of the initial development of Randall Dam. He says:

> The outlet works will consist of a conduit beneath the dam containing power penstocks and sluices for stream-flow regulation. * * * It is tentatively planned to provide an ultimate power installation of not less than 240,000 kilowatts, of which about 80,000 kilowatts will be designed initially.

How much is 240,000 kilowatts? It is far more than all the power consumed in South Dakota today.

The generators for 80,000 kilowatts which will be initially installed compare with a total of 20,000 generator capacity in Sioux Falls today—that is four times as much. An additional quantity is imported from outside the State, about 8,000 kilowatts at the time the Bureau of Reclamation and Federal Power Commission made their study for the Sloan report, so that the power of Randall Dam initially will be at least three times the power used in the Sioux Falls area.

That should suggest what is ahead for a starter—and keep in mind that ultimate Randall power will be capable of a 240,000-kilowatt installation, or 10 times the entire power generation of Sioux Falls plants when the reclamation power studies were made in 1943.

The ultimate power possibilities on the Missouri River Reservoir system in South Dakota will be from 8 to 10 times all of the power now produced in South Dakota. I leave to others and the future the job of figuring how it will all be used.

But I stress this power point today because unless we do take steps to use this power we will have little to show for the surrender of the lands which will be flooded in this State for all time to come. Fortunately, we are already in position to take and use much of the initial power. I shall not speak of industry. I shall speak only of rural electrification.

In the fiscal year just closed June 30, 1946, REA loans allotted to South Dakota totaled $7,200,000, which is practically equal to the entire amount allocated in the nine preceding years of REA history.

And REA officials in Washington last week told me that they contemplated that about another $7,000,000 would be approved for South Dakota REA projects in the current fiscal year.

Electricity should be the cheapest hired hand a farmer can get today and any day. And the best part of it is that electricity on the farm helps the farmer's wife as much as it does the farmer. Instead of making more clothes to wash it washes clothes for the whole family.

So let us take steps individually and collectively to put this power to work so that we will be ready to use it when the generators start to spin.

Now, just a word about transportation. That will be longer in coming, but it, too, is on the way.

The Chief of Engineers advises that the design of the works will be so arranged that navigation locks can be provided around the end of the dam at a future date when conditions warrant such an installation. The district engineer, Lt. Col. D. B. Freeman, is now engaged in studies of the Missouri from Sioux City to the Montana State line to determine what navigation possibilities exist and may be practically developed within the over-all plan of water utilization.

That study is undertaken by direction of Congress and the report is scheduled to be received for review by the Board of Rivers and Harbors by September 1, 1947. That report, the Chief of Engineers advises, will include a thorough study of the need for navigation locks at the Fort Randall and other reservoirs of the comprehensive plan for the Missouri River Basin.

So, what we see here today is both a culmination of plans of the past and the commencement of plans for the future.

Each of us, in our respective fields of activity, in private life or in public, shares in the responsibility to see that actual benefits come to the people of South Dakota and the basin in a degree that is equal to the effort and the costs that have been and will be given to the project. Fort Randall played a part in the early history of our Northwest country. Fort Randall dam and reservoir will play an even more revolutionary part in the future of this region.

Breaking of ground for a dam on the Missouri in South Dakota once seemed a far-off objective. Today it is a reality and this reality must be merely the starting point for new horizons of comfort and convenience for the people of the valley for all time to come.

Who Went on the Second "Mission to Moscow"?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin, Mr. Speaker, on page A4029 of the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I inserted a news article from the July 7 Washington Star announcing the sending of two Commerce Department employees to Moscow with Mr. Wallace's trade plans.

The article stated that the United States was to trade industrial "know-how" and machinery for all kinds of raw materials from Russia. The imports of raw materials which were to be encouraged are timber, pulpwood, and furs.

The American people are entitled to know who is being sent around the world to give away their jobs and their markets and what their qualifications are. The following letter gives you the background of the two members of the commission, who although they have never been elected to anything by anybody, are now called upon to give away American jobs in the paper and pulp mills:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE,
Washington, D. C., July 30, 1946.

Hon. REID F. MURRAY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D C.

DEAR MR. MURRAY: This is in response to your request that you be furnished with the date and place of birth, and the education and employment record of Mr. Ernest C. Ropes.

Mr. Ropes was born September 2, 1877, in Brooklyn, N. Y. His grammar- and high-school education was secured under a governess and in private schools in Russia and the United States. In 1899 he received his A. B. degree from Columbia University in New York.

From 1899 to 1923 Mr. Ropes held positions with several different firms. These were mainly as salesman. Between 1923 and 1928 he was a special agent in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce. For 8 months of 1928 he was a Russian expert with the Remington Rand Co. Since 1928 he has been with the Department of Commerce (the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and the Office of International Trade) as a special agent, economic analyst, and Chief of the Russian Unit.

You also requested similar information about Mr. Lewis L. Lorwin.

Mr. Lorwin was born December 4, 1883, near Kiev, Russia. He is an American citizen by virtue of his father's naturalization on August 5, 1895.

Mr. Lorwin received his secondary education in public and private schools in New York City. From 1899 to 1903 he attended Classical College in Russia, receiving a A. B. degree in 1903. During the period, 1907 to 1911, he was a student at Columbia University in New York from which he received a Ph. D. degree in 1912.

Dr. Lorwin's employment record is as follows:

From 1912 to 1916 he did special studies for the New York State Department of Labor; in 1916 he was a lecturer on economics at Wellesley College; from 1916 to 1919 he was professor in economics, labor problems, and public finance at the University of Montana; from 1919 to 1920 he was an editorial writer for the New York World; from 1920 to 1921 he was professor of economics and finance at Beloit College; from 1921 to 1922 he was foreign correspondent for the Chicago Daily News; from 1923 to 1924 Dr. Lorwin devoted his time to the writing of a book entitled "The Women's Garment Workers" for the International Ladies Garment Workers; from 1925 to 1935 he was a member of the staff of the Brookings Institute, during which time he wrote a number of books and reports; from 1935 to 1939 he was economic adviser and chief of economic section of the International Labor Office at Geneva, Switzerland; from 1939 to 1941 he served as a consultant with the National Resources Planning Board; from 1941 to 1942 he was a consultant with the National Resources Planning Board and the Board of Economic Warfare; from 1942 to 1943 he served as economic adviser for the National Resources Planning Board. Since July 1, 1943, Dr. Lorwin has been with the Board of Economic Warfare, the Foreign Economic Administration, and the Office of International Trade as economic adviser.

The Board of Economic Warfare became a part of the Foreign Economic Administration September 25, 1943, when the Administration was established. That agency was abolished October 20, 1945. A portion of it was transferred to the Department of Commerce and now comprises a part of the Office of International Trade.

This information regarding these two employees was taken from their personnel files.

Very truly yours,
CAREY SHAW, Jr.,
Chief, Personnel Management Division.

Mr. Speaker, Wisconsin produces about 60 percent of the furs of the Nation. What chance have American workmen to receive an American wage if Mr. Wallace is going to send out commissions to give away their jobs altogether? We can have friendly business and commercial relations with all countries without appointing any commissions to give away American jobs. This position of Mr. Wallace also again demonstrates that the reciprocal trade treaties were but a figment of some New Dealers imagination, because they are surely being bypassed.

The World Economic Conference to be held in Washington after the elections will no doubt demonstrate what this is really all about.

Let's Finish the Unfinished Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, it is small wonder that in some quarters the battle cry of a former war: "Out of the trenches by Christmas," is being paraphrased to the tune of: "Out of the huts by Christmas," and it might be said with perfect truth that in many cases today instead of having two-car garages, as we were once promised during a previous era, we now have two families in those garages.

This is the situation as it exists. It is well known and it is deplorable. This condition has been created not overnight, but has accumulated over the past 17 years. The first inroads made upon the state of American housing occurred during the great depression of the late 1920's, when, with the breakdown of our economy and its resultant unemployment, scarcities of money and of public faith, the plans and execution of building in this Nation lagged along with all other enterprise. During the 1930's when, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, our Nation was picking up the economic pieces, we began to make progress in restoring to normal this and all other phases of our existence. Then came the great war. We were attacked at Pearl Harbor and forced to fight for our lives.

Nothing is so wasteful as war. It is the exact reverse of the process of production, aiming as it does, at utter destruction of the enemy. No war can be won by half-hearted measures and in our American way, we spared no pains in winning this one as quickly as possible. Our every effort was bent to accomplish the task with the utmost dispatch. Our every national resource was thrown into the battle. From the ways of peace and construction we turned our national economy with miraculous speed into a powerful, huge machine of destruction—a machine which, and I thank God for it, battered our enemies into complete submission and kept our democratic way of life intact.

Many things went into the building of this machine, but the most important factor was the human factor—the men who for 5 years of warfare served their Nation in uniform; the manpower which ran our factories producing the goods of war; the citizens who sacrificed in every way in order to bring the conflict to a speedy and triumphant conclusion. These services will never be weighed, and can never be repaid.

But other things went into the war machine as well—some of them, like postponements of planning, sacrifice of industrial and technological progress in peacetime pursuits, neglect of peacetime science, also immeasurable, and some of them, such as quantities of raw materials used by the machinery of war, quite capable of being measured, weighed, counted, and pigeonholed under the title, "Lost Forever to the Nation as a Sacrifice for Victory."

The housing which we do not have today in large measure falls into that category, and we can but bow our heads to the fact and be thankful that it is a loss of material things and not an increase in the tabulation of those losses which are a billionfold more important to our Nation—the sacrifice of lives of our citizens.

But this history behind the current housing shortage shows us one thing very clearly: What was done 20 years ago; 10 years ago; 5 years ago—has resulted in the situation being as it is today. What we do today—now—is of far greater importance in this connection than ever before. Without immediate, prompt, skilled attention, this problem is bound to become exceedingly worse. On the other hand, by bold action, clear planning and a policy of unflinching execution, we can do two things which will prove of immeasurable benefit.

First. The long-range view is the relief offered by the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, a measure known as Senate bill No. 1592, passed by that body on April 15 of this year, represents the starting point, to me, of all endeavors we may make in this field. It is a constructive effort to rectify the neglect of these past years by centralizing the twenty-odd Federal agencies now dealing in housing problems under one roof in a national housing agency; by providing governmental assistance in slum clearance; by seeking to further private home building through loan and investment insurance; by inaugurating a public housing program of 125,000 units per year in an area of this endeavor which would not interest sufficient private capital because of low returns on the investments, and by providing for Government-financed additional technical research.

It is a comprehensive measure, and I believe it to be a great step forward in a national attempt to solve this problem. It has been undertaken after careful research, and, I repeat, is the cornerstone of our effort to solve this issue.

In the House of Representatives, this bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency on April 16 of this year, and there has been no report on it as yet. It is claimed that failure of this committee to report the bill has been due to the pressure of lobbying groups which are of the opinion that the bill is against the interests of private industry, despite the fact that it has been shown, time and again, that nine-tenths of the measure would benefit private industry.

DEMOLITION PROGRAM ADVOCATED

Second. The immediate view is to get action now.

Amidst the cries of material shortages for housing which are heard on every hand today, the Government itself controls millions of feet of lumber, millions of cubic inches of plumbing, untold quantities of the very materials which could be put to good use immediately in construction of emergency veterans' housing. This material is in the form of surplus Army camps throughout the United States—unused, deserted, and with little likelihood of their being used again.

What could be more logical than to demolish these encampments, to salvage the invaluable housing materials they contain and to place them on the open market or use them immediately in the localities in which they exist for housing projects, either publicly or privately financed?

The huge quantities of this material, coming from these camps, would provide one quick answer to the cries of shortage, would allow time for other sources of housing materials to be opened up, and—a very important point—these supplies, thrown upon the market at this time, would be a very important factor in smashing the black market which currently affects the prices of lumber throughout this country.

This plan has been talked of for some time now, among the various housing agencies, the Army engineers and the War Assets Administration, in charge of the surplus camps. At least a month ago, decision to execute the plan was announced by War Assets Administration, but as yet I have been unable to see any actual results coming from that decision, and as far as I can perceive, this action is being slowed because of problems arising which result from three separate agencies dealing with the plan.

This is just one example of why centralization is needed in housing.

There is much that can be done in an emergency way, when once we take action, concerted and immediate action, to expedite the matter. Prefabricated housing can be arranged, experiments in lightweight metal housing can be performed on a broad basis, with preference for quarters to veterans. And in none of this need private industry fear that the Government is standing forth in direct competition in the housing field. Indeed, governmental activity will serve only to stimulate the opportunities which industry itself needs at this moment to do the best job possible in this urgent endeavor.

The Senate bill No. 1592, provides a mansard roof for the housing program. It strengthens the already existing aids to privately financed housing, including the Home Owners' Loan Act, the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the National Housing Act, expanding their authority for financial action on housing. It gives renewed aid to privately financed housing for families of low income, allowing them much more favorable terms of financing than exist presently. It makes aid available for localities to acquire land for slum clearance under terms encouraging to private industry, in order to develop low-rental housing projects. It provides for protection of labor standards. It provides for increased assistance for farm and rural housing, and it calls for a periodic inventory of housing needs and programs with a view to preventing a recurrence of the same critical situation in years to come.

But above all else, this measure does one thing, it provides for preference, in all these matters, to be shown to veterans and their families and to the families of veterans who died serving their country in the late war. This provision, throughout the bill, is clear and distinct, unequivocal.

Mr. Speaker, we, as a legislative body and as individual citizens of this land, owe much to the veterans of World War II. We owe them everything granted under their "bill of rights," including educational opportunities, the opportunity to employment, preference in the positions they held before being called to service. We owe them the end-of-service payments recently considered on this floor. We owe them all of the aid to reorientation in a civilian world which are provided by the Veterans' Administration. We owe them all these things and more, measuring the sacrifices, which they made for our Nation when called upon to do so.

But let us never forget for one instant that this Nation owes them a home—and more specifically, it owes them homes. The American soldier in Italy in 1943; in Okinawa and France in 1944; in the Philippines and Belgium in 1945; in Germany and Japan following our victory—all of these men had one thought which recurred to them time and again in the midst of their deprivations and struggles. It was that one word: Home.

Home can mean little to them—all that we can give them in tribute and gratitude can mean little to them—if their attempts to find actual homes and from these homes to symbolize and direct the course of their future lives meet with continued failure.

I call for action—emergency action now. I insist that the sooner this problem is met head-on, with American ingenuity and skill, with cooperation and a sincere output of our national energies, the inertia will cease, the homes will be built, and millions of our citizens will be enabled to lead happier, more secure and useful lives.

For this cause I will work unceasingly, and in the knowledge that I will not be the only one sincerely seeking a quick and complete remedy for the situation.

I state emphatically—"Let's finish the unfinished business." Let us take emergency steps—use the emergency powers and proceed to the demolition and marketing of this surplus material.

No problem can grow worse than this one through delay in its consideration; no problem, at this moment, means more to so great a number of our citizens.

I, for one, consider myself bound by honor, by citizenship and by common decency, while a Member of this House, to do everything in my power for as long a time as may be necessary, to insure that meaning and purpose shall be given that word, that ideal, of which our GI's dreamed throughout their concentrated period of work and sacrifice for this Nation—the ideal and conception represented by the simple word called: Home.

Let us put roofs over their heads—floors under their feet. They stood up for us—let us stand up for them.

Free Enterprise: How To Get It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. SAVAGE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial from the Grange News of the State of Washington. This editorial sounds fair warning that we dare not throw off all controls, that monopoly would destroy competitive business. Those who are constantly squawking for the elimination of all controls from big business should give these facts a little serious thought.

FREE ENTERPRISE: HOW TO GET IT

There are many conscientious people who believe that America's economic troubles can best be cured by eliminating restrictions on business and industry, and letting the law of supply and demand regulate prices. This might be a veritable utopia of freedom in enterprise if business, industry, and labor would allow it to come about, but let's look at the record of the past and see what's happened under free enterprise as big business would have it.

Wendell Berge, of the Justice Department, is authority for the statement that less than 12,000 firms are engaged in lumber manufacturing as compared with 28,000 of them 50 years ago; 350 iron and steel manufacturers today as compared with nearly 700 of them 50 years ago; 800 tobacco manufacturers as compared with 15,000 of them 50 years ago; and so down the list of agricultural implements, shoes, chemicals, cotton goods, and others. Mr. Berge also made the following comparison:

In 1909 there were 268,000 manufacturing companies producing $20,000,000,000 worth of goods in the United States.

In 1939 there were 184,000 manufacturing companies producing $56,000,000,000 worth. "This amounts to a reduction of 84,000 establishments in the face of an increase of $36,000,000,000 in value of production" while the country's population increased by some 39,000,000, Mr. Berge said.

Centralization of Government controls has been a natural outgrowth of concentration of private business controls. Huge corporations gobble up little ones, become Nationwide in their extent, tremendously wealthy and able to control legislators and regulatory bodies by the sheer power of money. Individual enterprise is squeezed out, small communities and groups of people become helpless and appeal to State or Federal Government for aid. The Legislature tries to correct the evil by antitrust legislation and through more regulatory bodies, but still the law of supply and demand takes a beating.

The real instigators of regimentation in this country are the monopolists who, under the guise of efficiency, continue to increase their hold on the Nation's resources, fixing prices and restraining competition. The deadly effect of this is that it means restricted production followed by misery and starvation for thousands during recurring depressions—in this "land of plenty." And yet, when such persons are found guilty of monopolistic practices, we slap them on the wrist by extracting from them a small percentage of the money which they have extorted from the public.

If Congress chooses to put some real teeth into our antitrust laws instead of merely giving lip service to them, we may begin to get somewhere along the road to free enterprise and free government.

A. F. Whitney

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN S. GIBSON
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the American people are entitled to know something of the character and background of A. F. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, who, after leading a paralyzing national railroad strike, threatened publicly to spend $47,000,000 of the funds of the brotherhood in an effort to discredit and defeat President Truman because he brought about an end to that strike by forthright and courageous action. Do Mr. Whitney's dictatorial methods, his willingness to paralyze the Nation at a critical hour, and his threats of reprisal against the President of the United States, reflect the opinions and wishes of that great body of railroad men—patriotic citizens—who belong to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and who contributed so magnificently to victory by their outstanding performance in manning the trains during the crucial war years? Or, are those policies and methods of Mr. Whitney representative of something more sinister and subversive, which should be exposed to the scrutiny not only of the members of that great brotherhood but of the entire American people as well? The facts are that Whitney is not a true spokesman for the trainmen of the brotherhood. His allegiance and support is committed rather to those who would undermine the political and economic foundations of the Nation, bring an end to the American way of life, and weaken our institutions by fomenting unrest and discord in every conceivable manner. Whitney has been affiliated with 17 known Communist and Communist-front organizations and has appeared as sponsor or participant in numerous subversive meetings, rallies, and propaganda campaigns. These facts are clearly established in the records of the House Committee on Un-American Activities and in the files of the Department of Justice.

This, then, is the man who threatens to buy the office of President of the United States with $47,000,000 belonging to a group of our most patriotic citizens, and to spend further substantial sums in purging those Members of Congress who will not implement the subversive program to which he is apparently committed. Let us examine some of the facts and discover that Whitney's purported role as champion of the railroad workers of this country is merely a convenient cloak for his support of the political and economic schemes hatched in Moscow.

As far back as 1934 we find Mr. Whitney a speaker at a meeting of the Farmer-Labor Political Federation, an organization lumbering many known Communists among its active supporters. In 1936 he appeared as a contributor to The Fight Against War and Fascism, which was a propaganda vehicle fronting for the Reds. During the year 1938, Whitney's name was listed in the Communist Party organ, The New Masses, as the signer of a statement defending the action of the Soviet Government in the so-called Moscow purge trials, issued by the American League for Peace and Democracy. He became a vice chairman of that league in 1939. It has been denounced by the Department of Justice as a Communist-front organization.

When the Communists were testing their strength against the rival Rome-Berlin dictatorships by dispatching men and armaments from Russia to Spain in 1938, we find Whitney lending public support to this military adventure on the part of the Soviet Government. He sponsored the so-called Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, an organization launched by the Communist fighters in the Spanish Civil War. He became a member of the Coordinating Committee To Lift the Embargo, which agitated the repeal of the Embargo Act so that weapons could be shipped to the Red government of Spain. At about the same time he accepted membership in a similar propaganda agency known as the Washington Committee To Lift the Spanish Embargo. Indicating that Whitney's loyalties are still guided by the vagaries of Soviet policy is his membership in 1945 in another organization fronting for the Communists known as the American Friends of Spanish Democracy. In the November 15, 1938, issue of the Communist New Masses his name again appears as a sponsor of the Committee To Save Spain and China, which was another arm of the Communist Party formed to foment propaganda opposing the duly constituted governments in those countries and favoring their being controlled by Communists. Recent events have proven beyond any doubt that the Kremlin has been looking to Spain and China most particularly as primary outlets for its policy of expansionism and ultimate world domination through military and subversive action.

Make no mistake by assuming that Whitney was merely a misguided liberal who was duped into supporting the Communists by their pretended love for labor and the underprivileged classes. His activities and affiliations show, beyond any possible contradiction, that his support was always pledged to the current program of the Red Internationale no matter how inconsistent and devious it might be. Furthermore, he sponsored those movements which had no connection with the economic and social pretentions of the Communists, but were directed solely toward furtherance of the military and diplomatic schemes of the Kremlin.

After advocating policies close to military intervention by the United States in behalf of the Communist government in Spain, Whitney promptly changed his point of view when Stalin chose to enter into an alliance with Hitler in August 1939. With that reversal of the Soviet course, we find him publicly demanding that the United States keep out of war. On October 13, 1939, Whitney was a speaker at a national conference on civil liberties in the present emergency. which was a meeting sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union to whip up propaganda in support of the Soviet Government in its friendship pact with Hitler. A statement by Whitney in support of the Russian Government, and its foreign and military policies, was published in the September 1941 issue of Soviet Russia Today, the official propaganda organ of the Friends of the Soviet Union, which has since become known as the National Council for American-Soviet Friendship, and was founded and controlled by the Communist Party. He was a member of that organization and, in 1943, sponsored a gathering termed the "Congress of American-Soviet Friendship." As late as February 10, 1944, we find Whitney's name appearing in the pages of the Daily Worker, official organ of the Communist Party, as a sponsor of a similar meeting called a United States-Soviet Friendship Rally.

Whitney's activities were not, however, confined to assisting and supporting the policies of the Russian Communist hierarchy in Moscow. His close connection with the conspiracies and agitations of the Communists in this country is evidenced by his participation in numerous projects of the American Communist Party. He was affiliated with the International Labor Defense, in reality the legal arm of the party and a direct agency of the Red Internationale of Moscow. From 1934 to 1941, he was affiliated with the American Youth Congress, an important political mouthpiece for the same party. On July 1, 1939, Whitney's name is listed as the signer of a call to a convention of the last-named organization. Even more revealing of his connection with the Communist Party is his contribution as a writer to a publication called Champion, the official organ of the Young Communist League. He was also affiliated with the League of American Writers, branded by the Department of Justice as a typical Communist-front organization, and contributed substantially to its propaganda drives.

In addition to these espousals of the cause of the Russian Government and its puppet, the American Communist Party, A. F. Whitney could always be relied upon to lend indirect assistance and support to Reds and their fellow travelers in this country. Between 1938 and 1940, he was a member of the national committee of the self-styled American Civil Liberties Union, the principal function of which was defending Reds and Soviet sympathizers in court. He was also a member of the so-called Joint Committee for Trade Union Rights described by a congressional committee as a "typical front organization of the Communist Party," which devoted itself chiefly to assisting in the defense of Red labor racketeers who had raided the treasury of the International Fur and Leather Workers Union. Other agencies, supported and manned by American Communists, with which Whitney became affiliated include the American Congress for Peace and Democracy, the National Labor Committee, the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, and the National Committee To Abolish the Poll Tax.

In 1942 he signed an open letter to the late President Roosevelt demanding the abandonment of deportation proceedings against Harry Bridges, the Communist chief of the west-coast longshoremen. That letter was sponsored by still another Red-front organization known as the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties. From 1944 he has served as a member of the executive committee of the CIO–National Citizens' Political Action Committee headed by Sidney Hillman. His public identification with the activities of known Communists and Russian sympathizers is shown, perhaps most clearly of all, by his acting as a sponsor of the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Red army.

All these facts, which are well documented and supported in official Government files, when fitted together form a picture which is at once enlightening and tragic. Mr. Whitney's attempt to jeopardize the lives and welfare of the American people and to defy their Government in a Nation-wide railroad strike, and his subsequent public threat to eliminate President Truman and to buy the office of President of the United States, are actions which in no way represent the opinions or wishes of the employees of the great American railroads. The railway unions and the public should know about Mr. Whitney and his actions. They are actions typical of those Red sympathizers and supporters who cater to the slightest whim of the Red Internationale, in its plan to foment unrest and disorder in this Nation as a means of furthering its subversive designs on the American people and their Government—none of which is in the interest of railroad workers, their unions, or the American people.

Lt. Gen. Roy S. Geiger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARDIN PETERSON
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a great American, a great general and a distinguished citizen of Florida, of whom we are proud—a modest man, but a brave man, and a great leader whose inherent worth has been proven on fields of battle. Florida is proud of Lt. Gen. Roy S. Geiger, United States Marine Corps.

Lieutenant General Geiger, is a pioneer marine aviator and the Commanding General, Fleet Marine Force, Pacific, has commanded marine units in four Pacific campaigns—Guadalcanal, Bougainville, Peleliu, and Okinawa—winning three major decorations for outstanding service.

He was appointed to his present rank on June 19, 1945, while in command of the Third Amphibious Corps on Okinawa. On June 18, 1945, when Lt. Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner, Jr., Commander of the Tenth Army, was killed in action, General Geiger temporarily took over command of all forces on the island. He was the first marine ever to head an army.

The fifth marine to become an aviator, General Geiger directed all aviation in the early, bitter days at Guadalcanal. For distinguished work there under fire he was awarded a Gold Star to add to his first Navy Cross which he won as an airman in France in World War I.

In the Bougainville campaign, in the Guam action, and later in the occupation of Peleliu, he was over-all commander of marine and Army troops.

At Bougainville he assumed command of the First Marine Amphibious Corps, relieving Gen. A. A. Vandergrift who headed an initial assault, and who became the present commandant of the Marine Corps. General Geiger received the Distinguished Service Medal for exceptional service at Bougainville, and at Guam his outstanding generalship gained him a Gold Star in lieu of a second Distinguished Service Medal.

Born January 25, 1885 at Middleburg, Fla., the general was graduated from Stetson University, De Land, Fla., in 1907 with a bachelor of laws degree. After serving 2 years as an enlisted man he was appointed a second lieutenant February 5, 1909. During World War I he served with distinction in command of a marine air squadron, and later saw duty in Cuba, Nicaragua, Panama, the Philippines, China, and Haiti.

He is a graduate of the Army General Service School, the Army War College, and the senior and advanced courses of the Naval War College.

He served as director of marine aviation from 1931 to 1935, and for 6 months in 1943.

His wife, Mrs. Eunice R. Geiger, is also a Floridian.

Information for Alaska Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is a general summary of the rights and benefits of veterans of World War II and is designed to give discharged servicemen, in as compact form as possible, the essentials of the various aids and assistance granted by the Federal Government and by the Territory of Alaska for the returning veterans. A veteran of World War II is entitled to benefits that were not available to veterans of World War I; and the four major laws that Congress has enacted for the sole benefit of veterans of this war are: First, the Selective Service Act with its job-protection benefits; second, Public Law 346, as amended, better known as the GI bill, with its educational and loan benefits; third, Public Law 16, which deals specifically with the rehabilitation of disabled veterans; and, fourth, the Terminal Leave Pay Bill, which only very recently has been enacted. In addition there are previous veterans' laws affecting discharged servicemen of this war, such as those granting hospitalization and pensions.

Advantages which have resulted from laws enacted by the Congress of the United States are called Federal benefits. Besides those, the Territory of Alaska has passed legislation which confer additional rights and benefits on veterans—these being reserved solely for residents of Alaska. The first part of this summary will be devoted to the Federal benefits; the second part to the Territorial or local benefits.

This summary will be quite general and necessarily brief. Any attempt to write a summary of the rights and benefits that would cover every possible problem that might arise would result in a discourse of such voluminous nature that its very length would tend to discourage the majority of persons from reading it. Therefore, the principal reason for writing this is to inform each and every veteran of the fact that he does have certain rights and benefits because of his service in the armed forces during World War II.

Each benefit that will be considered here is covered briefly—in one or two short paragraphs. The laws from which these advantages are derived will, of course, have certain exceptions and conditions, depending upon different circumstances. There will probably arise questions of various nature, such as those concerning eligibility and qualifications. All those things are cared for fully in an organization that has been established for that very purpose, namely, the Veterans' Administration. The principal office of the Veterans' Administration is in Washington, D. C., but many branch and field offices have been established throughout the several States and Territories. Those in Alaska are located at the present time in Juneau, Anchorage, Fairbanks, and Ketchikan. In all of those offices are men that are specially qualified to assist veterans. Veterans have earned these benefits and they should take advantage of the opportunity to receive them. In some cases, delay will make one ineligible for some of these rights. Therefore, each veteran should either go in person or write to one of those offices in order to determine what his rights are. The correct manner of addressing letters is as follows:

Mr. Anthony E. Karnes, Regional Director, Veterans' Administration, Juneau, Alaska.

Mr. Earnest E. Lincoln, Subregional Director, Veterans' Administration, Anchorage, Alaska.

Mr. Orman T. Smith, Contact Representative, Veterans' Administration, Ketchikan, Alaska.

Mr. Nicholas Zavinsky, Contact Representative, Veterans' Administration, Fairbanks, Alaska.

Considered here are 11 principal topics. They are covered in the order in which they are listed: Educational and Vocational Rehabilitation, Employment, Readjustment Allowances, Hospitalization, Pensions, Insurance, Loans, Legal Assistance, Relief Organizations, Surplus Priorities, Mustering-Out Pay, and Terminal Leave Pay.

EDUCATIONAL AND VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Under the GI bill of rights educational opportunities are available to qualified veterans for completing their education or for obtaining refresher courses at Government expense. The veteran must initiate his course not later than 4 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the war, whichever is later. Any eligible veteran may receive 1 year of education or training, plus additional education—up to a maximum of 4 years—for total length of active service. He need not have been under 25 years of age when he entered the service, nor need he show that his education was interrupted by war service, two limitations which appeared in the original GI bill. A veteran receives $65 a month as a living allowance if he is without dependents while in attendance at the educational institution, or $90 a month if he has dependents. However, veterans employed in full-time work that is not a part of the course of training are not entitled to any subsistence.

A veteran who has a service-connected pensionable disability and who desires to take advantage of the educational opportunities should apply for vocational rehabilitation under Public Law 16. One who is eligible under this law will receive educational advantages plus additional benefits which he would not receive under the GI bill. A veteran with a service-connected pensionable disability is not excluded from the GI bill, but it is to his advantage for him to obtain his education under Public Law 16 because of more benefits which he will derive.

In addition to these educational benefits at schools, a veteran may be entitled to apprentice or on-the-job training. Apprenticeship, as conducted in American industry under modern methods, is a system of training in which an employee is given thorough instruction and experience, both on the job and in the classroom, in all the practical and theoretical aspects of the work in a skilled trade. A veteran who is accepted for employment as an apprentice earns as he learns. His wages increase as he advances from one step in his training to another. The advancement takes place at regular intervals—usually every 6 months. Upon completion of his apprenticeship he receives the wage rate paid all-around skilled workers in the trade.

Similar to one who enters an educational institution, a veteran who enters an apprenticeship program is entitled to a subsistence allowance. Application for this type of training should be made to the Veterans' Administration or to the United States Employment Service.

EMPLOYMENT

A veteran seeking employment should go to the nearest office of the United States Employment Service. In each local office a special counseling service is provided solely for veterans. Handicapped veterans will have special advantages under a program of selective placement, whereby the handicapped individual is considered for every job in accordance with his capacity to perform the physical demands of the job. Offices of the United States Employment Service in Alaska are located at the following places: Juneau, Anchorage, Ketchikan, Fairbanks, and Kodiak.

The United States Civil Service Commission offers preference ratings to returning servicemen and women for positions in Federal agencies. Announcements of Federal civil-service positions can be secured from any first- or second-class post office, or by writing directly to the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., or to any regional or branch regional office.

Under the selective training and service law of 1940 a veteran is entitled by law to reemployment in the former position or in a position of like seniority, status, and pay that he was in before he entered the armed forces. To exercise this right the veteran must apply to his former employer for reemployment within 90 days after the date of his discharge, or within 90 days after hospitalization continuing after discharge for a period of not more than 1 year. If a veteran has difficulty in getting back his former job, he may apply to his selective service local board for assistance. A former Federal employee has similar reemployment rights.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES

Under certain conditions of eligibility, money payments of readjustment allowances are available to veterans, to assist them to become established in gainful civilian occupations. Unemployed veterans who register with an office of the United States Employment Service are entitled to a readjustment allowance of $20 per week while unemployed. An eligible veteran may receive such payments up to a maximum of 1 year, depending on length of service. Self-employed veterans with net earnings of less than $100 in any month, up to a maximum of 1 year, also depending on length of service. In order to claim readjustment allowances, the veteran should apply at an office of the Territorial Unemployment Compensation Agency, or at an office of the United States Employment Service. In Alaska the former office is located at Juneau.

HOSPITALIZATION

The Veterans' Administration provides hospitalization for any veteran of any war who was discharged under conditions other than dishonorable. Veterans with service-connected disabilities are given preference. Veterans with non-service-connected disabilities are eligible if a hospital bed is available and the veteran makes a sworn statement that he is unable to defray expense of treatment. To apply for hospitalization, the veteran should obtain the necessary form from an office of the Veterans' Administration, fill it out, and forward it to the nearest hospital or office of the Veterans' Administration. In an emergency, the veteran should be examined immediately by a local physician. The physician should then phone the nearest Veterans' Administration facility, state the nature of the case, and obtain prior approval for admission. This applies to both service-connected and non-service-connected emergencies.

Reimbursement may be made for medical treatment of a service-connected condition obtained without prior authorization from the Veterans' Administration when there is a medical emergency, Government facilities were not available, or delay would be hazardous.

A veteran whose disabilities are service-connected may in addition to hospitalization and domiciliary care receive out-patient, medical, surgical, and dental services for service-connected illness or injuries. Treatment may be given at a Veterans' Administration facility or regional office or be authorized to be given by a physician or dentist in the veteran's place of residence.

PENSIONS

A veteran who has a service-connected disability will be entitled to a pension. These disability payments run from $11.50 per month for a 10 percent disability to $115 per month for total disability. Sums as high as $265 per month may be paid for certain specific disabilities of an unusual or particularly burdensome character.

A veteran may also obtain a pension for non-service-connected disability under the following conditions: if he is single, his annual income must not exceed $1,000; if married or having dependent minor children, his annual income must not exceed $2,500; disability must not be due to the veteran's own willful misconduct; disability must be permanently and totally disabling. Pension for permanent and total non-service-connected disability is $50 per month. The pension rate is increased to $60 a month following 10 years of continuous permanent total disability or on reaching the age of 65 years.

It is possible that a disabled veteran receiving a pension may be hospitalized, and in that event the original law was that his pension would not exceed $20 per month for a service-connected disability and $8 per month for a non-service-connected disability. However, that law has been recently amended; and in such a situation the pension will continue without reduction until the first day of the seventh month following the month of admission of such veteran for treatment or care. If his treatment continues beyond that seventh month, then his pension, if $30 a month or less, will continue without reduction; but if it is greater than $30 a month the payments shall not exceed 50 percent of the amount otherwise payable or $30 per month, whichever is greater. After the veteran is discharged from such care or treatment, he will be paid in a lump sum such additional amount as would equal the total sum by which his pension has been reduced by virtue of this law.

INSURANCE

The National Service Life Insurance—Government insurance—which veterans obtained while in the armed forces is the cheapest and best life insurance available. Originally this insurance was issued on the 5-year level-premium plan, but the law has been amended to extend the term to 8 years. This means that as long as premiums are paid the policy will remain in force for 8 years from the time that it was issued. However, this policy is a temporary, or term, policy; and in order to have it remain in force after the expiration of the 8 years as permanent insurance, it must be converted to one of the standard forms of policy. It is better for the veteran not to wait the full 8 years, but to convert this Government insurance to one of the standard forms as soon as he feels that he can afford it. The premium payments when the policy is converted will be greater than before, but they will be considerably less than premiums which a veteran would be obliged to pay if he were to take out a new policy as a civilian. Also, as long as the veteran does not allow his Government insurance to lapse, he may convert this policy to a standard form without being obliged to undergo a physical examination.

In order to keep the Government insurance in force, premium payments should be continued—these payments remaining the same after discharge as the amount deducted from pay while in service. The first premium payment is usually payable during the first month after discharge. When making payment the policy number should be shown; however, if this is not known, payment should be accompanied by a letter giving name, serial number, rank, organization, and date of birth of the insured. Reduction may be made in the amount of the insurance by application to the Veterans' Administration. Change in beneficiary after discharge may be made by application to the Veterans' Administration. Checks, drafts, or money orders for premium payments on the Government insurance should be made payable to the Treasurer of the United States and sent to Collections Subdivision, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

LOANS

Various types of loans are available under the GI bill of rights for the purchase or construction of homes; for the purchase of farms and farm equipment; and for the purchase of business and business property. Application for loans must be made within 2 years after separation or 2 years after the end of the war, whichever is later—but not later than 5 years after the end of the war. To apply for guaranty of a loan for the purchase of a home, farm, or business property, the veteran should first consult the person or concern from whom he expects to borrow money. Potential lenders will have available necessary application forms and desired information. If such information is not readily available, the veteran should consult the nearest office of the Veterans' Administration.

LEGAL ASSISTANCE

The American Bar Association has adopted a program of legal assistance to be extended to veterans of the present war, and in their behalf to their widows, orphans, and dependents. This assistance is given with regard to personal legal problems arising as a result of or during service with the armed forces. It is to be available for a period of 6 months following separation from active service, or for such additional period as may be necessary or appropriate. For such legal assistance the veteran should contact the local bar association.

Service personnel are not excused from filing Federal income-tax returns and paying income taxes merely by reason of being on active duty. In order to determine whether a veteran is obliged to pay Federal income tax for the period of time that he was in the service, he should get in touch with the nearest office of the collector of internal revenue.

RELIEF ORGANIZATIONS

The American Red Cross provides financial assistance to servicemen, disabled ex-servicemen, and their dependents, and the dependents of deceased servicemen, on the basis of need and within certain limitations. Other organizations that offer various forms of relief are: The American Legion; the Disabled Veterans; the Veterans of Foreign Wars; the Salvation Army Corps; and the Family Welfare Association.

SURPLUS PRIORITIES

By virtue of the Surplus Property Act of 1946 returning veterans can purchase surplus property to set themselves up and help to maintain themselves in business without buying through regular dealer channels or paying a profit to anyone. Amendment of this act provides for setting aside for sale to veterans of World War II exclusively, either for personal or business use, selected items in heaviest demand and in short supply. It also advances to a general priority second only to that of Federal agencies veterans former preference in the purchase of any goods for use in establishing their own small enterprises.

MUSTERING-OUT PAYMENTS

Mustering-out payments are made to each member of the armed forces who has had active service in World War II and who has been discharged or released from active service under honorable conditions on or after December 7, 1941.

This is in accordance with the Mustering-Out Payment Act of 1944. This law is subject to certain exceptions, and payments are made under the following conditions and methods of payment:

First. Persons who have had active service for 60 days or more and have served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska shall receive $300.

Second. Persons who have performed active service for 60 days or more but have not served outside the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska shall receive $200.

Third. Persons who have served for less than 60 days shall receive $100.

TERMINAL LEAVE BILL

The most recent law which has been enacted by Congress which confers benefits on veterans is the terminal-leave bill. This bill provides that enlisted personnel of the armed forces shall be entitled to leave with pay at the rate of 2½ calendar days for each month of active service—the total amount of accrued leave not to exceed 120 calendar days. Before this bill was passed, only commissioned officers were eligible for this leave with pay.

The manner in which a veteran will profit from this law is as follows: If the veteran had served in the armed forces after September 8, 1939, he is entitled to a payment in lieu of the leave that he had accumulated during his time in the service. This leave payment will be settled and compensated for on the basis of the base and longevity pay and allowances applicable to the veteran at the time of his discharge. In the case of former enlisted personnel of the first three grades who had dependents at the time of discharge, the allowances will be computed at the rate of 70 cents a day for subsistence, plus $1.25 a day for quarters.

As the bill was written, payment was to be made in cash for amounts less than $50—the remainder to be paid off in special bonds. These bonds, bearing interest, cannot be cashed for 5 years from the date of the veteran's discharge. However, immediate use of the bonds is permitted to pay premiums on World War II life insurance and for conversion of the low-rate wartime insurance to civilian permanent insurance.

After next September 1, terminal leave payment will end for both officers and men. Thereafter, armed forces personnel will be permitted to accumulate no more than 60 days furlough. Veterans will have a full year in which to file with War and Navy Departments their terminal leave pay claims.

TERRITORIAL BENEFITS

As was mentioned previously, the Territory of Alaska has, through legislative enactment, passed laws which confer benefits upon veterans which are in addition to those of Federal nature and are reserved for those veterans who are residents of Alaska. In the following sections those laws which are peculiar to Alaska will be considered, and also will be covered some of the Federal benefits as they apply in Alaska. The principal topics taken in the following order are: Commissioner of Veterans' Affairs; Loans and Bonuses; Employment; Readjustment Allowances; Hospitalization; Legal Assistance; Homesteads; and Mining.

COMMISSIONER OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Besides the Veterans' Administration offices located in Alaska, the Territory has established an office of the Commissioner of Veterans' Affairs. The headquarters of this office at Juneau, with Mr. Norman Haley as the person in charge—or the Commissioner of Veterans' Affairs—administers the laws, rules, and regulations relating to the veterans' loan program, which is considered below. The principal office and the branch offices of this organization together with their locations and persons in charge are listed: Mr. Norman Haley, Box 2721, Juneau, Alaska; Mr. Harry Palmer, Box 1971, Fairbanks, Alaska; Mr. Brooks Drayton, Box 1399, Anchorage, Alaska; Mr. Frank Clayton, Box 151, Ketchikan, Alaska.

LOANS AND BONUSES

By virtue of an act passed by the Territorial legislature in 1946 entitled the Alaska World War II Veterans Act, veterans who are residents of Alaska are entitled to various types of loans or to a bonus. Loans will be given for educational, domestic, and other personal uses, not to exceed $2,500. Loans will be given to purchase, remodel, repair, build, furnish or equip homes or farms in Alaska, including the clearing and draining of such farms, not to exceed $10,000. Loans will be given to acquire or finance businesses including mining and fishing and equipment for the same, but not including farming, not to exceed $10,000. An applicant will be considered eligible for more than one type of loan, but the total standing against any one borrower may not exceed $10,000 at any one time.

The payment of an Alaskan veterans' cash bonus is also authorized under this act, and it will be a sum in dollars equal to the number of months which the veteran spent in the service multiplied by 10, providing that no bonus shall be paid for time served for enlistment or reenlistment after November 1, 1945. The bonus will be an alternative to the loan privileges, until such bonus shall be repaid.

The principal qualifications for veterans under this act are: (1) That he has served for 1 year or more in the armed forces; (2) that he has been honorably discharged or released from the armed forces; (3) that he was at the time of his induction a resident of the Territory of Alaska; (4) that he had been a resident for not less than 1 year immediately prior to his induction; and (5) that he has returned to the Territory of Alaska after discharge as resident with the intention of remaining in the Territory.

EMPLOYMENT

Offices of the United States Employment Service in Alaska are at Juneau, Anchorage, Ketchikan, Fairbanks, and Kodiak. The representatives of this department have done much to help the veteran in finding employment through its counseling service. Under the GI bill a veteran is entitled to training on the job with allowances paid by the Veterans' Administration. In the absence of any organization in Alaska to try to develop this on-the-job training program, the Employment Service has taken over the job of promoting the use of apprenticeship and on-the-job training programs, and has created opportunities for veterans to become skilled workmen. In addition to these services, the Employment Service has taken numerous claims for benefits both for unemployment and self-employment—these claims ordinarily being handled by the Unemployment Compensation Commission as readjustment allowances.

READJUSTMENT ALLOWANCES

The office of the Unemployment Compensation Commission at Juneau takes care of claims for readjustment allowances. The regulations of the Commission provide that an unemployed person shall report to the Employment Office most accessible to him and shall there register for work and file a claim for benefits. They also provide that any individual located in an isolated area not served by the Employment Service may file his claim by mail. Such claims are to be certified by either the postmaster or the United States Commissioner. In some cases where neither of these officials are available, it is permissible to have the claim witnessed by two reputable citizens.

HOSPITALIZATION

Any veteran who has served during any war is entitled to emergency hospitalization. In Alaska the Veterans' Administration has made contracts with most of the hospitals in Alaska and are in the process of making contracts with the remaining hospitals for this service. All a veteran needs to do is tell his physician that he is a veteran and the physician provides the application form for his free hospitalization and treatment. Even before this application is made out and signed by the veteran the physician or one of the representatives of the Veterans' Administration wires the regional office at Juneau for authority to hospitalize the veteran and this authority is immediately granted providing the information is complete, and the authority is authorized as of the day the veteran enters the hospital.

Most of the physicians in Alaska have been appointed or designated medical examiners of the Veterans' Administration, and veterans with disabilities may go to these doctors for treatment, payment for this service as well as for medicine for the treatment being made by the Veterans' Administration.

LEGAL ASSISTANCE

A program of the American Bar Association, to give legal assistance to veterans, has not yet been set up in Alaska, but one is contemplated at an early date. At the present moment a similar program for legal aid is in operation by and through the local bar associations in various cities in Alaska. The local bar associations will furnish legal aid to a veteran to the extent of advising him of his rights and furnishing more extended service if necessary at minimum cost or charge. A lack of funds on the part of the veteran will not deprive him of such advice and assistance.

HOMESTEADS

In Alaska there is considrable unappropriated and unreserved public land adapted to agricultural use. It is possible under certain conditions to make homestead settlements on this land. Veterans will have special privileges with regard to this homesteading. Under the homestead laws there is a period of 3 years' residence and cultivation required, but a veteran is entitled to have a period equal to the term of his service in the armed forces not exceeding 2 years, deducted from this 3 years' residence and cultivation. Furthermore, the homesteads of veterans initiated prior to their entrance into service are protected from forfeiture during the period of such service. Minors who are in service may make homestead entry, under certain conditions. Where lands are newly opened or restored to homestead entry, veterans will be granted a preference right of application for a period of 90 days before the land becomes subject to application by the general public.

MINING

The law requires an expenditure of at least $100 in labor or improvements of a mining nature to be made each year on all mining claims located in Alaska. However, holders of mining claims who are in the armed forces are exempted from the performance of assessment work by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940. By this act the law on assessment work will not apply to men in the armed forces until 6 months after the termination of their service, or until their release from hospitalization on account of wounds or disabilities incurred in line of duty. The provisions of this act will remain in force until 6 months after the termination of the war by a treaty of peace proclaimed by the President, and for such additional time as may be necessary for the enjoyment of any privilege accruing with respect to military services performed prior to the end of the 6-month period following the proclamation of a treaty of peace.

Enemy to Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a published article recently appearing in a farm publication, which is as follows:

ENEMY TO FARMERS

About communism there is much that Americans do not know. We do know that Communists want to destroy our form of government. They hate our way of life.

Why they desire so intensely to uproot a system that has accomplished so much, and why they are willing to work so furiously to create confusion and disturbance, are mysteries to most of us.

Communists persistently worm their way into educational institutions, stir up and prolong strikes, work into farm organizations, push into radio and publishing, sneak into Government jobs—everywhere with the same vicious intent. Always the purpose is to create and fan discontent and dissatisfaction. Whatever is against a stronger United States they are for.

The Communist takes advantage of every crack in the armor of Americanism. He is for strikes because they slow up production. He is for big spending because it weakens the Nation. He agitates for Government to take care of everything, because he knows that Government bungling gets discontented groups to play his game. He never rests.

He will even support some things that are right, because he specializes in fooling well-meaning, honest Americans into aiding his effort to make chaos.

If you catch him at any of his tricks he screams that you are a Red baiter and a dirty Fascist, plotting to fool the common people.

One thing Americans do know about communism. It is a treasonous enemy for which there can be only one treatment. That is to recognize its ideas and acts, and stamp them down ruthlessly.

Vet Who Gave His Eyes for His Country Evicted and Refused Service in Restaurant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call the attention of the House to the following article taken from the Washington Times-Herald of July 31, 1946, which speaks for itself:

HOMELESS IS THE HERO: VET WHO GAVE HIS EYES FOR HIS COUNTRY EVICTED AND REFUSED SERVICE IN RESTAURANT

HOUSTON, TEX., July 30.—Joe Sanders knew his life was going to be more difficult after he was blinded by a land mine while in European combat, but he admitted tonight that he had not taken into account all the chances for complications.

An ex-corporal of the Thirty-third Armored Engineers, the 36-year-old Sanders' most serious problem of the moment is finding a place to live, because his landlady has ordered him, his wife, and their 14-year-old daughter, Willie, to move.

Not so serious, but more humiliating, Sanders said, was being refused service at a cafe.

The land mine which robbed Joe of his sight was a mean contraption. It tore his face badly, blackening the skin and leaving heavy scars. Bone deterioration still causes Joe trouble.

Last week, a cafe owner refused to serve him, "unless he comes around to the back where the customers won't see him." Mrs. Sanders, who wanted to leave Joe there for the meal, reported that the same cafe man had served Joe so long as he was in uniform.

A few days later, the Sanders landlady told them she wanted them to move. She handed them an eviction notice. Mrs. Sanders, who works part time as a waitress, handed the notice back. The landlady then refused to accept cash payment for the rent. The Sanders want to move, but thus far they haven't found a place.

In their present quarters, they have four rooms of a five-room house. The landlady has the fifth.

Both the Sanders and the landlady agree it's a bad set-up. But finding some place to move to is another problem. Two landlords were ready to take the Sanders family until they saw Joe was a blind man.

One merely said no, they couldn't have the apartment. The second was less diplomatic. "Oh, he's blind," Mrs. Sanders quoted the landlady. "You might not be able to pay rent."

What Joe wants is a place with a big back porch. He's a cabinet worker. A back porch, he believes, would be fine for cabinet work, with Mrs. Sanders providing the eyes.

Poland and the Atlantic Charter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as our Secretary of State takes his seat at the first peace conference of the Second World War, standing silently beside him is the faith and hope of every American who believes in justice and humanity. As he sits to consider the document that will decide the future fate of Italy, Finland, Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria, should we not remind him of another document and of the fate of another nation? I speak sadly of Poland and the Atlantic Charter.

The promise of the Atlantic Charter came as a clarion call to the embattled peoples of Poland during the grim days of the early war. That ringing declaration by the leaders of two powerful nations reechoed in the hearts of the trampled citizens of that country and gave them new hope in their battle against the aggressors.

To all of the little people of the world, crushed under the iron heel of fascism, the Atlantic Charter promised freedom—freedom from want, freedom from fear, freedom to choose their own government, and freedom from territorial seizure.

To the struggle of the Poles fighting for freedom in France, Norway, Libya, and Italy; to the struggle of the Poles fighting heroically in the air over Britain; to the struggle of the vast underground army in Poland itself, the Atlantic Charter gave new meaning, visualizing for those patriots a world free from the evils which they had come to know so well.

Poland looks back upon those long years now. The fight against fascism ended victoriously over a year ago. Today, Poland, by all rights, should be taking her place among the free nations of the world. Instead, the people of Poland are asking, "For what did we shed tears, sacrifice our homes, and give our blood? What signifies the noble words of the Atlantic Charter now?"

Today, those words are a grotesque and monstrous jest. Fear grips the heart of Poland. Her territories have been seized. She is governed by decree. Hunger and disease stalk the length and breadth of her land.

Consider the indictment:

Poland has had imposed upon her a puppet government, responsive only to the will of the Kremlin, headed by citizens of the Soviet Union, and recognized by the United States and Great Britain, signatories of the Atlantic Charter.

Poland has had taken from her, with the tacit consent of the United States and Great Britain, and against her will, the territories seized by Russia in the 1939 partition.

Poland enjoys the "freedom" of immediate arrest for any citizen who expresses anti-Soviet thought, the "freedom" of Communist-run public meetings, the "freedom" of a strictly censored press, and the "freedom" of local officials appointed by the Moscow-controlled government.

Poland has the privilege of watching Red Army troops strip her nearly impoverished land of industrial plants, cattle, and foodstuffs.

Poland's soldiers, who fought fiercely for the freedom of their native land, must wander the face of the earth for fear of imprisonment or death if they return to their homes.

Poland, according to the president of the Polish-American Congress—> for whose territorial integrity England and France went to war * * * lies prostrate, a fourth of her population destroyed, 6,000,000 children facing starvation and others being pushed from pillar to post by the lawless elements in control with the help of the Red Army bayonets.

What strange working of justice is this that a freedom-loving people, whose liberty we sought to guarantee in the greatest war of history, should now be chained in slavery?

What mockery of humanity is this that the people of Poland who fought by our side in the war for freedom now have less freedom than the peoples of Germany and Japan who fought to enslave us?

By what moral law, in 1946, do we justify the sale of Poland to a nation we condemned in 1939 for attacking her?

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the postwar treatment of Poland, by any standard of justice and humanity and by any code of moral law, is an international crime for which the penalty can only be continued bloodshed and unrest on the entire continent of Europe.

Justice will have lost its meaning for all of the peoples of the world if injustice continues to rule in Poland.

We cannot have peace in Europe, and hence, anywhere, as long as people who will die for liberty are being enmeshed in the net of despotism. We cannot lay the foundations for a lasting peace in the sands of hatred and unrest, nor can we build the shining temple of a just peace with the faulty mortar of appeasement.

We must stop appeasing the aggressor; we must begin the appeasement of the consciences of freemen everywhere who see in Poland the result of duplicity, weakness, and secret commitments.

We must recognize now, and it is not yet too late, that the Atlantic Charter, for all of its promise of hope and freedom, will ever remain just a promise until we are ready to reaffirm its principles through firm and honest action. That task is not an easy one; above all, it requires faith, courage, and determination in our relations with those nations that rule by force.

But until that reaffirmation is complete, until all the peoples of the world can be assured of their elemental freedoms, then we cannot seriously hope that the scourge of war shall not strike again with an awesome result no man dare foretell.

In Poland, we began the last great war; in her name, let us begin our final fight for a just and lasting peace.

My Record in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, for the RECORD, and in response to inquiries from constituents on the general subject of the fate of legislative measures which are introduced by Members of the minority in Congress, I want to review briefly some of the bills I have proposed before this House, during my two terms as Representative of the Fourth Connecticut District.

On October 27, 1943, in the midst of the war, I suggested (in H. R. 3556) the creation of an Army and Navy Maintenance Corps on the ground that it was "imperative, not only to bring about and retain a proper distribution of manpower between the armed forces and the activities necessary to the support and maintenance of such forces, but it is also necessary to bring about and retain a proper distribution among such supporting activities themselves, so that the right type of man will be in the right type of military work or military supporting work, as the national interest requires, at the right time, and will remain there so long as it is in the national interest and the best interests of the war effort for him to be and remain there."

On March 3, 1944, and on January 3, 1945, I introduced identical bills—H. R. 4329, second session, Seventy-eighth Congress; and H. R. 474, first session, Seventy-ninth Congress—"to assist the armed forces to provide manpower for harvesting, timbering, canning, and other essential activities in seasonal emergencies" by inducting "into the armed forces a sufficient number of surplus limited-service men with which to meet potential emergency demands of war activities for manpower."

The principle behind all of these three bills, which is that of requiring citizens to give civil as well as military service in a time of great national crisis was later made the basis for a measure—H. R. 1752—which was passed by the House on February 1, 1945, but rejected by the Senate.

On January 17, 1945, I proposed that the Congress amend the immigration law—section 303 of the Nationality Act of 1940—to authorize the naturalization and the admission into the United States under a quota of Eastern Hemisphere Indians and descendants of Eastern Hemisphere Indians. This proposal was taken over by administration legislators, embodied in a bill sponsored by a majority Member, passed by both Senate and House, and made Public Law No. 483 in July 1946.

February 19, 1945, soon after the disclosure of American acquiescence in the fifth partition of Poland at Yalta, I asked the Congress—House Joint Resolution 110—to assume "national responsibility for the results of the Crimean Conference as they affect members of the Polish armed forces serving today outside Poland."

The purpose of this bill was to revise "existing immigration quotas for Poland to admit to the United States wives, children, officers, enlisted men who have served with the Polish armed forces in French, British, and American theaters of war and who may be forced to choose between persecution for their political convictions at home or becoming men without a country."

No hearing was given this bill in committee. Some months after its introduction the then Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Honorable Mr. Winston Churchill, urged that Parliament offer to the Polish soldiers, sailors, and airmen an opportunity to become British citizens.

September 5, 1945, in a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 71), I asked the Congress to go on record as favoring the exertion by private industry of "every effort to give employment to the greatest possible number of veterans of World War II who are physically handicapped as the result of their service in the armed forces."

No hearings were given this measure, but its principle was incorporated in several Executive measures and has been widely followed by voluntary actions in private industry.

Also, on September 5, 1945, I asked the House to authorize a Congressional Medal of Honor to be presented to Gen. Jonathan M. Wainwright.

General Wainwright received this highest decoration some weeks later from the President, without congressional action in his behalf.

November 14, 1945, I suggested (H. Con. Res. 101) that "the Congress hereby expresses itself as favoring the creation of appropriate international machinery within the existing framework of the United Nations Organization for international control and reduction of armaments and weapons, especially those involving atomic power."

Although no action was taken on this specific measure the principle expressed has been followed both in the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, and in the United States proposals for international control of atomic energy made to the Security Council of the United Nations.

November 19, 1945, by H. R. 4742, I proposed the establishment of a special Housing Bureau in the Veterans' Administration to act in relation to the procurement of homes or farms for war veterans, and to liberalize the loan conditions for obtaining them with aid from the Federal Government.

This measure was not given a hearing by the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, but its major features were incorporated in another bill (H. R.

4761) which finally became Public Law 388 on May 22, 1946.

November 20, 1945, a joint resolution concerning the source and condition of American power, suggested: "That the Congress hereby reaffirms the faith of its founding fathers to the people of the United States, to all other governments, nations, and peoples, namely: That the inalienable rights of man, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and his birth in equality, are the endowments not of governments or men, but of the Creator: Wherefore, our Government, relying on the divine protection of Providence, shall continue to seek all national and international solutions in the belief that the only proper guide and sanction for the laws and actions of men are the laws and authority of God."

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

December 11, 1945, a concurrent resolution was introduced (H. Con. Res. 109 and S. Con. Res. 42) to request the Department of State to explore and promptly report on the possibility of providing the hundreds of thousands of refugees in Allied occupation zones with United Nations passports similar to the so-called Nansen passports issued by the League of Nations to stateless persons after World War I.

The Department of State expressed, unofficially, its approval of this measure, but no committee hearings were held.

On January 14, 1946, the prevalence, persistence, and intensity of strikes and labor disputes following the end of hostilities with Germany and Japan indicated a need for establishing some new principle of relationship between labor and capital to restore and maintain industrial peace.

House Resolution 481 introduced on that day gave authorization to complete the studies of various methods of profit sharing, which had been instituted by the Seventy-fifth Congress, in order to determine proper legislative means by which to create a wider diffusion of ownership between employer and employee, so that employees may obtain, by contracts of partnership, the security of a vested interest in their corporate places of employment.

A brief preliminary hearing was given this measure, but dilatory tactics on the part of administration committee chairmen precluded any serious congressional consideration of it.

H. R. 5296, introduced January 30, 1946, proposed to allow physicians, surgeons, and dentists an additional deduction on Federal income tax, equal in terms of percentages to that portion of their time each year which is devoted to charity, free clinic work, and public research work.

No hearing was held on this measure by the Ways and Means Committee to which it was referred.

H. R. 5312, introduced January 31, 1946, called for the elimination of unfair wage practices by establishing a principle of equal pay for equal work without respect of the sex or color of the worker.

The principle advocated by this bill was incorporated in H. R. 5221, a measure which was favorably reported by the Committee on Labor to the House on July 28, 1946.

H. R. 5332, introduced February 1, 1946, was occasioned by disclosure of the set-backs given to American scientific progress during the war because of indiscriminate drafting of advanced students in the various physical sciences. This bill called for the creation of an Executive Department of Science and Research, the head of which should be a cabinet officer in order that the scientific welfare of the Nation should receive equal attention with the other national needs in the advisory councils of the President.

No hearing was given this measure.

On April 1, 1946, a bill—H. R. 5960—was introduced to create an Executive Department on Children's Welfare. The need for this was indicated by the great rise in juvenile delinquency, and juvenile ill-health, which could be traced only partly to the dislocation and dispersal of families by the war.

No hearing was given this bill, but its basic principle was included in a proposed administration measure for a general Department of Welfare.

House Concurrent Resolution 143, introduced on April 15, 1946, was designed to extend to any citizen of a United Nation the freedom of movement traditional to citizens of the United States, Great Britain, France, and other free nations. It proposed that the representative of the United States in the United Nations urge the establishment of a system of United Nations passports, which should be valid for educational, cultural, and other reasonable travel in any one of the member states of the United Nations.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs held no hearing on this measure.

House Joint Resolution 363, proposed May 29, 1946, to authorize the admission to the United States, as nonquota immigrants, of some 2,000 refugee children between the ages of 2 and 17 years, who are now interned in various camps in Europe under the jurisdiction of the American occupation authorities.

No hearing was given this bill.

House Joint Resolution 365, June 11, 1946, proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to permit the election of the United States representative to the Security Council of the United Nations by direct vote of the citizens of this Nation, instead of—as at present—the appointment of this representative by the President.

No hearing was given this proposal by the Committee on the Judiciary.

During the Seventy-ninth Congress, now presumably passing into history, 4,748 public bills were introduced for consideration by committees of the House. Of this number, 675 reached actual debate on the floor. Senate and House together were presented with a total of 6,647 bills and only 293 of this total became laws of the United States, the vast and overwhelming majority of which bore Democratic names, for the simple reason that the Democratic Party controls the House, the Senate, and therefore, the committees.

Veterans' Housing Costs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, several Members have inquired concerning comparative building costs. I have in my files a letter from a contractor whom I have known for 35 years, ever since we were boys in school. This contractor has done a great deal of building, and during the war has built thousands of homes of the type mentioned in his letter of May 28, 1946, for war workers and others. I have reason to believe that his figures are entirely reliable. His letter is as follows:

VETS' HOUSING COSTS

MAY 28, 1946.

Hon. CARL HINSHAW,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CARL: Enclosed are our costs and selling prices on the same house. A three-bedroom house of 1,050 square feet, with double garage, as of 1943 and 1946.

Note the following comments for price advancement:

Concrete: Lack of unskilled labor. (We used to use Mexicans, now we use skilled carpenters.)

Lumber: Price was $45 per 1,000 and competition existed. Price now $75 per 1,000 and hard to get at any price.

Carpenter labor: Was $1.25 per hour and time and a half for overtime. Now $1.50 per hour and double time for overtime.

We formerly worked as little overtime as possible, now we are forced to work overtime in order to keep our men.

The above comment applies to painting, plastering, plumbing, and so forth and causes the increases in price. There is a definite shortage of skilled mechanics and they demand overtime work. The skilled mechanics we have are about 75 percent efficient as compared with the earlier date.

I hope this answers your problem. If not let me know and I'll get into more detail.

Best regards,

GEORGE.

Comparative costs of building a 5-room house of 1,050 square feet floor space and double garage

Item	1943	1946
Concrete work	$335	$450
Rough and finish lumber	579	950
Rough and finish carpenter labor	349	560
Rough hardware	35	76
Millwork, sash and doors, cabinets	254	403
Heat	90	98
Floors, oak	203	317
Paint	160	209
Plaster	421	875
Plumbing	270	497
Roofing and flashings	191	340
Cesspool and septic tank	60	225
Tile drain board	45	62
Wiring	73	127
Linoleum	30	50
Asphalt driveway	54	70
Miscellaneous small items	150	175
Job overhead	70	150
Lot cost	650	1,200
FHA costs	213	250
Selling costs	100	100
Total	4,332	7,178
Builders' and subdividers' overhead and profits	1,018	1,172
Selling price	5,350	8,350

Mr. Speaker, while the comparative costs given in the above letter are between the year 1943 and the year 1946, from my own knowledge this same house cost to build without lot, a little under $3,000 in 1939.

I hope that the above information will be of value.

Equal Pay for Men and Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 31 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief, factual statement prepared by the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor, on the subject of equal pay for women, or rate for the job. I should also like to place in the RECORD a column by Miss Malvina Lindsay entitled "Women's Wages," which appeared in the Washington Post on November 1, 1945, and comments on the material presented in hearings on this subject held by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor last October.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will have the opportunity, before this session closes, of voting on this very specific means of helping to equalize the position of men and women wage earners who are doing similar work. In my opinion this is a most important measure for the economy as a whole; and it will, moreover, do more for women than any other measure that we could act upon at this time.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOMEN'S BUREAU,
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
March 1, 1946.

FACTS ON WOMEN WORKERS

EQUAL PAY OR RATE FOR THE JOB

What does equal pay mean?

Rate for the job is a wage rate based on job content, irrespective of the sex of the worker.

It does not necessarily mean the same total pay check: Employees may not work the same number of hours, they may not produce equally in the same period of working time, they may not have the same length of service.

Why is equal pay important?

To women: It is a matter of simple justice; it insures their getting what they are entitled to for the work they do.

To men: It helps sustain men's wage rates. It discourages the employer from hiring women cheaper.

To everybody: It will increase consumer purchasing power. It will stimulate full employment. It will increase the economic security of workers' families.

Are women paid less than men?

Union agreements show—

In war plants surveyed in 1944 in 3 Midwestern States, out of 80 union contracts covering 75,000 women, only one-half provided for equal pay in the contract; only one-half had the same automatic progression rates for men and women; only one-third had the same entrance rate for men and women.

National War Labor Board records show—

Early in the war the Board issued General Order No. 16 giving permission to employers voluntarily to raise wages of women to equal those of men. Also throughout the war the Board continued to apply the equal pay principle where it was an issue in dispute cases.

Women's Bureau studies show—

In airframe factories, railroads, steel mills, and shipbuilding, all plants visited by the Women's Bureau in 1943 had pay for the job policy. In radio equipment, other electrical products, and aircraft engines, 80 percent of plants visited had such a policy—as did 70 percent of the machine-tool factories and founderies, 65 percent of the ammunition plants, and 57 percent of firearms plants surveyed.

Other reports show—

Of 148 plants surveyed by the National Industrial Conference Board, covering war industries as well as consumer-goods factories, a little over half in March 1943 paid the same beginning wage rates to men and women hired for men's jobs.

In almost two-thirds of the manufacturing and nonmanufacturing plants in New York State surveyed in December 1943, women received the same entrance rates as men in all the occupations in which they replaced men.

Will equal pay affect the employment of women?

The best worker will be hired. Here and there, social legislation may have a temporary adverse effect on a few women in the beginning, but the record shows that such effects are only temporary. In each decade census figures have shown an increase in the number of employed women.

Are women entitled to equal pay?

The right worker for the right job is fast becoming an accepted industrial standard.

Women, as well as men, have the right to be hired on the basis of their individual qualifications.

When women and men do comparable work, their services should be recognized by equal pay.

Are there any equal-pay laws?

In operation—

For Government empoyment:

The United States Civil Service Commission ruled in 1919 that all examinations are open to men and women alike. The Classification Act of 1923 sets up salary grades in accordance with the component elements of the job without differentiation because of sex.

Over a thousand State and local governments use the equal-pay principle for some or all of their employees.

For private employment:

Seven States now have equal-pay laws—Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, Montana, New York, Rhode Island, Washington. The Illinois and Michigan laws apply to manufacturing only. The other laws have wider coverage.

For public employment:

The Montana equal-pay law covers teachers and other public employment, as well as private employment.

Special teachers' equal-pay laws exist in one-fourth of the States. A big majority of the larger city school systems apply the principle, by school-board policy.

Proposed—

In the State legislative sessions of 1945, equal-pay bills were introduced in 17 States.

Federal equal-pay bills are now before Senate and House: S. 1178; H. R. 5221, H. R. 5312.

S. 1178 covers employers engaged in commerce or in operations affecting commerce, having eight or more workers. Potentially it covers 6,000,000 women.

Status: Hearings on S. 1178 were held in October 1945, before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor; favorable report of the Senate Committee made on June 21, 1946. No hearings held to date on House bills.

Both Federal and State laws having wide coverage are needed.

[From the Washington Post of November 1, 1945]

WOMEN'S WAGES

(By Malvina Lindsay)

EQUAL PAY CHECKS

Mary Smith and John Jones both work at drill presses in a factory. They turn off the same amount of work. Should John receive 10 to 15 cents an hour more than Mary?

Or Mary and John work at bookkeeping machines in an office. Their production is the same. Should John receive $2.50 a week more than Mary?

"No," is the resounding chorus from millions of American women speaking through their national organizations. Their "No" is echoed by an imposing line-up of unions. A Senate Subcommittee on Education and Labor has listened to these "No's" this week. With surprising unanimity witnesses before the subcommittee urged that sex discriminations be removed from workers' pay checks.

Now, unless the "women's equal pay bill of 1945 can be delayed or pigeonholed, it will soon go to the Senate with a favorable committee report. A similar bill is expected to be introduced in the House. When these pass Congress, American women will have taken another outpost of equality with men. This comes at a time when Japanese women are taking their first toddling steps toward the ballot box, French women making their first plunge into politics and British women asking if it isn't high time their request for equal pay (put off during the war) was answered.

Women pushing the equal pay bill are not off their guard despite the easy going they had before the Senate subcommittee. They know that some employers and some Congressmen are secretly uneasy about this recent feminine self-assertiveness. That is especially true of those who were counting on women workers giving up their jobs and rushing back to the home en masse.

Hence women witnesses at the hearing made a special effort to forestall congressional arguments, particularly the one that equal pay with men would encourage women to continue working and thus cut down jobs for men. Miss Mary Anderson, former director, and Miss Freda Miller, director of the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor, emphasized that without the Equal Pay Act, men's postwar employment would be imperiled, as women would undercut men in wages.

Also, they maintained that lower pay for women depressed wages and living standards generally, decreased consuming power, and held back production.. They pointed out that with so many wives of deceased and disabled veterans having to help support themselves and their families, equal pay for women workers was more than ever needed at this time.

The old argument that woman's strength is not comparable to man's and hence her production must be less, also was answered in advance. The act provides that a woman is to be paid for what she produces. Also it provides for industry committees to set up standards of work and job classifications, and judge job content. These committees would be appointed by the head of the Woman's Bureau, the agency which would administer the act.

Women industrial workers will, of course, benefit chiefly by the measure. During the war women factory workers especially suffered wage discriminations. Typical of these was the reclassification of jobs by which a Midwest electrical plant employing 15,000 workers kept down women's wages. In this, as in many factories, jobs were classified as male and female, with varying rates of pay. When men workers went to war and women took over their jobs, these jobs were reclassified as female. Women received 90 cents an hour for doing what men had done for $1.05.

However, the equal pay proponents insist that not only factory workers but also clerical workers, professional women, administrative employees, and supervisors, in fact women in most lines of work, will benefit by the legislation they are seeking. (Women in State and local service industries would, of course, be excepted since the act is Federal legislation and would not apply outside of work related to commerce which is interstate.) Nevertheless, it will be increasingly hard to measure production and set up standards of achievement as the act is applied to work where no physical product is involved.

While it is doubtful if any legislation will ever entirely eliminate sex discrimination in the professions and in executive jobs—or for that matter in any job—yet the Equal Pay Act would help correct much unfairness that now exists. It would even encourage fairer practices in the fields to which it cannot be applied. It would write into law the extension of a principle that is the basis of woman's freedom and self-expression. First, this was expressed in her right merely to earn a living, to stand on her own feet economically. Now it has expanded into her right to receive as a human being, not as a woman, the compensation for what she produces.

Berries, Journal Go by Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper item:

BERRIES, JOURNAL GO BY AIR—EXPERIMENTAL FLIGHT SET FROM PORTLAND TO HAWAII

Some evening next week Honolulu residents are going to be eating fresh berries that were picked on Oregon farms that same morning. And they will read copies of the Journal bearing the same date line.

Such is the promise of air-cargo service which will be inaugurated between Hawaii and the Northwest in a few days when a Matson Navigation Co. DC-4 four-engine plane makes the first nonscheduled commercial pay-load flight from Portland to Honolulu, President Chester A. Moores, of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, reports.

In line with its program for development of trade between here and the islands the chamber has requested private air lines to operate unscheduled flights and is aiding them in obtaining cargo and in contacting buyers at Honolulu, Moores said. The chamber and the private companies both believe that business so developed will justify certification of regularly scheduled service over the route, which so far has been denied by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Frank Clark, of the chamber foreign trade and shipping department, is to make the flight, and at present is contacting potential shippers of fresh produce here.

"Hawaii is crying for Northwest products, and has lots of merchandise to send back in exchange," Clark reports. "Only problem is getting air service established so that businessmen can build their plans around it." The chamber representative plans to make the round-trip flight and spend a day calling on merchants in Honolulu, all in the elapsed time of 48 hours.

"Although the CAB until now has not approved scheduled service, the community of interest between here and the islands and the normal exchange of merchandise, as well as of tourists and businessmen between the Territory and Oregon in our opinion makes eventual establishment of regular service imperative," Moores pointed out.

Dinner in Honor of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 31 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on January 19, 1945, a dinner was given in the city of Washington in honor of the inauguration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States, and Harry S. Truman, Vice-President-elect of the United States. A meeting of electors was held at the White House the following day. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the proceedings of these events.

A procession preceding the dinner was led by the members of the various branches of the Armed Forces of the United States all of which are represented, carrying the standards of the 48 States of the Union. They were followed by the official guard of honor carrying the National colors, the flag of the President of the United States, and the flag of the Vice President of the United States.

GREETINGS FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

TOAST TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

PRESENTATION OF THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

PRESENTATION OF VICE-PRESIDENT-ELECT HARRY S. TRUMAN BY VICE PRESIDENT HENRY A. WALLACE

Following the dinner, the subsequent proceedings were had, Mr. Michael Francis Doyle, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Electoral College of the United States, presiding as toastmaster.

The TOASTMASTER. We hope that this evening will be so entertaining that all of us will enjoy it and that it will not be too prolonged. We expect, also, to have an unexpected guest to aid us in this enjoyment, and for that reason, ladies and gentlemen, I am going to ask you, in the first place, to keep peace as much as possible, not only among your own tables, but throughout this entire room, and help us to make the evening a cheerful and bright one, and more than a happy one.

I don't intend making a speech tonight, except to say this: that the 531 electors of the United States who performed their duties after the election of last November, are delighted to be the hosts on this occasion. I don't know of any more distinguished audience that has ever gathered in this great city of Washington. We are here at a most unusual itme, in the midst of war and, for the first time in history, for the election of a President for a fourth term. [Applause.]

We are happy in the thought that we are privileged to participate in this great event. Having elected him, having shown our confidence in him and his leadership, not only once, twice, and three times, but for a fourth time, it is our duty to stand by him, to follow his leadership, not only in our country but also that we may sustain our proper leadership in the world. [Applause.]

We have here tonight both Republican and Democratic electors. That shows to the world the unity we have in this country. While we may debate during the election period advancing our ideals, in our beliefs of what our Government should be, yet once a decision is made, we rally around our Government, our President and Vice President and our Congress as elected by the people, as a united Nation to carry on to success. [Applause.]

Ladies and gentlemen, the message of this evening is the hope that we will have a united country behind a great President in order that we may have a resounding victory in war, an early peace, and the leadership of our country in world affairs, under our ideals.

The next in the order of the program will be the voting proceedings wherein we elect our President and Vice President. Under our system the votes are cast in the electoral college, as you know, and you see around this room tonight representation from every State, representation by its electors, and the number of its votes is indicated by the stars that shine above and around us. I am going to ask now to carry out the traditions of former meetings. The Secretary of the Senate will be called upon, and through him, by a representative of the Senate and the House, to have the vote polled and declared and announced, the election of the President and the Vice President. It is to be regretted, however, that Colonel Halsey has been called upon to assume the official duties tomorrow at the White House. He has been acting as a member of our committee but is not here tonight. I am going to ask in his place, that the Chairman of the Democratic National Convention at Chicago, who lead that great convention, the Honorable Senator JACKSON, step forward and assume the duties assigned to him. The Honorable Samuel D. Jackson, of Indiana! [Applause.]

Honorable SAMUEL D. JACKSON. Mr. Toastmaster, Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Wilson, Messrs. Vice President, ladies and gentlemen, this part of our evening's program has traditionally been, if not the most instructive, perhaps the most hilarious. If you think the Democratic Convention in Chicago was boisterous, I should like to have you up here now and hear the noise that I can hear. Perhaps it would help you if I would say, "The sergeant-at-arms will clear the aisles and the delegates will take their places. [Laughter and applause.] And waiters and photograph salesmen and autograph hunters will now give us their attention."

We are now going to elect a President and a Vice President, symbolically. I have asked that Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS, of Pennsylvania, whose election makes Pennsylvania the miracle State, since we have two Senators from that State [applause and cheers], and Senator SCOTT LUCAS, of Illinois, to assist me in this part of the program. Senator LUCAS will call the roll of the States, and the ballot of the electors will be cast by Senator MYERS.

In Chicago we did not need to remind any of the representatives of the several States to make a demonstration when their State was called. I trust we shall not have to do that tonight. Let us lean back now and get into the attitude and the atmosphere of that great meeting at Chicago 6 months ago. At the convention we lost the whole State of Tennessee in the final ballot, but we will have them here tonight. Senator LUCAS will call the roll of the States. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Alabama.

Senator MYERS. Alabama: 11 votes for Roosevelt; 11 votes for Harry S. Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Arizona.

Senator MYERS. Arizona: 4 votes for Roosevelt; 4 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Arkansas.

Senator MYERS. Arkansas: 9 votes for Roosevelt and 9 votes for Truman. [Applause and cheers.]

Senator LUCAS. California.

Senator MYERS. California: 25 votes for Roosevelt; 25 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Colorado.

Senator MYERS. Colorado: 6 votes for Dewey: 6 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Connecticut.

Senator MYERS. Connecticut: 8 votes for Roosevelt; 8 votes for Harry Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Delaware.

Senator MYERS. Delaware: 3 votes for Roosevelt; 3 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Florida.

Senator MYERS. Florida: 8 votes for Roosevelt; 8 votes for Truman. [Applause and cheers.]

Senator LUCAS. Georgia.

Senator MYERS. Georgia: 12 votes for Roosevelt and 12 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Idaho.

Senator MYERS. Idaho: 4 votes for Roosevelt and 4 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Illinois.

Senator MYERS. Illinois: 28 votes for Roosevelt; 28 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Indiana.

Senator JACKSON. Indiana: 13 votes for Dewey; 13 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Iowa.

Senator MYERS. Iowa: We pass Iowa: 10 votes for Dewey; 10 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Kansas.

Senator MYERS. Kansas. We shall pass Kansas, also. 8 votes for Dewey; 8 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Kentucky.

Senator MYERS. Kentucky: 11 votes for Roosevelt; 11 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Louisiana.

Senator MYERS. Louisiana: 10 votes for Roosevelt; 10 votes for Harry Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Maine.

Senator MYERS. Maine: 5 votes for Dewey; 5 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Maryland.

Senator MYERS. Maryland: 8 votes for Roosevelt; 8 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Massachusetts.

Senator MYERS. Massachusetts: 16 votes for Roosevelt; 16 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Michigan.

Senator MYERS. Michigan: 19 votes for Roosevelt; 19 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Minnesota.

Senator MYERS. Minnesota: 11 votes for Roosevelt; 11 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Mississippi.

Senator MYERS. Mississippi: 9 votes for Roosevelt; 9 votes for Harry Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Missouri.

Senator MYERS. Missouri: 15 votes for Roosevelt; 15 votes for Harry Truman, with the help of Hannegan. [A part of the audience arose to applaud and cheer.]

Senator LUCAS. Montana.

Senator MYERS. Montana: 4 votes for Roosevelt; 4 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Nebraska.

Senator MYERS. Nebraska: 6 votes for Dewey and 6 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Nevada.

Senator MYERS. Nevada: 3 votes for Roosevelt; 3 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. New Hampshire.

Senator MYERS. New Hampshire: 4 votes for Roosevelt and 4 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. New Jersey.

Senator MYERS. New Jersey: 16 votes for Roosevelt; 16 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. New Mexico.

Senator MYERS. New Mexico: 4 votes for Roosevelt and 4 votes for Harry Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. New York.

Senator MYERS. New York: 47 votes for Roosevelt; 47 votes for Harry Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. North Carolina.

Senator MYERS. North Carolina: 14 votes for Roosevelt and 14 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. North Dakota.

Senator MYERS. North Dakota: 4 votes for Dewey; 4 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Ohio.

Senator MYERS. Ohio: 26 votes for Dewey and 26 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Oklahoma.

Senator MYERS. Oklahoma: 10 votes for Roosevelt; 10 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Oregon.

Senator MYERS. Oregon: 6 votes for Roosevelt and 6 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Pennsylvania.

(The audience arose to cheer and applaud.)

Senator MYERS. Pennsylvania: 35 votes for Roosevelt and 35 votes for Truman.

Senator LUCAS. Rhode Island.

Senator MYERS. Rhode Island: 4 votes for Roosevelt and 4 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. South Carolina.

Senator MYERS. South Carolina: 8 votes for Roosevelt and 8 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. South Dakota.

Senator MYERS. South Dakota: 4 votes for Dewey; 4 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Tennessee.

Senator MYERS. Tennessee: 12 votes for Roosevelt; 12 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Texas.

Senator MYERS. Texas: 23 votes for Roosevelt and 23 votes for Truman. [The audience engaged in a demonstration of applause and cheers.]

Senator LUCAS. Utah.

Senator MYERS. Utah: 4 votes for Roosevelt; 4 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Vermont.

Senator MYERS. Vermont: 2 votes for Dewey; 2 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Virginia.

Senator MYERS. Virginia: 11 votes for Roosevelt and 11 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Washington.

Senator MYERS. Washington: 8 votes for Roosevelt; 8 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. West Virginia.

Senator MYERS. West Virginia: 8 votes for Roosevelt; 8 votes for Truman. [Applause.]

Senator LUCAS. Wisconsin.

Senator MYERS. Wisconsin—12 votes for Dewey; 12 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

Senator LUCAS. Wyoming.

Senator MYERS. Wyoming, the last State: 3 votes for Dewey and 3 votes for Bricker. [Boos.]

The procession was led by Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. Doyle, chairman of the electoral college, followed by the guests of honor, as follows:

Senator JACKSON. Ladies and gentlemen, if you will give me your careful attention I will announce the result. It is no longer a rumor; the tellers on behalf of the Senate and the House of Representatives seem to have been correct when they have arrived at the identical figures you have heard here; 432 votes for Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman. [Applause and cheers.] These electors have reelected the most valuable single public servant in the world today. [Applause and cheers.] They have been satisfied to entrust for the fourth consecutive term the leadership of the Democratic Party as to the greatest Republic on the face of the earth.

Thank you very much.

The TOASTMASTER. Now that the announcement has been made and made officially by the Electors in the presence of probably 50 Senators and 250 Representatives here, a full quorum, it can be safely declared and we can proceed tomorrow with the inauguration of Franklin D. Roosevelt as President again of the United States. [Applause.]

At this time, ladies and gentlemen, it is my very great pleasure to present to you the Vice President of the United States, Henry A. Wallace. [The assemblage arose and engaged in a prolonged demonstration of applause and cheers.]

Honorable HENRY A. WALLACE (Vice President of the United States). Mr. Chairman, how blessed it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. But I have a deep secret—a dark secret—to tell you here tonight. It was not ever thus. [Laughter.] The very life of the electoral college was threatened 33 years ago. A rising young Democrat, a Member of Congress, a resident of Paducah, Ky., came to the Congress with the idea of doing away with the electoral college.

From the floor. Throw him out. [Laughter.]

Vice President WALLACE. This rising young Democrat kept working at that job of doing away with the electoral college and came to President Wilson with his plea that the great force of President Wilson be thrown behind the project. President Wilson said it was a good idea, but he had other things to do just then. Yes; that was the majority leader of the Senate, ALBEN BARKLEY. [Laughter.]

In all truth, the electoral college is an appendix, but who wants to lose his appendix. [Laughter.] Of course, there are times when the appendix may seem to be a little bit inflamed. There was a moment—a brief moment—last summer. Fortunately, that was not carried to the point where it would have been necessary for the appendix to be removed, and anyone who has met with the electors will pray that the time may never come when the health of the body politic will be such as to necessitate an operation of that kind, because I know, and Mr. Doyle knows, the very high quality of Presidential electors—generally speaking. And we want to congratulate the 10 Republican Presidential electors who are here tonight. [Applause.] "Don't cheer, boys! Don't cheer! The poor boys are dying." Who said that? Admiral Dewey, I believe.

We are in favor of these electoral dinners. We are in favor of having the Republicans present at these dinners as long as they don't exceed 90 and 9.

Harry (referring to Vice President-elect Truman) sooner or later in your travels back and forth across the United States, one or another of these electors will come to you. You may not recollect just who he is or who she may be, but they will tell you, one after another, that on December 18 of 1944 they voted for you. They will even say that if it had not been for them you would not have been elected. [Laughter.] So I am in favor of treating our appendix with the utmost solicitude that we never eat a diet which may inflame it, that it may never be necessary to remove it.

It is my pleasure this evening as my last official duty to introduce my successor. I suppose, from one point of view I am still Vice President until I swear Harry Truman in tomorrow, but I was told by the fiscal officer of the Senate that my pay ends at midnight tonight. If I work tomorrow, Harry, I am doing it on my own time. [Applause and laughter.]

So your Vice President of today takes a very hearty good pleasure in introducing your Vice President of tomorrow, and I hope he has as much fun out of the next 4 years as I have had out of the past. [The audience arose in a demonstration of applause and cheers.]

Honorable HARRY S. TRUMAN (Vice President-elect of the United States). Mr. Chairman, Mr. Vice President (you are still Mr. Vice President in spite of the fact that I am on relief myself—you will be tonight at midnight; I am out of a job until noon tomorrow). I do appreciate most highly the fact that the Presidential electors saw fit to elect the greatest President we have ever had [applause], and to take me along as an appendage. I sincerely hope that I can in the next 4 years have as much fun and do as much good as my predecessor. [Applause.] I am very fond of him; he has been a great Vice President. [Applause.] He has been a great Presiding Officer of the Senate of the United States, and I hope I can do as well. I also sincerely hope that I may be of some use to the country in its present distress.

If there ever was a time when it was necessary to support the leader, now is that time. [Applause.] We are winning this war, but it is not won yet. Then we must win the peace.

I appreciate most sincerely the honor which has been done to the great State of Missouri in the fact that I have been elected Vice President of the United States, the first time Missouri ever had a national office of this importance. [Applause.]

I shall devote my time and my effort to the support of the great leader who is now taking us through the wilderness, and I hope I am able to be of some benefit to my country.

Thank you very much.

[The audience arose and applauded.]

The TOASTMASTER. Now what is more appropriate than that we rise to drink a toast to the President of the United States, the Vice President, and the Vice-President-elect.

[A toast was drunk to the President, the Vice President, and the Vice-President-elect by the audience, standing.]

The TOASTMASTER. We have a message tonight from the President of the United States. He regrets it was impossible for him to be here because of his duties tomorrow and his grave obligations at this time, but this message to the electors of the United States will be read by the former Attorney General, a member of the committee on arrangements, the Honorable Homer S. Cummings, of Connecticut. [Applause.]

Honorable HOMER S. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I have the very great privilege of reading to you a communication from President Roosevelt to the Presidential electors. The letter reads as follows:

"To the Presidential Electors of the United States:

"The gravity of the hour makes Inauguration day tomorrow a day of solemn import. First of all, we should, as Americans, be grateful that the orderly processes of democracy still dominate our national life, and that in the midst of a global war it has been possible to hold our normal elections, national, state, and local.

"In recording the will of the people, you have performed the duty imposed by the Constitution. It remains now for all good citizens to unite to wage the war with renewed strength and with every resource at our command.

"That is my message to the electors. We shall win the war and we shall win the peace and thereby insure to our children and our children's children the right to determine the kind of government under which they will live.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

[The assemblage arose in a demonstration of acclaim.]

The TOASTMASTER. Ladies and gentlemen, we have the theme, "We shall win the war!" The leaders of our country in leading that war are here with us tonight and we must acclaim them to give them further encouragement.

I have the honor to present the great leaders of our country in the management of our war who are here with us as guests tonight:

Admiral William D. Leahy [applause]; Gen. George C. Marshall [applause]; Admiral Ernest J. King [applause]; General of the Army Air Forces, Henry H. Arnold [applause]; Commandant of the Marine Corps, Gen. Alexander A. Vandegrift [applause]; Commandant of the United States Coast Guard, Vice Adm. R. R. Waesche [applause]. They are six great heroic figures of our country and they are here tonight as your guests to do you honor and to do honor to their country. They will win the war and the peace will be won, too, under the leadership and the assistance of one of our guests here tonight. May I present our Secretary of State, Edward R. Stettinius. [Applause.]

While we are presenting the distinguished guests, I should like to present a group who are most unusual. They are the ones who have four times voted in the electoral college for Franklin D. Roosevelt for President, and I want them to arise.

John A. Logan of Illinois [applause]; J. J. O'Brien of New York [applause]; Alice Campbell Good of New York [applause]; William O. Dapping of New York [applause]; John F. Fitzgerald of Massachusetts [applause]; Harriet T. Mack of New York [applause]; and Winton Bogardus of New York [applause]. Each one of those electors will have presented to them special inaugural medals tomorrow. If there are any other electors in this country who have voted four times in the electoral college for President Roosevelt and we don't have their names, we would like to have them, so they may likewise be honored.

Next I am going to ask for the great privilege of announcing Miss Lawrence again. Miss Lawrence, as you may have noticed, is suffering as the President is suffering, and despite her great suffering, despite her great fight for health, she has become one of the noted singers of the world. She came here tonight to honor the President whom she looks up to and who has been an inspiration to her in her recovery. Although she will be seated as she sings her songs, her soul stands high, and as a leader of our people she has traveled among the camps of our soldiers both here and abroad for some thirty-five thousand miles, inspiring them and cheering them for the battles ahead. She not only brought cheer to them but she brought added happiness to herself.

May I again present Miss Marjorie Lawrence, of the Metropolitan Opera Co. [Applause.]

(Songs by Miss Marjorie Lawrence.) [Applause.]

The TOASTMASTER. I think it is only proper at this time to call on memories for a moment to another great war which we won in the past, a war won under the leadership of a great Democrat, one of the greatest of our Presidents. We are honored here tonight by the presence of his widow, Mrs. Woodrow Wilson. [The assemblage arose and applauded.]

The TOASTMASTER. That first World War would not have been won, my friends, without a strong Army and a strong Navy. The leader of that Navy is here, the leader who brought to the American Navy the acclaim of the world. We have here the former Secretary of the Navy in the Woodrow Wilson administration, the only boss that Franklin Roosevelt has ever known, our beloved friend the Honorable Josephus Daniels. [The assemblage arose and applauded.]

The TOASTMASTER. We will continue our program with two speeches, both of which, I understand, are not lengthy but are most important, and there will follow, I hope, some very interesting entertainment.

I have the privilege now of presenting the man whose leadership won the election, the general of our armies who carried so many States and only gave the opposing armies 99 out of 531 votes. For a young man he has made a record of which any man could be proud. He not only was the leader of the Democratic Party in that campaign; he is still the leader of the Democratic Party and will continue in that leadership until the greatest desires and the fruits of victory of our party have been fulfilled.

I have the honor to present the chairman of the National Democratic Committee, Robert E. Hannegan. [The audience arose and applauded.]

Mr. HANNEGAN. Mr. Chairman, and my fellow Americans, as I sat here I knew that I would be called on and I wrote down a few words as to just how I would answer. I was prepared to say, "Mrs. Roosevelt, Mr. Vice President Wallace, Mr. Vice President-elect Truman," and then "Mr. Speaker RAYBURN," but you are ahead of them, SAM; they have all left.

This is certainly a happy and festive occasion. The past 2 days have been very gala and festive days here in the Democratic National Committee headquarters.

You know, it is rather amusing and it would be for you, too, if you could be there all day and listen to the people from the different States as they come into the headquarters and greet each other and those at the National Committee headquarters.

"Well, hello, Tom; you certainly did a great job out in your State."

"Oh, well, you are entitled to a lot of credit."

"Oh, no; you are entitled to the credit yourself."

And so it goes. Nobody made any mistakes whatsoever. In each State the leaders applaud the next one and give them all a pat on the back. So I thought that we should organize a mutual-admiration society. No one made any mistakes, even those from the States which cast their electoral votes for Dewey here tonight. Even in those States, it's "Well, we know you had a tough job and you did the best you could."

I am happy to greet the electors and also to say to them that you gentlemen did a great job. As the Vice President said, about 6 months ago we were a little bit concerned about what might happen with some of the electors and, of course, when I spoke about that to one of the gentlemen from the great State of Texas, he said, "You fellows certainly did a great job down there with your electors." As you know from what was going on there several months ago, there was some consternation, as usual, from the boys of Texas. He said, "Wasn't nothing in that at all, 6 months ago, just some of the boys down there kicking up their heels a little bit. We took care of them; everything is all right."

The astute British observer, James Bryce, once said of this country that in America the great moving forces are the political parties. The Government counts for less in America than it does in Europe, the political parties count for more, and it is my privilege, as the spokesman for the Democratic Party to report to you briefly on that phase of American politics which James Bryce said counts for more.

I wish to give you no more than a brief summary of the campaign which culminated in the victory for the Democratic Party on November 7 last, and an equally brief interpretation of that victory as it bears upon the party's future hopes, aims, and strategies.

There is one fact which I believe must be recognized by all true Democrats, and it is this: The victory of Franklin D. Roosevelt last November, great as its importance was to the Democratic Party, it was of greater importance to America. That victory was more important to America than it could have been to any party, interest, group, or individual in America. I say this not because I want to leave the inference that the Republican Party and its candidates did not believe in all sincerity that they were striving in the Nation's best interests, but because at a time when America needed the best man her people could offer, the best man won. [Applause.]

The stated principles and objectives of the Republican Party in this last election as related to the great issues of war and peace, were patterned so closely after the Roosevelt program that they must have been in the Nation's best interests. We know, therefore, that out of the 48,000,000 Americans who voted in November, all but a very small number wanted then and want now to see the fulfillment of America's destiny as victor in war and the builder of peace. The voters, Democrat and Republican, shared alike the resolve to go ahead on the road that our country has been traveling, but these are times that not only try men's souls, but they are times to try men's trust—trust in their ideals and trust in the fitness of each other to uphold these ideals.

That is why our electorate was faced last November with a crucial decision, crucial despite the similarity of stated party objectives in defense of the ideal of freedom within this Nation and on this earth. No man since the time of Abraham Lincoln has had to prove himself and has so succeeded in doing as has our President; and no man has inspired the confidence of his fellow citizens, his fellow men the world over, as has this leader of our country and, we trust, in his proven abilities. He, in turn, relies upon us for support.

In a sense, then, we of the Democratic Party, who constitute a political subdivision in America, are today entrusted with a stewardship, a responsibility beyond that which a political party is ordinarily called upon to accept, for we are charged with the duty of supporting a broad program, far overreaching traditional party lines. It is a program on which the freedom, the safety, and the lives of Democrats and Republicans alike depend. It is a program that reaches into the lives of peoples of distant countries, along with our own. It is a program that will affect future generations as vitally as it affects us.

Such is the President's program for winning this war, perpetuating the peace, and insuring full employment. Such is the mandate which the American people have given him and which freedom-loving and peace-loving peoples throughout the world endorse today with a prayer in their hearts, but only by accepting a broader-than-party responsibility can we Democrats assure the Roosevelt administration the support which it must have in carrying out a broader-than-party mandate.

Only by subordinating all narrow political interests to the furtherance of that support will we be carrying out our part of the program. Only by giving the right-of-way over interparty or intraparty politics to the three great objectives stated in the Democratic platform of 1944, the objectives of victory, peace, and jobs for all our people, only by keeping these first things first can we of the Democratic Party fulfill our own role in realizing the tremendous meaning of last November's decision.

How can the Democratic Party assume and carry out this responsibility? What must it do? The best answer that I have been able to find to this question is a very old one. It was set down 175 years ago by Edmund Burke. Burke wrote: "I find it impossible to conceive that anyone believes in his own politics or thinks them to be of any weight who refuses to adopt the means of having them reduced to practice. It is the business of the speculative philosopher to mark the proper ends of government; it is the business of the politician, who is the philosopher in action, to find out proper means toward those ends and to then employ them with effect."

In terms of action, the Democratic Party, in order to carry on with effect, must elect and support candidates for Congress who understand the President's program and will back him up in his efforts. [Applause.] We hope and we believe that the war will be over long before the Congressional elections of 1946. [Applause.] But the task of building the peace will undoubtedly be a continuing one and Congress will share that task with the Executive. I cannot place too much emphasis, therefore, upon the importance of the elections of 1946. The choices that we make, then, will have a most vital bearing on the preservation of world peace. For the task of making peace we cannot elect men who have been in confusion or in disagreement as to the rightness of our cause in this war or who have made their own evaluations and have put defeat of the enemy below their own personal prejudice and hatred, because the program that we support is broad, world-wide in its embrace. We shall have to broaden our own scope of activities and contacts.

In the last election, we saw the value of doing this: We were assisted and encouraged by the efforts of many individuals and organizations working and fighting for our party's principles. For a real people's victory and a real people's peace, the Democratic Party stands ready in the future to join hands again with these same people in the same way. [Applause.]

These, in brief, are some of the things that we must do. In addition, as long as our country is burdened with crises and as long as our President's solutions to these problems remain to be completed, there are some things that we must not do.

A writer on American politics once said: "It might be stated as a matter of fact which acquaintance with the interior workings of politics will verify that the influence of party leaders is chiefly exerted in soothing the prejudices and moderating the demands of their followers."

Now this may have been justifiably stated as a matter of fact in 1898, when that statement was published, and I would be the last one to say to you after the campaign of 1944 that the job of party leader involves no smoothing down of ruffled feathers, but I say just as emphatically that on the program of the President for victory and for peace, on the platform that was submitted to the people under his name, and on the aims embodied in that platform, there has been no compromise, no weakening of our resolve, no surrender of ideals, and there will be none!

To my fellow members of the Democratic Party and to my fellow Americans, I would say only one thing more tonight. Our Party has won. Our country is winning, both toward the objective of a safer, saner, more decent world to live in, as well as toward the actual victory in war. The hour of victory is a very dangerous one. It is a time when we should be most vigilant, when we should work together and fight harder than ever to maintain ourselves as a party of liberal leadership in America and in the world. [The assemblage arose and applauded.]

The TOASTMASTER. The highest honor the American people can give is the office of President of the United States; the second is the office of Vice President of the United States; and the third highest office of our land is the office of the Speaker of the House of Representatives. SAM RAYBURN has that title under the Constitution, and I present him here this evening. The Honorable SAM RAYBURN of Texas. [The assemblage arose and applauded.]

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, members of the electoral college, and your guests, I would be discourteous if I did not take the time to say how glad I am that you are here and that we have the privilege of meeting and greeting you.

Having been a Member of the House of Representatives for a great many years, I always feel that I should on all occasions exercise the rights, the prerogatives, and the privileges of a Member of the House of Representatives.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause and laughter.]

The TOASTMASTER. He wants to enjoy some of the evening, too, as do the rest of us.

Now, as you noticed tonight (we feel it up here), we have the thrill of winning a victory. All the men around this table and all the women, too, represent either the victorious past, the victorious present, or the victories to come. This is a victorious occasion. It is thrilling. The inspiration is thrilling to all of us.

The next speaker of the evening is the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the United States Senate, who will help in controlling and marking the destinies not only of this country but of the world. Senator TOM CONNALLY. [The assemblage arose and applauded.]

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE TOM CONNALLY

Senator CONNALLY. Mr. Toastmaster, Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Wilson, members of the electoral college, and guests, this distinguished assemblage bears eloquent proof of the fact that in the recent campaign the overwhelming verdict of the American people was cast in support of the foreign policy of our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause and cheers.]

Tonight, as we face the issues of winning the present war completely and crushingly, and then the establishment of permanent peace machinery, these issues are so challenging that they draw upon our courage, upon our wisdom, and upon our will to achieve.

Tonight, the planet is trembling under the marching feet of more armed men than were ever gathered under the banners of Alexander, Hannibal, Caesar, and Napoleon, and all of the conquerors of the past. We have our heroic and courageous men fighting in many distant parts of the air, from the scorching tropics to the snow and ice of the Arctic regions; upon the waters and in the sea they are marching on to victory, to crush and overwhelm our cruel and treacherous enemies.

The United States did not seek entrance into this war, but when we were treacherously and savagely attacked at Pearl Harbor, honor and security demanded that we accept the gage of battle and when we did so Germany—Hitler's Germany—declared war upon us also.

Now, my countrymen, the American people not only want to win this war completely, but when it is won they desire that Hitler's Germany and Hirohito's Japan shall be completely and permanently disarmed. [Applause.] We propose to sterilize their war-making factories [applause]; we propose to strike down the places where the gods of war have been shaping and fashioning their instruments of destruction and aggression.

These are mighty tasks. Tonight we are fighting by the side of gallant allies—Russia, Great Britain, China and others of the United Nations. [Applause.] If these great allies are worthy to stand by us and we by them in the line of battle to win the war, they are worthy to stand by us in bringing about a permanent peace, to shield the nations from the horrors and the treachery of another war. [Applause.] It is our hope and ambition to set up an international organization to preserve the best of the world. That organization must not wait until the final and definitive treaty of peace is written. It ought to be set up now, and we are already at work upon its implementation through the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, and we hope that within a very short time there will assemble representatives of all of the United Nations to improve upon and perfect the work of the Dumbarton Oaks Conference so that it may be submitted to the nations for ratification. [Applause.]

There are certain points of incompleteness with reference to this instrument, some of which may be removed by the early conference of Premier Churchill, Marshal Stalin and President Roosevelt. Let me say to you that a part of this plan has been most marvelous cooperation between the Executive and the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] Secretary Hull, during his tenure, for more than 2 years conferred almost weekly, sometimes more often than weekly, with the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, undertaking to enlist coordinated effort toward setting up this structure of international peace. [Applause.] All the world is saddened by the illness which struck down Secretary Hull and forced his retirement, but his successor, Secretary of State Stettinius, has carried on. [Applause.] He has carried on in the same fashion and we have frequent conferences with the Secretary of State. Only this week he was before the Committee on Foreign Relations and spent 2 hours in discussing, after questions and general discussion, the whole field of foreign relations.

These mighty tasks attract the ambitions and the high and lofty purpose of peace-loving nations everywhere. Let me say that our efforts for international peace are going to cost something. The United States must accept its responsibilities and its duties. The final draft of the treaty will not be perfection. There will be those who do not like this feature, and someone who does not like that feature, but I know of no constitution on earth, I know of no code of laws, that has not had criticism and objections.

There have been filed 3,000 proposals to amend the Constitution of the United States, and in every session of Congress thousands of bills are introduced to modify the statutes of the Republic, so I would say to those who are straining to find some defect that we must appraise the organization in the long picture and in the long years. It must be considered in its entirety and it must be remembered that we are building it out on the frontier; we are building it in land where no traveler has ever left his footprints. It is true that prior to World War I President Taft advanced and advocated the League to enforce peace, and it is remembered that in the treaty of Versailles, the great, talented, and heroic Woodrow Wilson [applause] had written into the treaty the structure of the League of Nations, but we know with what tragic result it was accepted by the Senate of the United States.

But let me say to you that World War II has so vividly reminded us of the necessity for a world organization that I now believe that the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States is in favor of a world organization to preserve the peace of the world and to prevent armed aggression. [Applause and cheers.]

A brief word, and then I am done. As you know, the organization will consist of a Council and then of an Assembly representing all of the United Nations. We realize more than ever that the employment of peaceable measures, conciliation, diplomacy, and mediation by the organization will seek to compose many differences, but we have at last come to know that in certain emergencies, in certain critical periods, those mad ambitions of aggressors cannot be conquered or arrested by soft words, so that this organization in the final analysis, and for the emergencies, must possess power to employ armed force to prevent the violation of the terms of the treaty of peace. [Applause and cheers.]

No power is given to the league for indirectly considering the employment of war, and all of the peace agencies must be first exhausted, but when a willful and a determined aggressor seeks to violate the laws of the nations and the laws of humanity with the sword, there is no other recourse to arrest the mad designs except by armed force, if necessary. [Applause.]

Now, my friends, pending the final, definitive treaty of peace, there will be from time to time brought to the attention of the nation many vexing and troublesome questions. It is my own view that sentiments of boundaries, the demarcation of boundaries, the transfer of territories, and all similar questions growing out of this war ought not to be settled by unilateral or bilateral agreements now, but must be submitted to all of the United Nations in the final treaty of peace. [Applause.] These are the things that cause wars; allocation of territories and the demarcation of boundaries breed war. The present war, you will remember, so far as its acts of pretext are concerned, grew out of the Polish Corridor, the argument with Germany over the rights in the Corridor. So these questions ought to be resolved, not by the wishes or the will of one or two of our allies, but with all of the allies, including the United States of America. We have fought the war together, and we have got to make the peace together, with America's voice heard in the councils of the nations. [Applause.]

Now, my countrymen, let me say to you that the President of the United States, President Roosevelt, is soon to go across the seas to consult with Marshal Stalin and with Premier Churchill, not alone with relation to military measures or pushing the fortunes of the war, but for all of the mighty problems relating to the war. God grant that he may have a safe voyage. [Applause.] God grant that when he goes into conference with these great figures providence may give strength to his arm and uplift his spirit so that he may feel that behind him is a united America, so that he may speak the voice of America and the view of America in this great world-wide forum. [Applause.] Let him speak not alone with bayonets and cannon in prosecuting the war; let him speak with a word of prophecy; let him speak with high trust in the future of the world and in the democratic processes of the world. Let Europe know and all the world know that while America seeks no spoils from this war, while we thirst for no indemnity, while we have no hunger to have the conquered lands and conquered peoples, we do have an interest in the security of all the peoples of the earth.

Our interest, primarily, of course, is in our own country, but when we give greater security to other nations, we are giving greater security to ourselves. When we assure the freedom of other nations of the world, we are assuring in greater degree the freedom of our own people and of our own land.

So, Mr. President, as you go into foreign lands, carrying your message to the great rulers and great figures of the earth, God be with you. God give you strength and courage that you may speak with the voice of a prophet until the views and the voices of America may be known in the councils of the world. [The audience arose to applaud and cheer.]

The TOASTMASTER. This talk—this is indeed an oration—has been really inspiring and it appeals to every person in this great audience. I ask that we join with Senator CONNALLY and stand and pledge a toast to the United Nations, united in peace as they have been united in war. [A toast was pledged to the United Nations.]

The TOASTMASTER. We are surrounded here tonight by the stars, the stars of the States, the stars of our Nation. We have here tonight a young man who has thrilled the soldiers and sailors of our country wherever he has appeared. I am going to ask you now, my friends, to be as worthy of him as he has been to you, to your cause and to your Nation and to the boys who have been fighting this war. I am going to bring him here. His name does not appear on the printed program. He is here entire voluntarily, because he wanted to express himself to this great audience and to America.

I call now, as does this audience, I am sure, for Bob Hope. [The assemblage arose and applauded.]

Mr. BOB HOPE. Thank you very much, Mr. Doyle. I loved that when you said I was here voluntarily. All I know is I didn't pay for those phone calls, Mr. Doyle. [Laughter.]

I don't need to tell you that I am really thrilled to be here. This is a grand evening and the excitement has been tremendous here. I don't have to tell you that. I have been in this room several times; in fact, I have been in Washington at three big affairs in the past year, and I am getting so I can change a tuxedo in a taxicab in 5 minutes. [Laughter.]

But I had a little trouble tonight. I really didn't know this was going to be so formal, and I had to look around for a dark suit. It took me about 3 hours to find a Republican. [Laughter.]

I want to tell you, though, that this is a thrilling experience, and to me it is rather odd, because I am so happy to come here and find out that President Roosevelt is elected. I've been worried—no kidding. I happened to pick up a Chicago Tribune on the train today, and they're still counting. [Laughter.]

I do want to tell you that Mr. Doyle has asked me for the past week if I could get down here. That's how I begged him [laughter], and finally I got him to get me a priority—6-AA—comes right after spies. [Laughter.]

You just neglected one thing, Mr. Doyle; you forgot to get me a room here. I should have talked to Senator Truman—I mean Vice President Truman; he made it. Trying to find a room in Washington is like finding a needle in a haystack. I'd settle for a haystack tonight, believe me. It's really serious. [Laughter.]

I have the pleasure of being associated with a couple of fellows who have been touring the country and the world with me in the past three and a half years, and really we have been enjoying the companionship of a lot of our guys in the service. I want to be serious for a second and tell you it has been a great thrill and privilege to play for our boys, because they are magnificent boys. I don't have to say that to you; you know that. And they are the greatest audience in the world. I feel I have been privileged to witness our guys at their tremendous job, and I really don't want any applause or thanks for it myself, because it really has been a great, great honor. I wouldn't trade it for anything.

There is a fellow here who has been our orchestra for the past 3 years in our travels, and I should like you to meet him. His name is Tony Romano. Would you like to meet him? [Applause.]

This is Tony Romano, ladies and gentlemen, right here. This is the fellow who has played for us at tree stumps in Alaska, has played for us in the back of trucks in England and Africa, in Australia, the South Pacific, and New Guinea. He and his guitar have been everywhere with us. He is a valuable man.

You know, I wish tonight that Sinatra could have heard Senator CONNALLY. Wasn't that wonderful? I wish I could get one of his lungs for Skinnay Ennis. Senator, it was inspiring, thrilling, that talk. I mean that sincerely.

Tony, would you like to sing a little song?

Mr. ROMANO. I would like to.

(Songs by Tony Romano with self-accompaniment on the guitar.) [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Tony, the next time you go to England you come back by drain pipe, if you make any more cracks like those in your songs.

Thank you, Tony; that was really swell. Tony took Skinnay Ennis' place when Skinnay went into the Army. They got him. He wanted to go. He wanted to release a WAC for active duty. He finally got in and he scared the doctor to death when he went for his physical examination. The doctor took one look at his body, went out, sighed, and lowered the flag. [Laughter.] Skinnay said, "Doc, I don't think I'll make it, I have bad eyes." The doctor said, "We don't examine eyes any more; we just count them. If you've got bad eyes, we'll put you up front where you can see everything." [Laughter.]

Then he took a sample of Skinnay's blood—he thought. That's all. He stuck the needle in, waited 10 minutes, slapped him in the face and said, "When we want hot water we'll ask for it." [Laughter.]

They're really drafting everyone in Hollywood now. Nowadays if you see a friend on the street instead of saying "What d'ya know, Joe?" you say "When d'ya go, Joe?" [Laughter.]

I went for my physical. They asked me in such a way I couldn't refuse. [Laughter.] I went down. I walked in and the nurse said, "Take off your clothes and camphor bag." I took off my clothes and asked the doc, "What's cooking?" and he said, "With a pot like you've got, it could be a seven-course dinner." [Laughter.] Then he tapped me on the knee and my pivot tooth fell out. [Laughter.]

But really, they're drafting everybody. They are drafting all the young leading men in Hollywood—all the young ones. Crosby is still there. Crosby is at that age when a cup of tea rests him. [Laughter.] That goes for his horses, too. He's a little mad now. They closed the tracks, as you know. It's very nice for his horses, though. Now they can sleep without anybody looking at them. [Laughter.] I don't mean that Crosby's horses are half dead or anything, but Bing's are the only jockeys that have to ride with one hand and beat off the vultures with the other. [Laughter.]

Bing gave me a tip on a wonderful horse a couple of weeks ago just before Hollywood Park closed. He called me over and said, "I have a little dope for you in the next race." A little dope. I wish I had given it to the horse. [Laughter.] That was the first horse I ever saw start from a kneeling position. [Laughter.] I put $2 on his nose and he ran like he was trying to balance it. [Laughter.] The horse came in so late the jockey was running ahead of him with a flashlight. [Laughter.] Crosby raised it from a colt; he should have shot him with it. [Laughter.]

But there is a fellow here I want you to meet. He is a grand guy; he has been on our tours and has done a grand job. He is a swell comedian, Jerry Colonna. [Applause.]

Mr. COLONNA. All right, don't stand. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPE. How do you feel, Jerry? What a moustache! Can you image that moustache down in the South Pacific? What a jungle. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLONNA. Careful!

Mr. HOPE. Careful?

Mr. COLONNA. Snipers. [Laughter.]

(Songs by Jerry Colonna.) [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HOPE. Thank you very much, Jerry. Jerry has been in every part of the world with us, and I want to tell you now (I don't want to take up too much time) that he's done a swell job. Last year we flew out to the South Pacific; we flew from Hamilton Field to Honolulu in one hop. Amazing! I never dreamed that anything like that would happen to me. But it didn't scare me at all. I read a novel going across; coming back I read the second page. [Laughter.] Everybody had a lot of fun on the plane. I know, because I looked inside and saw them. [Laughter.]

Half way across, the pilot turned around to me and said, "Are you a little nervous?" I said, "Well, this is only my third time up." He said, "You beat me, bother; this is my first." [Laughter.] I said, "It's a little rough. Don't you think we ought to have parachutes?" He said, "Don't be silly; the guys with parachutes jumped an hour ago." [Laughter.]

Talk about weather! It was so rough the first night the automatic pilot bailed out! [Laughter.]

But it was really wonderful. People in show business have been doing some magnificent jobs. For instance, Bing Crosby went over to England this past season and had a great experience. It really broadened the man—where he didn't need it. [Laughter.] They sent him over on a lend-louse deal. [Laughter.]

And Martha Raye. She went over. She yawned once and one of our aircraft was missing. [Laughter.]

Errol Flynn went to Alaska. He didn't do much; just sat around and reminisced. [Laughter.]

It's a wonderful thing. Those audiences just—well, they're sensational. Would you like to hear one of our trio numbers, the one we do in the camps? [Applause.] This will be a little number dedicated to Mrs. Roosevelt, entitled, "Don't Fence Me In." [Laughter.]

(Trio by Bob Hope, Jerry Colonna, and Tony Romano.)

Mr. HOPE. If I had my way, man if I had my way, I'd get a big pile of potatoes about as tall as the Empire State Building. I'd get a piece of glass, throw it to the sergeant and say, "Brother, unpeel them. Remove those jackets instantaneously," if I only had my way.

Here I am, a private in the Army. I enlisted as a private. What in hell is private about it? You know, I eat with 50,000 soldiers every day, sleep with 50,000 soldiers every night. Man, I can't even go to the canteen alone. [Laughter and applause.]

Thank you very much; you are very kind. I just have one more story. I want to tell you one little incident I have told before, but I think you might enjoy it. This is a thing that happened last year in Guadalcanal. We were going through a hospital and got into one of the wards where there was a kid sitting with an M. P. guarding him. I asked, "Doc, what's the matter with him?" He said, "He's one of those kids that can't do anything right. He shoots dice, runs around with women, won't eat his spam." Finally, in my tour I got to this boy and I said, "What's the big idea with your conduct?" And he said, "Mr. Hope, did you give a pint of blood to the Red Cross last year?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Shake hands with the guy that got it." [Laughter and applause.]

The TOASTMASTER. I just want to let you in on a secret. You notice when I presented Bob Hope I said he volunteered. I just want to let you know he was drafted.

Our evening is practically over. I want to make two statements before we adjourn. The first is that the President of Cuba very graciously sent the cigars which you had here tonight when he learned of the cigarette shortage in the United States. He said, "Well, you can have these from Cuba; the best cigars Cuba can produce."

Tomorrow the Presidential electors will present the Presidential standard as the insignia of the Office of the President at the White House. The committee of the President's of the various States, together with the fourth-term electors, will make that gift to President Roosevelt.

Finally, those who haven't secured their tickets for the inaugural tomorrow and for the tea in the afternoon will get them tomorrow here in the hotel.

We hope to have a wonderful day; it is now long past midnight, this is already inauguration day. We hope we will be here 4 years from today inaugurating another President.

Now the prayer will be said by the Assistant Chief of Naval Chaplains, Capt. E. L. Ackis.

Captain ACKIS. May we bow our heads for a moment.

Almighty God, before whose face our fathers walked in humble faith and were not confused, we, their children, ask that Thou wilt be unto us a pillar of clouds by day and a pillar of fire by night. We invoke Thy blessing, Thy protection, Thy guidance upon those who shall lead the Nation we so greatly love and wish to serve; from the highest to the lowest, we ask Thee to give them Thy wisdom and Thy protection and Thy love. We ask Thy blessing, also, in Thy presence, for not only those of our forces in the sky, on land, on the sea, and under the sea, but grant that they may feel Thy presence wherever they are, and be Thou with those who here work and wait and pray and whose hearts are there with those we love. Amen.

(The meeting adjourned at 1:30 a. m.)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 31 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, last week the China Club of Seattle observed its 30th birthday anniversary. It was organized in 1916 by Julean Arnold. Mr. Arnold passed away a few weeks ago. He devoted many of his years to improving the good will between China and America, and to emphasizing what must be the future of the Pacific Northwest with respect to China and the Orient, all of which has been most deeply appreciated by many of the citizens of the Northwest. One of his dreams was to have erected in the port of Seattle a pagoda skyscraper to symbolize it as the gateway to the Orient. In view of Mr. Arnold's untimely death, his long and distinguished public career, and the fact that he was the founder of what was the forerunner of all the China clubs in the United States, which in itself has contributed to the great friendship which now exists between our country and the Orient, I ask unanimous consent that a brief résumé of Mr. Arnold's life, together with excerpts from the minutes of the organizing of the Seattle China Club, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULEAN ARNOLD

"Brief is the sliding time allotted thee for breath;
Live as on a mountain; let men behold a man.
If they cannot suffer three, then let them deal thee death;
Better far to climb and die, than plod in that dull caravan."

—Marcus Aurelius.

Julean Herbert Arnold was born in Sacramento, Calif., July 19, 1876. He died in Washington, D. C., on July 21, 1946. His death occurred 2 days after his seventieth birthday.

His father was a prosperous businessman in Sacramento, and the Arnold's Chinese cook first gave the young Julean Arnold an insatiable idea and desire to visit and see China.

His studies at the University of California were directed along these lines, and after his graduation he received an appointment from President Theodore Roosevelt to go to China as a student interpreter, being the first appointment of this nature to be made in this country. The appointment was made July 8, 1902, and he was sent to the United States Legation in Peking.

After completing his course in the Chinese language and allied studies, he was transferred to the consular service, and occupied various consular posts in China, Japan, and Formosa. He was United States consul in Formosa when he was married, and he spent his honeymoon in Formosa with his bride in remote parts of that island.

Julean Arnold was never content to sit in the confined walls of a consulate. Wherever he was stationed, he would explore the region where he lived, so Japan, Formosa, and the 18 provinces of China were all familiar ground to him—not from reading books—but from actual contact with the country and its people. He was the first European to set foot on the top of Mount Morrison (Niitakasan) in Formosa.

As a result of this intimate knowledge of China, he was appointed as United States commercial attaché to China in 1914, and occupied this position until his retirement in 1940. His duties in the Orient, chiefly in China, covered a period of 38 years.

During his service in China, he occupied some of the most trustworthy positions ever held by an American in the Orient. He was chairman of the American delegation to the Chinese Tariff Revenue Commission from 1918 to 1927. He was chief adviser to the Red Cross Society of China, and it was largely through his efforts that soybean milk was developed, which proved to be the means of saving thousands of Chinese children from death by starvation. For his humanitarian work amongst the Chinese he was decorated on three different occasions by the Chinese Government. He was the founder of the American Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai in 1915, founder of the Peking Rotary Club, and founder of the China Club of Seattle in 1916. He was to have been the guest of honor at the thirtieth anniversary of the China Club of Seattle in September of this year, and at that time was to have been given a special Award of Merit in recognition of his lifelong efforts to promote good will, knowledge, and understanding between the peoples of China and the United States. He took an active part in American relief in China and was field secretary of the American Red Cross in China from 1918 to 1921.

No single American knew China so intimately as Julean Arnold. His powers of observation were singularly acute, and to this was added a retentive memory. He had a dynamic personality and delivery, and this enabled him to bring to the people of the United States important information regarding China and its people.

At all times he prophesied that China eventually would be our biggest foreign trade customer, and he firmly believed that a strong and united China would insure peace in the Pacific. At all times he proved himself to be a true and sincere friend of the Chinese people. His sole purpose in life seemed to be to explain China to our people and to explain our country to the people of China. His driving personality was centered on the idea of developing friendly relations between the peoples of China and of the United States and of a more perfect understanding of their ideals and civilizations. One of his favorite quotations seemed to exemplify his life work "A handful of pine seed will cover mountains with the green majesty of the forest. I too will set my face to the wind and throw my handful of seed on high."

During his active life in China and since his retirement in 1940, he has always been active in following out this ideal. His speeches and writings have been monumental, and no man has ever done more to sell China to his fellow countrymen than Julean Arnold. Even after his retirement he carried on the good work, and was one of the chief founders of the China-America Council of Commerce and Industry.

With his passing, China loses a stalwart champion. After 50 years of service to China and to the United States, he has laid away his shining spear and passed to the land of memory. We shall miss his wise counsel and sage advice; the Chinese will miss this man who always fought for racial equality and equal opportunity for the people of China, whom he loved and honored. His creed was simple; his faith was boundless; his optimism was magnificient. Leigh Hunt might well have written the epitaph of Julean Arnold when he wrote "Write me as one who loves his fellow men."

Julean Arnold is gone, but we who knew him and loved him must carry on the unfinished work he has left for us to do. China needs friends as never before, and we must not, shall not be satisfied until we have completed the basis of his simple philosophy best expressed by the word "Peace on earth; good will to all men."

CHINA CLUB OF SEATTLE.

EXCERPTS FROM CHINA CLUB MINUTE BOOK

"At the suggestion of Mr. Julean H. Arnold, who is commercial attaché for China, a representative meeting was called and held in the New Washington Hotel at noon September 9, 1916."

The minutes go on to read:

"Following a brief statement by Chairman J. E. Chilberg of the purpose for which the meeting was called, he introduced Mr. Arnold, who enlarged upon the necessity of America becoming quite as familiar with China as the Chinese are with America. He spoke of the strategic importance of Seattle with reference to the development of American trade in China, and also as a point from which should emanate complete and liberal information regarding things Chinese.

"He spoke also of the value of the University of Washington, being located as it is in Seattle, which not only furnishes ample facilities for the education of Chinese young men, but should also aid materially in collecting, compiling, and disseminating information regarding the Republic of China.

"Upon the suggestion of Mr. Roy Hadley that an organization should be perfected * * * the following were elected."

Thus the China Club of Seattle came into being on September 9, 1916, and continues today, the oldest organization of its kind in the country.

I turn to the minutes of the China Club, dated January 22, 1925, and find a resolution headed simply:

"JULEAN ARNOLD

"Whereas Julean Arnold, U. C. commercial attache to China, has consistently sought to develop trade between the United States and China on the firm foundation of a better understanding between the people of the two countries; and

"Whereas it has been due to his energy and enthusiasm that China Clubs have been organized in Seattle, San Francisco, Chicago, and New York, to serve as points of contact to carry out these ideals in definite and concrete form; and

"Whereas by lectures and close personal contacts he has given unselfishly of his time and energy to make the people of America better understand our opportunities to develop larger and closer relations with China; and

"Whereas we have the faith that Julean Arnold, through his long and continuous contacts with China and the Chinese, is seeking in every way to correctly interpret China to the people of the United States and the people of the United States to China: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we express our appreciation to Mr. Arnold for the faithful and efficient service he has rendered the commercial interests of America; and be it further

"Resolved, That we especially commend him as representing in China the true and genuine American attitude in our commercial relations with our sister republic; and be it further

"Resolved, That we express the confidence and hope that his invaluable service to us and our country's best interests in China be preserved and extended; and be it

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, United States Minister to China; Hon. Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce; Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State; Julius Klein, Director of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; Frank R. Eldridge, Jr., Chief, Far Eastern Division of Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; to each of our national representatives at Washington; to the China Clubs at San Francisco, Chicago, and New York, and to the Chambers of Commerce of Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, and Los Angeles.

"BOARD OF TRUSTEES,
"CHINA CLUB OF SEATTLE."

Item No. 1 on the agenda for the thirtieth birthday anniversary meeting of the China Club of Seattle to be held in the fall of 1946 reads:

"1. Presentation of award of merit to Julean Arnold, founder of the China Club of Seattle, in recognition of his efforts to promote good will, knowledge, and understanding between the peoples of the Republic of China and the United States of America.

"RUTH A. PRICE."

The New Control System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 31 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The New Control System," from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of July 26, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW CONTROL SYSTEM

Whether the system of price control reestablished by the bill signed by the President can hold the line against inflation only its testing out over an adequate period can determine. There are manifest drawbacks to a system which leaves control and decontrol at the discretion of a Board for whose possible lack of sound judgment the country's business might have to pay a heavy price.

Uncertainty as to price and labor costs, which may well be the result of such a system, could seriously delay or hamper the full production which would be the country's best protection against inflation.

The President was justified in signing the bill, as he was in vetoing the original OPA extension measure. Some of the most glaring faults in the vetoed bill have been corrected. The measure now law was probably the best that could have been secured from Congress. If it does not work, the responsibility falls on those who refused the plain extension of the old controls which the President asked.

More than ever his June 29 veto is seen to have been wise as well as courageous. It brought forth evidence of popular insistence on some form of control which the majority of Congress has had to recognize.

It was the probability that control would be reinstated that had a great part in keeping the general price line steady, although industry and retail vendors are to be credited with having in the main played the game fairly.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, up in the hills of north Louisiana lives a famous man—one A. Hazard Perry who, all during his life, has fought unselfishly to help the underprivileged.

Because he fathered the leper movement and fought the project through to success over overwhelming opposition, being a stalwart of the late honorable champion of the underprivileged people, Huey Pierce Long, he now holds an honor accorded no other living man—a major bridge bearing his name.

Not long ago he was again honored by being the recipient of the now famous book of Perry Burgess, Who Walk Alone.

The following article was carried recently by the press:

LOCAL CITIZEN RECEIVES AUTOGRAPHED COPY OF WHO WALK ALONE

Recently A. H. Perry received an autographed copy from a special edition of Who Walk Alone, inscribed by the author as follows:

"Presented to Mr. A. Hazard Perry in appreciation of his services to the lepers in the Philippines 40 years ago.—Perry Burgess, New York City."

This very interesting book which won first prize in the 1940 national book award is the dramatic story of a leper's rehabilitation, the scene being laid in Culion, where Mr. Perry was located in 1904–05.

In a letter accompanying the volume the author further expressed his appreciation of a rare mimeographed paper recording activities around the leper colony obtained by Mr. Perry during this period. He stated that this valuable data would be preserved under glass and added to the documents on leprosy work at the Gen. Leonard Wood Memorial, of which foundation Mr. Burgess is president.

The Hospital Bill—S. 191—Will Help Every Section of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 26, 1946

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, in the closing hours of the Seventy-ninth Congress, the House has before it for final consideration one of the most important bills of the entire session. It is important because it concerns the health and welfare of the entire Nation. The hospital survey and construction bill, S. 191, now before us has been strongly endorsed by every important hospital, medical, health, and welfare organization in the country. These include the American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association, the Catholic Hospital Association, and the Protestant Hospital Association. It has been strongly endorsed by farm groups, labor groups, and industrialists. No other important bill pertaining to the health and welfare of the people has come before the House with such unanimous endorsement from all groups. This fact alone testifies to the urgency of this legislation more forcibly than the testimony of any individual.

Those who have made a study of the problem tell us that there exists a dangerous shortage of hospital and public health facilities in this country. We have been told that 40 percent of the counties of the Nation with a population in excess of 15,000,000 people are today without any registered hospital. We know that in a great many more hospital facilities are woefully inadequate and obsolete. We have seen how this situation has been reflected in the shortage of doctors. Without hospitals there can be no doctors in the modern practice of medicine. Without health centers public health cannot keep pace with medical science.

This situation, I venture to say, exists to a greater or lesser degree in the districts of every Member of the House. The way is now open for us to bring relief to our communities suffering from lack of hospitals and the care of modern doctors. Without the help provided for in this bill we can expect to see health conditions deteriorate rather than progress.

I wish to point out that the funds authorized under this bill will provide in themselves a relatively small part of the total hospitals and health centers needed. These funds, however, will be productive of far greater results in that they will provide the necessary margin of cost which most communities cannot now raise by their own endeavors.

There are not many proposals which come before the Congress that reach so deep into the hearts of our communities as this proposed aid in the construction of community hospitals and health centers. Let us, therefore, with the closing of this Seventy-ninth Congress go back to our people with the realization that we have brought to them vitally needed aid in obtaining a new hospital through which modern medical care may be brought to all our people.

Needed Legislation To Support the Price of Wool

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER K. GRANGER
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1946

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, in order to meet a very critical situation that exists in the wool industry, I introduced H. R. 6043. This proposed legislation is of vital importance, not only to this industry but to the economy of the country. If this bill is not passed, the opponents of the legislation must take the responsibility for its failure.

I am confident that without this or similar legislation the wool industry will continue to deteriorate to the point where it will vanish as a healthy industry. After a year of careful study by committees from the House and the Senate, in conjunction with the Tariff Commission and the Department of Agriculture it was deemed imperative that something should be done and done immediately. As a result of the hearings, where proponents and opponents alike were given ample opportunity to be heard, this legislation was agreed upon as the best means of meeting the critical situation.

Since this legislation has been reported out of the House Agriculture Committee by a unanimous vote, it has been subjected to sever criticism by a little group of wool dealers and speculators who are determined to protect their own selfish interests and entirely disregard the welfare of the producers of wool. Because of the parliamentary situation in the House, I have been prevented from having this legislation acted upon. If I were recognized for the purpose of making a motion to suspend the rules, this legislation could be passed even though it required a two-thirds majority vote. The wool dealers, unfortunately, seem to have had the full cooperation of the majority and minority leaders of both parties in preventing the passage of this legislation.

If the wool industry is wiped out, which it well might be, the people of this country, and especially the people from the West, ought to know the responsible parties in the Congress of the United States in preventing passage of this bill.

Dr. E. G. Nourse Is Equipped for New Duties as Member of President's Council of Economic Advisers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1946

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, President Truman's appointment of Dr. Edwin G. Nourse and his prompt confirmation by the Senate for membership on the Council of Economic Advisers is good news to those of us who have had an opportunity to know of his outstanding achievements in his profession. As one of his former students at the University of Arkansas, I am happy that he has received this personal recognition and that the Nation is to have the benefit of his splendid ability. Dr. Nourse's grasp of economic problems and his rich experience as teacher, analyst, and writer will be useful in this new assignment. His service with the Brookings Institution has provided special qualifications in the field of research. This, coupled with his training in governmental affairs, has admirably equipped him for the new duties defined by law as "analyzing and interpreting economic developments, formulating and recommending national economic policy to promote employment, production, and purchasing power under the free competitive enterprise."

Dr. Nourse will take up these duties with the full confidence of all who know him.

The Pacific Northwest Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, natural resource development by private initiative alone or by private initiative with governmental help is most important to the Nation.

Because of the importance of this subject as it relates to the Columbia River region, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement I have prepared entitled "The Pacific Northwest Future."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered, to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Today, the State of Washington stands upon the threshold of an era of great opportunity. In many respects, Washington State might be regarded as one of the most favored in the Union. The resources of Washington are vast; its geographical position as a trading center for the Nation and for the world is unequaled.

But there are limits to the degree of development we of Washington State can attain alone. In order to achieve the full prosperity which awaits us, we must learn to think of ourselves as a part of a region—a region of five States sharing in the abundance of natural riches which are the heritage of the Pacific Northwest.

The economy of each of the five States in this region is affected to a considerable degree by the fact that through the heart of the region flows one of the Nation's greatest physical assets—the Columbia River.

The key to full development of our region lies in full development of the Columbia River. The sooner we realize the value of putting all of the powers of this mighty servant to work, the sooner we will accomplish strong regional prosperity. We can continue with the piecemeal development we have known in the past and put that happy day off many years, or we can have orderly, well-timed development and begin to reap rewards immediately.

I submit to you, however, that we will never achieve the fullness of this region's potentialities while our fate is directed from a distance of 3,000 miles. Nor will we know what great accomplishments we can achieve so long as the separate States in the region are pitted one against the other in unequal and unrealistic competition, bred of petty jealousies over what we are told are States' rights. As a Senator for the State of Washington, I am quite as conscious of and as jealous of real States' rights as anyone. But I refuse to be misled into believing that any one of the States of this region can take its little piece of the Columbia Valley River system and make the most of its potential value. It is true that we have made substantial gains in the development of the Northwest and under any conditions we would probably continue to make gains. But without a conscious effort toward achieving a unified program with regional direction, how can we hope to progress past the point of being a colonial satellite for the rest of the Nation?

As I see it, the formula for arriving at such a unified program can be found in the Valley Authority concept. I do not mean to imply for a moment that the Tennessee Valley Authority pattern is the perfect answer. I think that even the officials of TVA would be the first to admit that there may be elements of their program which might be improved upon. This is true of any of the administrative branches of any government, particularly under a democratic system. The point is, from experience gained in the Tennessee Valley, there has evolved a better and more efficient pathway toward solving regional problems or resource development and conservation than has previously existed.

Let us never forget that our great democracy has been experimental from the beginning. Only through a system of trial and error and a willingness to make changes when they appeared necessary have we been able to make this the strongest and most prosperous Nation in the world. It was for this very reason that all of the numerous developmental agencies operating within the Executive Branch of our Government were created. At the time of their creation, there was no guarantee that they would work perfectly. Many of these agencies were set up to accomplish certain ends under a relatively simple economy. Today our problems are far more complex. Our population is greater and we have vastly more settled territory. Meanwhile, the old machinery creaks along attempting to carry burdens of administration which have long since grown too large and unwieldly for centralized direction.

The TVA pattern offers a method for streamlining the functions of the Federal resources development and conservation agencies and giving them an efficiency that is commensurate with the twentieth century way of doing things.

In the Columbia Valley Authority bill I have sought to introduce the basic TVA pattern, with such modifications as appeared necessary to fit the needs of the Columbia Basin area. It is a bill designed to strengthen the economy of the region in which we live; to provide for a more direct and efficient functioning of those phases of developmental work which historically fall within the province of the Federal Government. It provides a means for integrating and coordinating those activities at the regional level. It does not represent a system designed to dominate individual enterprise but one intended to cooperate with free enterprise in the interest of a strong and permanent prosperity for all of the people.

Critics of this bill argue that there is no need for an authority in the Columbia River region. They contend that existing agencies are doing a good job—therefore, why change? With the latter point I do not disagree entirely. I think that the agencies that are now operating in the region are doing as good a job as is possible for them to do under existing conditions. They are not, however, producing the results that we have every right to expect. Nor can they so long as they operate completely independent of one another without any coordinating influence whatsoever.

What does the CVA propose to do? The preamble to the bill reads:

"To establish a Columbia Valley Authority, to provide for integrated water control and resources development on the Columbia River, its tributaries, and the surrounding region in the interest of the control and prevention of floods, the irrigation and reclamation of lands, the promotion of navigation, the providing of employment, the strengthening of the national defense, and for other purposes."

The key to the Valley Authority concept lies in the word "integrated." Our present approach to water control and resources development is on a piecemeal basis. There is no single agency having full responsibility for carrying out this work to its most beneficial conclusion, and there is no single agency which has sufficient authority to accept such responsibility. Instead, we have several separate agencies, each depending upon several committees of Congress for appropriations, each going to some separate department head for its authority to carry out projects approved by Congress. The effect of this is to produce confusion, overlapping in programing and planning, and, unhappily, often needless dissension among the agencies involved.

The Valley Authority concept, then, in seeking to correct these obvious inefficiencies, is neither dictatorial nor paternalistic. It is simply a matter of good management.

Fundamentally, all men aspire to similar goals. These do not necessarily include riches and power but they do include security, an opportunity to earn a living and a natural desire for an increasingly better standard of living. Time was when a man would make his way into the wilderness and carve out a passable living—perhaps even make a fortune for himself and his family. The national economy had little effect upon his way of life. That day is now past—the frontiers have been explored from coast to coast.

This does not mean that opportunity is dead—far from it. But it does mean that we are becoming increasingly dependent upon a balanced national economy for true national prosperity and equality of opportunity. We cannot find that balance while certain sections of the country are being drained of their resources for the enrichment of other sections. For all too long this has been the case with the Pacific Northwest.

We have now reached a point of growth in population where opportunities must be opened up for the people of the Pacific Northwest and for those who are coming there in increasing numbers.

Although there are a number of public works projects proposed and some approved for construction here in the northwest, they have not been recommended on the basis of any such program nor does the timing of their construction necessarily take into account the urgency of providing immediate employment when and where it is needed. There is no agency with the authority to set up such a program or to see that it is properly expedited. It is for that reason that the matter of providing of employment is specifically mentioned in the preamble to the CVA bill.

Certain selfish interests lobby for this project or that project, or lobby against all such projects without regard for the immediate and urgent needs of the region. It is not good management on the part of government to permit such pork barrel tactics to work to the detriment of any region and it is an admitted purpose of the Columbia Valley Authority to correct such abuses.

There are a number of stock criticisms which are repeatedly leveled at the CVA proposal. It seems to me that one of the best ways of demonstrating what a Columbia Valley Authority can mean for this region and for the State of Washington would be to show in just a few instances how wrong and how malicious these criticisms are.

It is often charged that CVA would be a type of dictatorship—even more bitter epithets are used, but this will do for the sake of discussion. The Columbia Valley Authority bill specifically preserves for the people any and all legal rights that they now possess; it encroaches upon no man's freedom to do any of the things which he is now legally permitted to do under any local, State, or Federal laws. Nowhere in the CVA bill can there be found anything granting the corporation powers of regulation not already granted to existing Federal agencies, and I would like to remind you again that the valley authority is an instrument of government concerned only with Federal functions.

Another often-heard charge is that the people of the region would have no control in the adoption of plans, construction or management of projects. If anything, the people of the region would have more—far more—voice in the matter of projects than they have now. Few of us indeed have either the time or the money to take each of our protests to Washington for hearing. The whole valley authority concept is to bring those determinations back to the people on the land—back to the grass roots. No one who felt that his rights were being infringed, who felt that in some way he was being treated unfairly, would have to swallow his bitterness for want of a hearing. The final court of appeal in any matters of controversy would be the same as it is now—the President and the Congress of the United States.

Now, as to the matter of taking over existing agencies: Nowhere in the bill will there be found any such intention by word or by implication. As to the continued operation of the existing agencies in the region, there is no reason why these agencies should not continue working as they have in the past, on a cooperative basis with the authority. The reason for the fact that the bill makes the use of such agencies permissive is that it places responsibility for the carrying out of their work directly in the region. If the authority were required, under the terms of the act, to employ these agencies, the confused situation which exists at present would be in no way improved.

We are told that the Army engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation are now hard at work on plans for the development of the Pacific Northwest. What assurance do we have that the reports of these two entirely separate agencies will come anywhere near being in agreement? What assurance do we have that the best plan for the region will be accepted when the decision must be made from 3,000 miles away by people who are not necessarily in a good position to judge? As a matter of fact, what assurance do we have that either of the plans will be accepted or that anything will be done with either of them? The famous "308 report" of the Army engineers has been pigeonholed for many years and, so far as I know, no affirmative action has been taken on it as a plan.

It would be the purpose of the Columbia Valley Authority to perfect a single over-all plan for the region and then see to it that the plan is carried out in an orderly and constructive fashion.

Just a few words on the appointment and powers of the directors of the Columbia Valley Authority. These matters seem to have been getting considerable attention from the opposition. The three directors of the corporation are to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. There is nothing new about this—the same method of appointment and confirmation has been used in the case of every Federal official whose position falls within the President's power of appointment.

It has been pointed out that many determinations under the authority act would be left to the judgment of the board. I fail to see why anyone should raise his eyebrows in horror over this. Would any businessman in his right mind employ a manager whose judgment he felt would be unsound?

The valley authority idea is a method for putting the functions of the Federal Government on a businesslike basis. The three men appointed to the Board would be employed as managers, and the Government, just like business, would have the same remedy available for any of the managers determined to be incompetent or their judgments not in the best interests of their enterprise.

The strategy of those who are opposed to the Columbia Valley Authority legislation is to take details of the bill in which they pretend to see certain horrifying elements, magnify those elements out of all proportion, and then shout "socialism" and "dictatorship." Actually, there is nothing socialistic or dictatorial, and certainly nothing un-American, about an attempt to improve upon existing methods of Federal administration. Certainly there has been enough crying out against alleged governmental inefficiencies; the wasting of taxpayers' money through costly errors and unsound practices that when a cure for these ailments is proposed it should be deserving of an objective study of the principles upon which the cure is based.

I urge that everyone obtain copies of the CVA bill and study it carefully before making final decision to be for or against the legislation. If there are elements of the bill which are found objectionable, I want to hear about them. If there are sections which should be strengthened, I want to hear about those. There is not a single portion of the bill that cannot be amended and, since it is intended for the benefit of all, any constructive suggestions that are made should and will receive the fullest consideration.

All citizens want to see the State of Washington grow and prosper. I doubt whether anyone would be unwilling to accept a better way of doing things. The CVA proposal suggests a better method of achieving results in a soundly managed and businesslike way.

Our Common Problems and Our Common Duty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address before the Fifty-seventh Annual Convention of the Michigan State Federation of Labor on July 22, 1946, delivered by the Most Reverend Francis J. Haas, bishop of Grand Rapids.

Bishop Haas is well known as a profound student of social problems, and has contributed a great deal as an author and a teacher to our present knowledge on labor relations, social security, and on economic sociology in general.

President Roosevelt recognized his outstanding ability and courage when he appointed him Chairman of the Fair Employment Practices Committee. Before that Bishop Haas served on many other governmental commissions and boards, notably the National Resources Planning Board's Committee on Social Security, which committee presented the most comprehensive study of social security that has ever been made.

Bishop Haas in his address to the Michigan Federation of Labor brings all his knowledge and experience to bear upon what he has well entitled "Our Common Problems and our Common Duty."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

You have come together in convention as an important State federation of the great American Federation of Labor. Like your sister State federations—that of Illinois, of Ohio, of Wisconsin, and of all the rest each in its own State jurisdiction—you unite all the organized workers affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in this the State of Michigan. As representatives of your national and Federal unions you meet in State federations to take common counsel and to make common plans. You, together with the various State federations have been held together as one, have moved as one, and have acted as one, through your national and Federal unions under the American Federation of Labor since 1881.

I will not delay on the magnificent achievements of the American Federation of Labor in these 65 years, how it has advanced the welfare of working men and women, and no less important, the welfare of all the rest of us, even of those managements who opposed its honorable and heroic march and even now are blindly opposing it. I take it that you have come not to listen to eulogies of past accomplishments but rather to make intelligent plans, and to carry them back to the constituent bodies you represent at home. On this assumption I shall proceed, and I hope that I may be able to contribute even in a small way to the high purpose that has called you here.

Two great types of decisions demand your attention at this convention. The one has to do with what should be done in the present crisis of run-away inflation. The other has to do with deeper questions of policy, which while they are perhaps less of an emergency nature, cannot and may not be put off for later consideration. Let me say something first about mounting living costs, and then about the larger problems that you and all of us have to face and work out together.

I

As you know, price ceilings on living costs were removed on July 1 because Congress refused to continue any kind of an effective OPA. What has happened since July 1 everyone knows. Bread has jumped to 14 cents, round steak to 69 cents, pork chops to 62 cents, butter to 80 cents, milk to 18 cents, eggs to 57 cents, all considerably above July 1 prices. Rent, clothing, household furnishings, and the rest are following the same sharp upward rise. In fact the rise is so rapid that Eureau of Labor Statistics indexes cannot be compiled fast enough to have any meaning, and it would be a waste of time to quote them. The four great polls—the Gallup poll and the others—have shown that between 60 and 80 percent of the people want price ceilings retained, and yet the majority of the Congress, apparently indifferent to the suffering of the great mass of the people, has forced the death of CPA.

One need be no prophet to see what will happen. Mounting living costs will be met with mounting demands for higher wages, and if necessary with strikes. Higher wages will in turn be used as an argument for still higher prices and thus on and on up to the explosion point. Even if the result of the interplay of higher prices and higher wages brings on a period of temporary prosperity, we may not forget the terrible lessons of the synthetic prosperity resulting from the interplay of higher prices and higher wages in the middle 1920's, and the frightful collapse it brought on in 1929. Nor may we forget that the collapse of 1929 dragged itself on for over 10 years in tragedy, suffering, and starvation, and that but for the false boom created by the late war we have not yet recovered from that collapse. Indeed the picture is not a pleasant one to contemplate.

President Green, of the American Federation of Labor in the July issue of the A. F. of L. monthly survey, calls on workers to take no ill-advised action in the present emergency. He asserts: "The sudden ending of OPA brings a responsibility to business and to labor for carrying on policies that will safeguard the interests of all. * * * Our major need is increased volume of production. * * * For their own safety the wage earners of the United States should exercise self-discipline and good judgment, and refrain from taking ill-considered and unwise action pending action by Congress.

Self-discipline, good judgment, increased production, and avoidance of ill-considered action—all these virtues are necessary, and I hail the great president of the American Federation of Labor for pleading with workers to exercise these virtues. As a patriotic American citizen and the head of a mighty federation, President Green could do no different than he did. But with him I urge the necessity of maintaining price ceilings by law for a limited period. And I insist that for the good of us all the original OPA be reinstated without delay, and that the Congress appropriate sufficient funds to enable that agency to enforce its rulings.

I use the expression "for the good of us all," for I am not one that holds that runaway prices injure workers alone. What hurts workers wrongfully is indeed an injustice to them, and that by itself is sufficient reason to remove the injustice.

But there is another phase of the matter that should not be overlooked. What injures one class in the population, injures the whole population. Workers cannot be made to suffer without employers also being made to suffer, and without the whole public being made to suffer. In the same way workers cannot be benefited without employers also being benefited, and without the whole public being benefited. Our economy is one, and wages and prices are so interrelated that if you wound one part of the economy you send pain and distress throughout the whole organism, in the same way that if you remove suffering in any part where there is suffering, you remove suffering from the whole body and even give it a sense of well-being and prosperity.

But some may object, why establish price ceilings by law, even for a limited period? The answer is that there is no other way to do it. Employers' associations cannot do it, even though some employers and some employers' associations since July 1 have in a true spirit of patriotism, responded to President Truman's call for voluntary action on their part. Labor unions cannot do it, for they have little to say about prices, except through the crude and usually ineffective device of buyers' strikes. On the other hand, the public can do it, and the public should do it, by demanding that their public representatives in Congress enact an effective OPA for the present period of transition, and appropriate sufficient funds for adequate enforcement.

Please do not think that I speak as a single Catholic bishop on the use of government as an emergency instrument. The highest authority in my church, Pope Leo XIII, laid down the famous principle for state intervention, which is applicable not only to such matters as price control but to everything affecting the public interest and the interest of particular classes within the Nation. This is what he says in the Encyclical On the Condition of Workers issued on May 15, 1891: "If, therefore, any injury has been done to or threatens either the common good or the interests of individual groups, which injury cannot in any other way be repaired or prevented, it is necessary for public authority to intervene" (par. 52). Thus when anything less than Government action cannot protect either the public interest or that of a whole section of the people, Government should step in.

This is the Catholic position on Government intervention. I venture to say it is also the position of every reasonable man and woman concerned not only for the welfare of working people but also for the welfare and prosperity of our entire country. By virtue of it Congress has the plain duty to restore at once the legal controls necessary to prevent price exploitation and to appropriate sufficient public moneys to effect this result.

I turn now to a consideration of two objectives which all of us, as a people, as organizations, and as individuals should arouse ourselves to achieve.

The first objective is the wider and wider recognition of the fact that all our economic activities—employment, wages, trade, finance, and all the others—are subject to the law of God and to the law of conscience. By conscience I do not mean merely that something within a man which makes him feel, as he says, "like a dog" when he does what is wrong, or either that something within him that makes his feel like a man when he does what is right. By conscience I mean that judgment within a person that tells him that he is accountable to his Creator for what he does—good or evil—and that divine sanctions of reward or punishment await him when he presents the record of his life to the Eternal Judge.

It need hardly be said that there is no such thing as a group conscience, a community conscience, a trade-association conscience, or a trade-union conscience. Conscience is an individual possession, possessed only by the individual. Each person has a conscience—every employer, every trade unionist, every banker, every merchant, and every one of us—and each one of us is answerable to God for everything he does inside or outside of his daily work, no matter what that work may be. It is the sheerest gangsterism to hold, as it is all too commonly held, that wages, prices, and profits are a world by themselves, and that a man can do anything he wants within that world as long as he does not get caught. Indeed he is not free to do as he likes. The Creator has placed a law in his heart and will hold him to it.

The employer is bound in conscience to maintain proper wages, hours, and working conditions in his plant. If, for example, unfair competition will not permit him to improve working conditions that he knows should be improved, he is obliged out of consideration both to his employees and to the public, to work through his trade association or even to form a new trade association to raise the level of competition. Likewise the trade unionist is bound in conscience to do his part to correct whatever may need correcting in his union, and to cast his vote for one union policy in preference to another on the basis of what is just and right. To be sure he is obliged in conscience to turn out a fair day's work and to live up to the union contract as long as it remains in effect. There is no need to go on. The same duty in conscience holds for the merchant in setting prices, for the foreman, clerk, salesman, in short for everyone having to do with production, finance, and trade.

You may say that all this is too much on the idealistic side. But let us make no mistake about it. Until there is much more acknowledgment than now obtains, that the entire business of wages, prices, and profits are subject to the moral law, and until there is much wider acceptance than now exists of personal responsibility by the individual employer, individual worker, and each of us as individuals, we must resign ourselves to even greater labor exploitation, price gouging, union busting, and union racketeering than now prevail. In all truth all our economic dealings are subject to God's law of justice and right, and every individual is accountable in conscience to help make that law a living reality, both for his own well-being and for that of his fellow citizen.

The second great objective toward which all of us and each of us should work is a more equitable distribution of income and wealth than now prevails. I am certainly not advocating any Socialist philosophy of equal division of money income or money wealth. There is a vast difference between "equal" distribution and "fair" distribution of income and holdings. And anyone who is acquainted with the figures showing the apportionment of the national income and national wealth among the various income classes from year to year, can hardly assert that we have anything even approaching a fair distribution of income or property. Pope Pius XI in his Encyclical 40 Years After declares that Christian-minded men cannot bring themselves to believe "that so enormous and an inequitable distribution of this world's goods truly conforms to the designs of the all-wise Creator" (par. 5).

Let us look at the picture of actual conditions at present. In June 1946 the Federal Reserve Board, on the basis of a survey made for it by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, reports that in the year 1945 the top 10 percent of spending units, that is families, in the United States received 29 percent of all the money income of the country, and held 53 percent of gross savings, and 60 percent of all liquid assets. On the other hand, the bottom 50 percent of the families of the country received 22 percent of the money income, and held 3 percent of the gross savings, and 3 percent of the liquid assets. The same report shows that the average holdings per family of the top 10 percent was $10,500; of the next 20 percent, $2,350; of the next 30 percent, $700; and of the bottom 40 percent, $40. Mark well, 40 percent of all families have on an average $40 per family in savings. And the report adds that the total savings of the 40 percent of all the families constitues only 1 percent of all the savings in the country.

Not for a moment do I suggest that this unhealthy condition be cured by the simple expedient of "dividing up." I counsel nothing that would make matters worse than they are. On the other hand, I hold we should lose no time in getting established at the earliest possible date the payment of the annual living wage. So far as the justice of the annual wage is concerned, there can be no question. The burden of proof for uninterrupted income does not rest upon workers. It is for the opponents of this right to prove—which, of course, they cannot—that the worker does not have this right. Indeed the right of every able-bodied worker to a guaranteed income forms a first charge on industry, to be met before that of all other claimants.

Fortunately we have made a little progress in the direction of the annual living wage. It is necessary to recall only such instruments as unemployment insurance under the Social Security Act, the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act in favor of employers who guarantee year-round employment, and the annual wage plans voluntarily installed by such firms as George A. Hormel & Co., Nunn-Bush Co., and for some of its operations by Sears, Roebuck & Co.

But when all is said and done the major responsibility for the introduction and operation of an annual wage system throughout American industry rests with workers themselves. And I cannot see how this result can be accomplished—making full allowance for the cooperation of enlightened managements—except through wider and wider extension of workers' organizations. This is the challenge facing you.

Despite exaggerated notions of union strength created by newspaper headlines, magazine articles, and radio commentators, you know what the facts are regarding union membership in the United States. While the Monthly Labor Review of April 1946 of the United States Department of Labor estimates that 13,800,000 workers out of the total employed labor force of 56,000,000 are covered by union agreements, you know that the figure of 13,800,000 includes an undetermined number of workers who are not union members at all. As you are well aware, "exclusive bargaining rights" requires an employer who is operating under less than a union-shop agreement to grant identical wages and hours to union and nonunion employees alike. Accordingly the figure of 13,800,000 is higher than the figure of actual union membership in the United States.

There is, too, as you are fully aware, an important difference between bona fide union members and "paper" union members. Taking these and other facts into account, and adding together all the A. F. of L., CIO, and brotherhood lists, I very much doubt whether, in view of the 56,000,000 now employed, it can be said that much more than between one-fifth and one-fourth of the workers in the United States are actual union members.

I have cited these figures for but one purpose. It is to show that there is still a distance to travel. I sincerely hope that this convention will give you renewed strength and wisdom to increase your membership. And I pray that the day is not far off when you will be represented in national economic councils, in which, with the assistance of government, you will participate in full equality with management, to work out with management and government, a free and democratic economy.

Through the enactment of the full-employment law, weak though it is, our country has taken the first step on the road to national planning. Workers as well as employers should lay aside whatever prejudices they may have toward national planning, and welcome it for what it can be developed into—the substitution of order and intelligence for chance and guess.

Order indeed we want, order that will achieve full production, order that will be democratically upheld, order that will safeguard our rights as freemen, to work and live under God as freemen. In this great enterprise organized labor, sitting as an equal with organized management, and with the Government as chairman, has an essential role to play.

This may be a vision of the future, but God grant that its accomplishment be not long delayed. May He guide you here in this convention to do your part to help make it an early reality.

The Price Trend and Reasons for It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the

Cumberland News, Cumberland, Md., July 31, 1946:

THE PRICE TREND AND REASONS FOR IT

It is worth noting that the first action taken by the revived OPA was to raise the price ceiling on coal, shoes, building materials, and a stream of other items, including men's clothing and other male wearables, announced yesterday. And the signficant feature of these increases in basic cost-of-living commodities is that they cannot be attributed to what Walter Reuther, president of the CIO United Auto Workers, calls the legalized inflation of the new price-control law or to the lapse of controls during the first 3 weeks of July. These were increases that were in the mill at the time OPA was suspended, increases made necessary by basic causes that existed prior to July 1.

That proves the point, stressed repeatedly, that prices would have to go up whether OPA was or was not restored. Before OPA was permitted to lapse, prices were edging up slowly but surely. That trend would have continued until the wage line, broken by Reuther and his colleagues, and the price line, which reflects the wage costs of production, were again in balance and until the inflationary fiscal policies of the Government—deficit spending, an unbalanced budget, and increases in the supply of currency and credit in circulation—were checked.

It will be the strategy of the administration now to blame Congress for any price increases in the future, because OPA was not extended without change. But price increases had to come, and the responsibility rests squarely on Mr. Truman's wrong guess that this year would produce a period of unemployment and deflation, as was pointed out in this column yesterday.

The President's misgivings stem from the belief that the new law does not give OPA enough power to hold down prices. Congress, meanwhile, is apprehensive that, despite all its hedges, OPA may still have so much power that thick-headed Administrators will issue rules that slow down production, and thereby defeat the only hope of building supply to equal demand.

And Mr. Truman's threat to call Congress back into extra session, if this OPA law does not stop inflation, can be taken as just so much political talk. The President well knows that should he attempt to place Congress on the spot in the hope of covering up his shortcomings, and give Congress another crack at the OPA, the tables might be turned. The President increased the irritation of many Congressmen and Senators when he added to that the threat to have enacted such fiscal and monetary legislation as needed "to save us from the threat of economic disaster."

The majority of Congress will not consider for any foreseeable period the higher taxation which the President implied, and we have no doubt Mr. Truman is well aware of the fact.

Our Government is spending about $40,000,000,000 this fiscal year—roughly, five times the Budget before the war. It is our contention that a dollar not spent is just as effective, in curbing inflation, as a dollar taken by taxes. So before any dollars are added to our tax bill it will be in order to inquire, first, if an equal number of dollars cannot be saved in our spending. It probably is because of this thought that resentment has been intensified by the fact that Mr. Truman, while demanding economy, Budget-balancing, and other anti-inflationary assistance from Congress, has not checked inflationary fiscal policies. He sponsors and adds constantly to a legislative program that is certain to increase the normal deficit unless the Government takes over all private capital and property and puts all citizens on a common income level, and even in such circumstances, which no Congress in sight is likely to help bring about, all citizens would be obliged to work, and the New Deal concepts of social security, which President Truman is now seeking to expand, would have to be abandoned.

So Congress, which already was restive under the growing criticism of the White House, and already felt that much of it is inconsistent and unfair, is moving toward adjournment in a mood of growing hostility toward the President. That was certain to be the result of Mr. Truman's attempt to make it appear that Congress was to blame if high prices and inflation resulted from the OPA bill he accepted as better than the one he vetoed.

Henry David Harlan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, when Henry David Harlan died in Maryland he left behind him a record of useful and conscientious service which has probably never been surpassed in Maryland. The supreme bench of Baltimore city held a memorial exercise, and I was chairman of the committee having it in charge. At the request of some of the friends of Judge Harlan I ask unanimous consent that the address which I delivered on that occasion be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE, CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE APPOINTED BY SUPREME BENCH OF BALTIMORE CITY TO PRESENT A MEMORIAL

Mr. RADCLIFFE. May it please the court.

Henry David Harlan, in whose memory we are meeting today, was one of the most conscientious, one of the most useful, and one of the best beloved men who have ever lived in Maryland. His death on September 6, 1943, at the age of 84, brought to an end a long, useful, and distinguished career.

When plans were under consideration for this memorial meeting, it quickly became obvious that the activities of Henry David Harlan had covered so many fields that it would not be feasible to stress in one meeting all of the many lines of endeavors in which he rendered invaluable service. Out of his many activities the committee has selected several which seemed to be outstanding. Each one of my associates on this committee will present a memorial record of one of them. I will, to this minute, make brief reference to some of his special activities with a short statement designed to illustrate the rare and happy combination of characteristics which made Judge Harlan one of the most versatile and efficient men in the history of Maryland.

He was born on a farm near Churchville, Harford County, Md., October 23, 1858, the son of Margaret Rebecca and Dr. David Harlan, a surgeon in the United States Navy. On December 19, 1889, he married Miss Helen Allemus, who with their four children, are with us today.

He graduated in 1878 with highest honors from St. Johns College, from which institution he received the degree of master of arts in 1884, and doctor of laws in 1894. He was given an honorary doctorate of laws in June 1935, by St. Laurence University. His record for scholarship at the University of Maryland, where he received the degree of bachelor of laws in 1881, has never been surpassed in that institution. He was admitted to the bar in 1881, sharing law offices with the late James P. Gorter, later chief judge of the supreme bench of Baltimore, and Henry Arthur Stump, who also became a member of the supreme bench.

Upon appointment by the late Gov. Elihu Jackson, he became chief judge of the supreme bench of Baltimore City on October 22, 1888, at the earliest age possible; that is, 1 day before his thirtieth birthday. No one else has ever reached the supreme bench of Baltimore City at such an early age. He presided as chief judge until December 31, 1913, when he became a director and general counsel, and later a vice president of the Fidelity Trust Co. of Baltimore.

From the beginning of Judge Harlan's career on the bench he acted fully on the assumption that his primary duty was that of judge, and he permitted nothing to interfere with the discharge of his judicial duties in a painstaking, industrious, impartial, and highly successful manner. His record as judge was in strict adherence to the finest traditions of the bench. He looked the ideal judge. He exemplified him.

He found countless opportunities, however, to show his keen interest in city, State, and national affairs. Throughout the years he was able to accomplish much along nonjudicial lines for the great and lasting benefit of the city of Baltimore and of the State of Maryland. His course along every line of action was marked always by unerring sense of fitness and of perfect propriety—always a judge in the truest sense of the word—always a helpful, constructive, and useful citizen.

So versatile was Judge Harlan in his interests and so varied in his activities that it is difficult to realize the full range of his pursuits. I have referred to some of them. I will mention several more. His work as a member of the courthouse commission which supervised the construction of the building where these memorial exercises are being held was a very valuable factor in its successful erection. Much of the credit is due Judge Harlan that this courthouse was constructed on commodious and beautiful lines, and yet at a cost less than the amount contemplated and authorized.

Only a short time before his death he prepared, with his usual care and accuracy, a series of biographical sketches of distinguished lawyers who are referred to in the panels of this courthouse. These sketches served as a basis of an address delivered at the Maryland Historical Society, and later were printed in the magazine of that society.

For years he was a member of the Public Improvement Commission of Baltimore City and also of the charter commission of that city. With painstaking, meticulous care, and foresight he studied the ever-changing needs of Baltimore City. His contributions to the success of those commissions are invaluable.

He was appointed a trustee of the Johns Hopkins Hospital in 1895 and served as chairman of that board from 1903 to 1941. He was trustee of the Johns Hopkins University from 1904 until his death. During those many years the inestimable value of his participation in the molding of policies, and in the guidance of the affairs of the Johns Hopkins Hospital, and, to a very considerable extent, of the Johns Hopkins University also insured soundness and wise continuity of policy.

He was doubtless the most prominent layman in the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland and was a member of its standing committee from 1912 to his death. For a long time he was director in the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. Only reasons completely beyond his control ever prevented him from attending in Milwaukee the meetings of the board of directors of that insurance company. He gave a forcible and impressive illustration of how a director should perform the important duties of such an office.

His record as a teacher and officer of the University of Maryland Law School was a very long and successful one. For instance, from 1883 to 1900 he was professor of domestic relations. He was professor of constitutional law from 1900 to 1913. From 1883 to 1910 he was treasurer of the University of Maryland Law School, its dean from 1910 to 1932, and dean emeritus until his death.

With the passing of years Judge Harlan's interest in affairs of life never flagged. On the contrary, it quickened and widened in scope. Let me refer to two incidents characteristic of him. Both of these occurred within a year of his death. As president of the Maryland Historical Society, I had asked Judge Harlan to become a member of one of the committees of that society. He accepted with alacrity, and promptly took up his duties as an official of that organization with keen interest and enthusiasm.

About the same time I had the opportunity, which comes to a United States Senator once in several years, to recommend someone to inspect the mint of the United States Treasury at Philadelphia. Judge Harlan, upon my request, was appointed for such a mission. Again he accepted readily. He spent several days in Philadelphia busily engaged in inspection. I am confident that no one else who inspected that mint took a keener interest in his task, was more diligent in his efforts, or learned as much in so short a time. Again and again, after his return, I had the pleasure of listening to his accounts of what he had seen at the Philadelphia Mint. His observations on that subject embodied many constructive suggestions.

It is significant that the two incidents to which I have just referred occurred after Judge Harlan had lived a long life of constant activity during which he had devoted himself most conscientiously and vigorously to the performance of duties, exacting in nature and of far-reaching importance. Yet he still had the desire and the energy at the age of 83 to take up important new duties, and to handle them with his accustomed resourcefulness, energy, and ability.

And so it was that the passing of the years brought to Judge Harlan no lessening in his zest for life, or in his eagerness to find out new ways of being useful, of undergoing new experiences, of learning new things, and of acquiring new qualifications that he might add to his unusually large repertoire of useful roles.

Throughout a busy life his position brought him constantly before the public. His life and career subjected him to what Woodrow Wilson once referred to as "pitiless publicity." Yet this publicity never disclosed a single instance where he had failed to avail himself of an opportunity to render useful services or to display the highest type of citizenship.

It is characteristic of his versatility that the freshness and buoyancy of his ever-continuing enthusiasm should have prompted him to take and retain an active interest in athletic sports. It is not at all surprising that his eightieth birthday found him still ready for a swim or a game of golf.

Long before I was a student of law at the University of Maryland, I had the opportunity of knowing him. For over 50 years it was my privilege and pleasure to be in close contact with him, and memories of our warm friendship throughout all of those years, I will always treasure very dearly.

In any day and in any generation the career of Judge Harlan would have been inspirational. Conditions of today make the example which he set so admirably of special constructive value to us. Let me, again, illustrate.

The urgent need for postwar planning is naturally always with us. So far we know little concretely of what we are going to do and less as to how that little is to be done. Of this however, we can be sure—we will never do our job right if we disregard the teachings of experience. We will have some entirely new problems, and some new aspects of old problems, but the most of the questions which will come up for determination will, in their final essence, be as old as the proverbial hills. The teachings of history will be indispensable as we attempt to work out postwar arrangements.

Judge Harlan never sacrified justice for expediency. He met new conditions with an open receptive mind, but he never temporized with basic convictions, nor wavered when it was necessary to stand firm. The handling of our postwar problems will bring incessant and ever-mounting pressure upon us to cut loose recklessly from old moorings and to cruise in untried waters. The wisdom of the ancients and sound lessons which experience teaches, may often unfortunately be derided and discarded. Judge Harlan's completeness of poise was unfailing, his keen sense of true proportions and of well-balanced relative values was faultless. Such qualities will be indispensable to us whenever we try to readjust ourselves to postwar conditions. His teachings, his example, we should keep in mind as trusty guides to us as we attempt to thread through difficult paths during the trying days just ahead of us.

The Psalmist says, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace." Of no other man who has lived for generations in Maryland, can it be said that this language conveyed a more appropriate description. We realize that perfection is always to be sought, but is never to be fully attained. The invariable lack of enough of suitable opportunities and of the never yet obviated existence of inadequacies in human nature will always probably be obstacles in the way of the attainment to the full of perfection. The Psalmist in his sagacity realized that fact. He knew, however, that a few men and women attain such an extraordinarily high degree of development, that it is appropriate to ascribe to them the term perfection. Whatever may be the technical or metaphysical obstacles to reaching perfection, certainly we are all fully in accord with the statement that of no man who has lived in Maryland for many years can it be said the term perfect is more suitable or appropriate than it is of Henry David Harlan.

The Psalmist concludes, "The end of that man is peace." To our sorrow we must realize that language of termination is necessary in describing the earthly career of Henry David Harlan. He died, universally respected, and beloved by everyone with whom he came in contact. Most assuredly it is true that none knew thee but to love thee, none named thee but to praise.

Although Judge Harlan will no longer be with us in personal contact and association, who will say that the end of his activities has been reached? His work for the bench, for the bar, the church, universities, and hospitals, for private business interests, and in many other lines of endeavor has created an enduring foundation upon which will rest much of the worth-while activities of coming generation in this community. His example will always be before our eyes as a gleaming goal. He lived fully and he lived wisely. Much of what he has done will be a continuing factor in the lives of the people of Baltimore and of the State of Maryland. In no small sense is it true that the stuff of his thoughts has become an integral part of the stuff of the thoughts of the people of Baltimore.

Someone once said that a certain type of old age might be typified by "an old man sitting in his chimney corner and droning with his cane to the dreary decadence of a fading memory." Certainly no one observing even the slightest degree of accuracy could attribute such a type of old age to Henry David Harlan. The older he lived the sounder was his judgment, the more eager was his outlook upon life and the more insistent was his desire and attempt to play an active and vigorous role.

Impressive dignity and genial informality of manner found in him rare and happy combination. His friendly and warm-hearted nature, his faultless good taste and unfailing sense of propriety, his remarkable sense of balance, his keen enthusiastic and constructive interest in life, his abounding energy and his many-sided abilities were among the qualities that fitted Henry David Harlan to lead one of the most useful lives which Maryland has ever known. It was said of Abou ben Adhem that his crowning glory was the fact that he loved his fellow men. Most assuredly that can be said also of Henry David Harlan. It can be added truthfully that in loving them, he also served them well. During all the days of his life he sought zealously to do his duty at all times, and he never failed to succeed in that quest. Most assuredly it can be said of him that his heart was always eager, his hand ready for the work.

I move that this minute be accepted by this court and spread upon its records.

The minute was adopted.

Unbalanced Budget—United States May Go Farther Into Red in Fiscal 1947 Than Any Peace Year—Appropriations (Without GI Leave Pay) Top Expected Receipts by $5,200,000,000—Kills President's Prediction

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAT ARNOLD
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the rush to appropriate large sums of money for various purposes, in these closing days of the second session of the Seventy-ninth Congress, I wish to bring to the attention of anyone interested in the subject of a balanced budget, the following article from the Wall Street Journal of July 31, 1946:

UNBALANCED BUDGET—UNITED STATES MAY GO FARTHER INTO RED IN FISCAL 1947 THAN ANY PEACE YEAR—APPROPRIATIONS (WITHOUT GI LEAVE PAY) TOP EXPECTED RECEIPTS BY $5,200,000,000—KILLS PRESIDENT'S PREDICTION

(By Vermont Royster)

WASHINGTON.—That old dream of a balanced budget for the Federal Treasury is fading again with the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Six months ago, top administration officials were hopefully predicting that they would get expenditures in line with receipts by the end of the 1947 fiscal year ending next June 30. "We are on our way," said President Truman, "toward a balanced budget."

Today the administration admits that Uncle Sam's finances are still far out of kilter.

There is a strong possibility that this year's deficit may be bigger than in the freest of the free-spending years of the Roosevelt administration before the war. Unless the Government suddenly gets economy minded—even penurious—the Treasury will wind up the year five to ten billion dollars in the red.

TREASURY TO BOOST REVENUE ESTIMATES

The Treasury Department will soon boost its revenue estimates for this year in an effort to make the picture look a little less gloomy. But only an unprecedented, and unexpected, jump in the tax-take can salvage the administration's balanced-budget hopes.

Not even the statistical-minded Budget Bureau knows exactly how large this year's deficit will be. But the Seventy-ninth Congress, with a little prodding from the administration, has already racked up appropriations which far exceed even the most optimistic revenue estimates so far. And the next Congress, with its inevitable last-minute round of deficiency appropriations, hasn't even got its foot in the door.

However, here is the best picture available of the Government's balance sheet for the fiscal year just beginning:

Receipts, on the basis of the existing tax structure, are expected to total approximately $31,500,000,000. The Treasury hopes for more but that is its latest official estimate.

Expenditures already appropriated by the current Congress, including the British loan, aggregate $36,700,000,000. That doesn't count the first supplementary appropriation bill carrying pay for GI terminal leave. This bill, now pending and sure to pass, carries $2,500,000,000 to cover rough estimates of what the leave pay will cost, but not even the War and Navy Departments can yet compute the final cost.

Without further ado that would put Uncle Sam $7,700,000,000 in the hole for this year. The highest previous peacetime deficit, in 1936, was $4,500,000,000.

DISCOURAGING FOR BUDGET DIRECTOR WEBB

All in all it's not an encouraging picture for the new Budget Director, James E. Webb. Mr. Webb, a former assistant to Under Secretary of the Treasury O. Max Gardner, is a professed conservative on Government fiscal policy and is a strong advocate of a balanced budget.

Whittling down the present budget will be a monumental task for Mr. Webb. It's the biggest in the peacetime history of the United States. It's more than three times the biggest prewar budget and more than one-third as big as the largest in wartime.

Moreover, the fixed appropriations made thus far are only the beginning. The budget does not, of course, anticipate the deficiency appropriations which Congress is normally called upon to make near the end of each fiscal year and which will be made by the next Congress.

The deficiency appropriations made for the fiscal year just closed by way of example, totaled just under $5,000,000,000.

This budget situation is in marked contrast to that projected by the President in recent months. In his original budget message for the 1947 fiscal year the President foresaw a deficit of $4,300,000,000. This was based on an over-all budget of $35,800,000,000 and net revenues of $31,500,000,000.

Then in April Mr. Truman revised his estimates to give a more optimistic picture not only for 1946 but also for the current, or 1947, fiscal year. This he predicated on the hope that tax receipts would be higher than estimated and that expenditures could be kept down.

"It is the aim of our fiscal policy," the President said in April, "to balance the Budget for 1947 and to retire national debt in boom times such as these."

HEAVIER DRAINS DEVELOP

The darker Budget picture today is largely the result of the British loan, the heavier demands for the Military Establishments and for veterans benefits of one sort or another, and the blanket pay raises for all Government employees.

The British loan, which amounts to $3,750,000,000, is a carry-over from the 1946 fiscal year. It was not approved by Congress prior to June 30 and so it decreased the deficit for that year but must now be added to the Budget for 1947.

The terminal pay bill, which provides pay for unused leave for enlisted personnel in the armed forces on the same basis as that of officers, was not included at all in the original Budget. Army-Navy officials have estimated that it will cost $3,000,000,000. Since their estimates are admittedly rough, however, the present Congress will appropriate only $5,000,000,000 and leave any deficiency balance to be taken care of by the next Congress.

War veterans as a group are taking approximately $7,700,000,000 in various benefits this fiscal year. The Veterans' Administration's final appropriation was about $3,200,000,000 in excess of advance estimates.

ARMY AND NAVY DEMANDS

Army and Navy demands jointly for the 1947 fiscal year were about $11,000,000,000. This is only a small fraction of their wartime allotments, but it is considerably in excess of the prewar military budget. The Army picked up an extra $55,000,000 and the Navy an extra $354,000,000 over the already high budget estimates.

These gains were offset only in part by the occasional paring which Congress did to the administration's budget. The biggest bite which Congress took out of a budget estimate was the $103,000,000 which it sliced off the Interior Department.

Appropriations for the regular departmental agencies, excluding the military and the Veterans' Administration—total approximately $700,000,000 more than in the last prewar year, 1940. The largest part of this increase is due to pay raises which have boosted Government salaries in the $2,000-to-$3,000 brackets by about 25 percent over the prewar pay.

Here in brief tabular form is a summary of where all this money is going:

	(In millions)
Interest on public debt	$5,000
Tax and custom refunds	1,580
Army and Navy	11,000
Veterans (including housing)	7,718
British loan	3,750
Departments and agencies	7,718
Total appropriated to date	36,766
Supplemental appropriations pending (terminal leave)	2,500
Grand total	39,266

An idea of how this compares with the prewar budgets can be gleaned from the following table (in millions):

Year	Expenditures	Receipts	Deficit
1933	$4,325	$2,080	$2,245
1935	7,583	3,800	3,783
1940	9,127	5,387	3,740

The expenditures of $9,000,000,000 in 1940 were the highest for any peacetime year. It is evident from the break-down of the first postwar budget that even by the most drastic budget cutting the Nation's future outlays will not get down to the old level. Interest on the public debt alone is more than the entire expenditure in 1933 and more than half the entire budget in 1940.

The administration's difficulties in reducing the present stupendous budget were noted recently by OWMR Director Steelman. The only place an appreciable reduction can be made, he concluded, was in the allotment for the military, with some savings possible in appropriations for public works.

"If a major cut in the inflationary impact of Federal expenditures is to be sought," Mr. Steelman said, "expenditure plans of the Army and Navy—45 percent of all proposed expenditures other than interest and refunds—must be reexamined in the light of the present need for antiinflationary action."

No possible economy in the civilian executive agencies would achieve major savings, he said, while the opportunity for economy in the remaining classes of expenditures is far less.

Treasury officials are hopeful that improved tax receipts will take up some of this deficit. On the other hand, they are confronted with increasing pressure for some tax relief next year and the danger that even with the present budget allowances some departments will run out of money before next June and come back to tap the Eightieth Congress.

Address by Bishop Bernard J. Sheil, Auxiliary Bishop of Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Most Reverend Bernard J. Sheil, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Chicago, before the International Alliance of Allied Stage Employees and Motion Picture Operators—A. F. of L.—convention, at Chicago, Ill., on July 22, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When we think of the recent wave of great strikes, so lately settled, and when we think of the strikes now in progress, we cannot be too happy over the advance we have made in the United States toward a better society. Whatever may be the other reasons for the strikes, certainly the reason underlying all others is the general dissatisfaction of the worker with his share of the good things America so abundantly provides. In the past 12 years we have been blessed by social legislation that was sorely needed and that was enacted at a providential time. But, we see now, very clearly, that even this is insufficient. For the social frontiers of our society are as vast and uncharted in their way, as were the geographic frontiers of our Nation in the eighteenth century. In other words, although we have admirable social legislation, it still scratches only the surface. What we need is fundamental social and economic reconstruction. And I mean fundamental in the sense meant by the popes, from Leo XIII to Pius XII.

I realize full well that this is asking for a transformation not only in economics but especially in morals. I realize also that this is a process which requires many years. But this does not mean that we are to remain idle, waiting for the time when we shall suddenly find our minds freed from dusty and dangerous preconceptions. There are immediate issues to be dealt with, quickly and intelligently.

Such an issue is the OPA, now going through another straining process in Congress. No one with any feeling for people, no one with the barest knowledge of economics, will deny that OPA was a providential instrument for the ordinary people of our Nation. Yet, Congress waited until June 28, 2 days before the deadline, to pass a bill which extended the life of OPA for one more year. The popular revulsion at congressional indifference to the will of the people was aptly summed up by President Truman when he called it "a choice between inflation with a statute and inflation without one." The principal objection, of course, was to the Taft amendment, which "puts into (manufacturing) prices the profit per unit of sales which the industry received for that particular product in the year 1941." It is important to note, as the Commonwealth says, that the Taft amendment did not choose any old year; but only 1941, "a wonderful year for profits, more wonderful than any year since, and 50 percent more wonderful than the very, very wonderful year of 1929." Generally, there has been an increase of 15 percent in the cost of living since OPA died. It is absolutely certain that, without controls, prices will rise fantastically. Perhaps the saddest facet of the whole OPA fiasco is that a considerable number of Congressmen are determined to make the next years very profitable for profiteers; at the same time, American labor has no intention of letting prices rise without demanding increases in wages. A new and more disturbing wave of strikes now seems unavoidable; and the blame will rest largely with Congress. All of this should teach us, for one thing, that politics and economics are very closely related. And we would be fools indeed to return to Congress, men whose rank irresponsibility threatens the Nation with chaos.

As another means in the solution of our difficulties, I urge the passage of the 65-cent minimum-wage law. Even this would only give the workers concerned the magnificent sum of $26 a week, or $1,452 a year. It should be passed without delay. Although the figure is still substandard, it is nevertheless a step in the direction of a family living wage. As such, I believe, it has moral priority over other considerations. I wonder whether the opponents of the 65-cent minimum wage would like to live on $26 a week. I wonder whether the economic royalists and their lackeys realize that even with this pitiful increase the beneficiaries would still have to struggle for a bare existence. Since this legislation has been gathering dust in the House for many months, I think a deluge of mail and telegrams would at least momentarily arouse the reluctant representatives from their indifference.

To quicken the coming of the good society, the guaranteed annual living wage is an absolute necessity. It is no dreamy speculation of impractical planners. It is likely that no other single measure would do more to bring about the traditional American dream of a social order worthy of man. It is a very obvious means of aiding men to achieve their temporal and eternal end as human beings and children of God. This alone gives the annual wage a sound moral justification. Certainly it would add to a stabilized family life. This would be a pure gain for us, since a strong family life is the basis of a healthy nation.

It is pleasant to note that all of the guaranteed annual wage plans now in operation in America were undertaken at the initiative of private industry. Far-sighted businessmen have contributed much to the new plan.

Labor unions must extend their activities beyond a mere definition of wages and hours and the settlement of isolated grievances. Labor unions ought to participate in the management of industry. This is simply a question of the workers' rightful request for a voice in things that affect them vitally. Union-management cooperation is the extension of the principles of democracy into industry; it is an instrument through which all persons in industry participate at all levels in working out their mutual problems. Our fabulous wartime production is an amazing proof of the effect of unity and cooperation. A few outstanding American industries have made a start in this direction without any harm to anyone involved. I think Pius XI was referring to this when he said: "In the present state of human society * * * We deem it advisable that the wage contract should, when possible, be modified somewhat by a contract of partnership, as is already being tried in various ways to the no small gain both of the wage earners and of the employers. In this way, wage earners are made sharers of some sort in the ownership or the management or the profits." And again he is pertinent, when he says: "Unless the various forms of human endeavor, dependent one upon the other, are united in mutual harmony and mutual support; unless, above all, brains, capital, and labor combine together for common effort, man's toil cannot produce due fruit."

Only those who are economically illiterate will oppose these propcsals. They would be a sure means of achieving for millions of Americans that standard of living about which so much is said, but which is possessed by so few.

While we are trying to reach fundamental reform, morally and socially, let us not forget that the Congress of the United States has always played a large part in the sort of society we have. This is a relationship we wish to preserve. But, if we really wish to build a society in which Christian values are preserved and in which man can live as a child of God, then let us examine closely the kind of men we have in Congress. With unmatched stupidity, this Congress has consistently sloughed off the 21-point reconversion program of President Truman. Often consistency is a debilitating and vicious luxury which we can ill afford. We are witnessing a kind of national refusal of responsibility, a phenomenon which is not unfamiliar in this country. I hold no brief for either party; but, I cannot refrain from expressing my astonishment at the excellent Republican record of some of our southern Democrats. There are some outstanding men in Congress; men of statesmanlike quality, of high intelligence, and with a deep concern for their country. But their number is not legion.

If we wish really to effect the reconstruction of society, we must examine our relations with one another very closely. And, if we look at ourselves honestly, we discover that we need, basically, love for one another. I do not mean a sentiment that comes and goes with passing whims, but the steady flame of Christian love that animates all good souls. The world needs bitterly the love of men for men; the love of Chinese for Caucasian; of the Negro for the white; of the Pole for the Russian; of the Irish for the Jew; and the love of the American for all the world. Love is not for the weak; it is for the strong. For only the strong can quell the pangs of envy; only the strong can grapple with the tearing tentacles of hate. Only the strong man can accept his brother on terms of honest equality, without rancor, with the love of brother for brother.

And let us not talk of the brotherhood of man in loose, vague terms. The brotherhood of man is no mere political slogan; it is a reality. We are all brothers because we are all literally God's children. Without this basis, brotherhood is a mere catchword. Brotherhood is a living, pulsating reality; it is a real factor in our lives, which we can neglect only at great peril. The present state of the world is a prime example of what happens when men forget or deny their intimate relationship with one another.

We are alarmed, legitimately alarmed at the divisions which have grown up among us Americans. Labor and management are still seriously divided; and the farmer is against them both, while the consumer is lost in the shuffle. We see Poles hating Russians, the Irish hating the English, the whites suspicious of the Chinese, and all united in hating the Jews and the Negroes, who return the hate. We see Irish-Americans gathering for various meetings; we see the Polish-Americans and the German-Americans, etc., gathering for their various purposes. But we see precious little of any of our people getting together simply as Americans. We need unity now as never before. But, we shall not have that unity until we start to act as Americans without hyphens. Unfortunately, the most malicious weapon of division lies in the field of religion. I say malicious, because theological differences, which should be argued on their own merit, have often been deliberately forgotten in the welter of misunderstanding and bigotry in which we have submerged ourselves.

It is true that many men in high places oppose all reforms because they do not understand the changes that are taking place. They are hawking the same old wares of political and social shoddy, and they are totally unaware that disaster threatens to engulf us all. Yet, these men are not the only enemies of progress. There are others more subtle, and therefore more dangerous. Some of these unhappily are in the labor movement. I refer, of course, to Communists. It is useless to deny that there are Communists in labor unions. But it is an arrant lie and hysterical nonsense to claim that all unions are dominated by Communists. However, the small percentage of Communists in the unions do bring immense harm to unionism in general. Communists generally are not interested in unionism; they are primarily concerned with the advancement of communism. Wherever Communist counsel prevails, labor suffers.

Nevertheless, I contend that when Communists attain leadership in any union, they do so only because of the apathy of the rank and file members. The average union member is morally bound to see that his union operates honestly and efficiently; his duty as a union member requires him to act always in the best interests of the union and of the Nation at large.

It might be asked why we are so concerned with the temporal aspects of man's life. Why do I, for instance, a bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, speak on these matters. Cardinal Saliege has indicated the answer briefly: "The kingdom of God is not of this world, but it is in this world that it is won; it is in this world that it begins; though it is in heaven only that it has its plenitude."

The work of salvation begins here; a man's work, a man's home, a man's family have a very intimate bearing on the salvation of his immortal soul. We plead for economic and social betterment only to make it a little easier for men to enter heaven. Man has a higher destiny than this earth; we want to help him achieve that destiny. That is why we hope for the realization of something that ordinary people have long dreamed of. They dreamed of a world where everyone would have everything necessary for attaining happiness. They dreamed of a world where destitution would only be a melancholy memory; they dreamed of a world where laughter and innocent merriment would replace suspicions and hate; a world where nations would live in harmony and prosperity. They dreamed of a world in which there would not be Anglo-Saxon, nor Latin, nor Negro, nor Oriental, but only human beings. They dreamed of a world peopled by men clothed in the regal dignity and splendor of freedom; a world that would be a stepping stone to heaven.

Address by Commander Laurence E. Kiely at Dedication of Shea Field

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAVID I. WALSH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by Commander Laurence E. Kiely, of Arlington Post 39, American Legion, on the occasion of the dedication of Shea Field, at Squantum Naval Air Station, Squantum, Mass., on Saturday, July 20.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As commander of Arlington Post 39, American Legion, I consider it a distinct honor to be privileged to represent my comrades of the post, at these services of dedication. In placing the wreath on the plaque, just unveiled, we recognize the deep significance of the occasion in the dedication of this field to the name of Commander John Joseph Shea, United States Navy, our fellow townsman and comrade.

Commander Shea represents to us both a symbol and a salutary lesson. Here at this field which henceforth will bear his name, he served as executive officer. Called upon to give the benefits of his large experience in aviation, he had the responsible task of selection of young men in their preliminary training at Squantum. Having in mind the Navy's need of only the best, he performed this task well. Kind and fair in his judgments, he was, nevertheless, thorough in his selection.

Ordered to sea duty when the war broke, Commander Shea must have had the satisfying knowledge that his work was good and that his policy was sound. For in the early months after our entry into war, many of these men of the early days at Squantum, no doubt, were at Coral Sea and at Midway where came the first crucial tests of our naval aviation and where America had her counterpart of Britain, "so few, to whom so many owe so much."

RECALLS DARK DAYS OF 1942

And let us not forget those dark days of 1942. In the exultation of our victory of 1945 after the weight of our manpower and industrial might and inventiveness had balanced the scales in our favor, let us not forget that it was the then very thin line of regular servicemen that stood between us and disaster and it should always be remembered that it was the red, raw courage and self-sacrifice of such men as Commander Shea and the Navy of 1942, that brought us our only encouragement in those fateful days.

And after the first uncertain steps on our way back had been taken by the United States Marine Corps at Guadalcanal and Tulagi, in August of that year, our hopes were somewhat dashed in September by the sinking of the carrier Wasp, where Commander Shea met death so heroically.

So let us resolve that, never again shall we allow our unpreparedness for war to become acute, and join with the American Legion in its old but ever-continuous effort to arouse our citizens to this ever-present need of adequate preparation.

The tragic sacrifice of Commander Shea and all the other heroes of our armed services, recall to my mind the words of the Latin poet, once written as an epitaph, "Dulce et Decorum est, pro Patria Mori." Inscribed on a bronze tablet, commemorating the sacrifices of Massachusetts men at the Battle of Bunker Hill, they are as modern in sentiment and meaning as today's sunshine.

Translated, these words read, "It is noble and fitting to die for one's country."

I read them first as a boy in Charlestown; perhaps about the time I was wrestling with the translations of Caesar's Commentaries or the Orations of Cicero, in high school. But the years brought a wealth of additional meaning to those words. Because when they cease to have meaning, then is a free nation doomed. Patriotism, as possessed by Commander Shea and those many others—the love of flag and country and devotion to its service is the highest form of charity—for no greater love hath a man than that he meet death that his fellow countrymen may live.

Newspaper Handling of Columbia Valley Authority News

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Grange News concerning newspaper handling of Columbia Valley Authority news.

The people of the Nation should know about what this official publication of the Washington State Grange characterizes as a scare campaign against a measure which they apparently recognize as having widespread public support.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL ROBINS MAKES DEBUT

Daily newspapers in various parts of the State have been giving prominent display to the comments of one Gen. Thomas M. Robins, retired former official of the Army Engineers, regarding the danger of socialism in the proposed Columbia Valley Authority. What the press conveniently neglected to mention, however, was the fact that General Robins is on the pay roll of the Portland General Electric Co. and thus hardly to be considered scientifically unbiased on the CVA question.

What General Robins said for publication was the usual run of argument about a three-man board, not responsible to the people, which would subjugate the whole Pacific Northwest to a socialist form of government. Newspaper editorialists, taking up the cry, warned ominously that such an authority would be enabled to condemn property as they see fit, leaving owners of such confiscated property little hope of redress from any higher level.

The newspapers' readers must have been at a loss as to whom General Robins and the editorialists were arguing with, since they have published practically nothing of what's been said in favor of a CVA. The free press is obviously running a scare campaign against a measure which they apparently recognize as having widespread public support—else it would not be worth bothering to go to so much trouble to fight it.

Of course the CVA would have even less power of condemnation and seizure than is vested in a score or more of Federal agencies now doing business disjointedly in the Northwest. It would have the power to coordinate Federal activities in the region, speed the development of power and other resources for the people's benefit, and squash some of the more shameless profiteering in land irrigated at public expense. Appointed by the President with the O. K. of the United States Senate, its directors would be some 3,000 miles closer to the people than are the various Cabinet officers now attempting to do the work of a CVA without any possibility of effective coordination.

Wisconsin's Eighth Congressional District and National Debt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, by the slow but sure hardening process of a 15-year spending spree, we have forgotten the value of a million dollars. To make clear just what a million dollars will buy, to emphasize the enormity of our national debt in terms of its impact upon the average American community and to point out the community cost of the recent loan to Great Britain, I wish to include as part of my remarks a table which compares the total assessed valuation of all real and personal property of the various communities in my congressional district with their share of the burden of both the debt and the loan. It is interesting to note that, on a per capita basis, my district's share of the national debt exceeds by almost a hundred million dollars the current sale value of the entire district.

The table follows:

Comparison of national debt and British loan with valuation of Eighth District cities and villages

Military Policy of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address entitled "Military Policy of the United States," delivered by me yesterday before the Institute on the United States in World Affairs at the American University, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"I cannot recommend to your notice measures for the fulfillment of our duties to the rest of the world, without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defense, and of exacting from them the fulfillment of their duties toward us * * *. There is a rank due to the United States among nations, which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war."

Those words are not mine. They were written by George Washington in one of his messages to Congress dated December 3, 1793. They constitute America's military policy today, as I see it.

We are now in the midst of postwar uncertainties. While the war was at its worst, and particularly during the latter months when we could begin to see the end, we planned that when peace was attained we could address ourselves entirely to problems of rehabilitation and progress instead of ways and means of destruction. After winning the greatest of victories our desire is to demobilize the forces which won the victories. We are tired of war and worn out by the labor and anxiety and emotional strains of an all-out effort of 5 years' duration.

The subject of military policy does not commend itself to our consideration under these conditions; furthermore, it is a subject to which most of us have paid little attention during the last quarter of a century. Now we are asking the American people to realize that serious public consideration of questions of our national security leading to the formulation of a military policy is imperative in the immediate future, even though it is repugnant to our people to continue to think of war and to plan for it. If this consideration is to be demanded, only the most urgent reasons will seem to be sufficient. Believing as I do that, at this moment, we must have a positive military policy unless we wish to forfeit the results of our recent hard won and expensive victory, I ask you to think with me for a short time today as I present to you my conception of sound military policy for a United States at peace, and for a United States which desires above all else to remain in a state of permanent peace secured by dependable guaranties.

We have tried before to achieve this dual goal of peace and security. Our methods, which can be summarized under the headings of isolationism and disarmament, failed in the past just as they would fail again if we were foolish enough to disregard our bitter lessons and attempt to practice them in the future. The wish that we will never have to use armed strength must lead us to take positive steps to create a world in which law, not force, will rule. Paradoxically, our desire for peace without a military establishment is accompanied by an increasing realization that such military force is needed more than ever before for our security. In our drive to realize our goal of world peace and to furnish basic security for the United States, sound military policy plays an essential role, and the development of military policy must be integrated with our foreign policy.

Why have we disregarded military policy in the past decades? Why can we no longer depend upon the advantages which made this disregard possible? What is the solution? If a part of the solution is a sound military policy, what should that policy be? The answers to these questions are of vital importance to the American people if we are to attain our goals of world peace and national security.

If we examine the reasons for our having paid so little attention to military policy, one important explanation is found in the past protection afforded by our geographical location. We have had no strong rival powers in the Western Hemisphere, and the majority military struggles in the world have been far distant from our shores. If potential world conquerors threatened our security and way of life, our allies could be depended upon to hold off the enemy even though they could not defeat him alone. This gave time to build with our vast resources and industrial capacity a military machine which, when thrown into the battle, ensured our victory in the war.

But this advantage of geographical location has been destroyed. The conquest of space and the technological advancement in weapons have made the world a very small place, and distance has become of slight importance either in peace or in war.

The conquest of space changed the nature of warfare in World War II and indicated its probable character in the hypothetical "next war." The enemy will be hit behind the front lines in a three-dimensional war—total in every sense of the word. Industrial capacity will be the first target and the civilian population the first to suffer. Bomber type B-29 already has been succeeded by type B-36 with a 10,000-mile range giving it the power to drop bombs on any corner of the earth. Rockets have had an even more amazing development. The German V-2 had a 200-mile range; the Germans had projected plans for rockets with a 3,500-mile range and possibilities of development for much greater distances. With travel at a speed of 1 mile per second—per second, not per minute—all space must now be measured in time instead of in miles, and an enemy at a considerable geographic distance may be a half-hour distant in time.

The development of new weapons, taken in connection with the conquest of space, poses problems of terrific seriousness. The use of two atomic bombs under battle conditions and the as-yet few experimental tests have indicated future developments with tremendous possibilities. Some people say that it is too bad that we solved the problem of the fission of the atom and that, since we were unfortunate enough to have done so, the best thing would be to destroy not only atomic bombs but all our knowledge of atomic fission. Such a solution is no solution. If we had not solved this problem of nuclear physics some other nation would have done so. Scientific development cannot be destroyed nor kept secret. The discovery of atomic power, like the discoveries of electricity or plastics, or airplanes, can be used for peaceful purposes, and this fact constitutes another reason for its preservation and continued development. But it would be worse than stupid to ignore the use of atomic bombs for destruction by future aggressors. We must face the fact that such bombs could be dropped by airplanes or by the new types of rockets and by rocket shells shot from submarines against our harbor installations. Wars usually open at a distance determined by the greatest effective range of available weapons, so a future war would probably start with an attack, not against a naval base like Pearl Harbor, but against major industrial cities. This would make the United States not the arsenal of democracy but a battlefield.

Nor is the atomic bomb the only new weapon with which we must reckon. The public is not so well informed nor so apprehensive of the dangers of biological warfare, but it is nevertheless true that there are now in existence biological and chemical agents of undreamed effectiveness which could bring death, disease and starvation to an entire country. We possess such agents, and so do all other nations.

This is a terrible picture. The next war, if we permit it to be fought, will mean the end of Western civilization. There is no possibility of effective military defense in such a war, because the tempo of technological development is so fast that offensive measures with the capacity for rapid and complete destruction can be wrought before adequate defense measures—if there are any—can be discovered. The old, leisurely wars are a thing of the past, and we cannot depend upon any margin of time for setting up defenses and preparing the attack after the enemy has struck. The initial attack may conceivably be the entire war.

What are the solutions, if we must accept the fact that there is no military defense which can prepare? I submit that we have no other hope than an effective United Nations which can keep the third and final world war from being fought. This is the next logical step in the slow progress of mankind toward a rule of law, a progress which is steady in spite of frequent and dramatic interruptions. If there is now a law of the jungle rather than a code of international law it is because we have not yet accepted the new concept that nations as well as individuals must bow to the rulings of courts, and that there must be an international police to enforce such rulings.

There is no possibility of an immediate world-wide acceptance of this concept. Its general acceptance can be expected only in the indefinite future as the result of a long, laborious educational process. During the interim preceding such acceptance we must have faith that it can be obtained, we must have determination to push for acceptance, and finally we must be realistic about the peculiar dangers which will exist in the interim period. In short, our new policy must be based upon a nice balance between realism and idealism.

Our idealism will reach expression through such world agencies as, for example, UNESCO—The United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization. Such a realistic idealist as Secretary of State Byrnes, fully aware of the dangers in the present international situation, recently made the following statement with which all educators will agree: "I can conceive of no more important endeavor than to make the mind of man a constructive force for peace. That effort is fundamental to the success of the United Nations organization. We realize that world peace can be maintained only by the united efforts of all peoples. But men work together most effectively when they have learned to think together and to feel together. Without common knowledge, common agreement is difficult or impossible.

"The discovery of atomic energy has made the task of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization an even more imperative one. In a world where nations may arm themselves with weapons against which there is no physical defense, basic security lies in the creation of mutual trust and confidence among the peoples of the world. If UNESCO can bring that goal nearer by one step, it deserves our prompt and wholehearted participation."

The United States has played an important part in all the preliminaries to the establishment of UNESCO, and we are cooperating in all other international organizations including, of course, the United Nations. But this is not enough. There is still the question of the power which we can bring to bear to insure that the decisions of international agencies will prevail. History has shown us that a weak United States does not serve as a good example, inducing other nations to live at peace, but rather that our weakness merely furnishes an incentive to aggressor nations to pursue their plans of world conquest. If we had had an effective military establishment that fact might have been a decisive factor, in the chain of events which led to the declaration of unrestricted submarine warfare in 1917, to the invasion of Manchuria in 1931, and to the outbreak of World War II.

During the period which must intervene before the United Nations becomes a thoroughly effective means of international control the United States will have to maintain a dependable Military Establishment. This establishment is needed for two extremely important reasons. In the first place, it is our duty to guarantee our own security until the United Nations are able to do so. No one can deny a nation's right to self-preservation. In the second place, if we are to back the drive toward attainment of the ideal of an effective United Nations organization we must have enough power that weaker nations will have confidence in our ability and determination to support the United Nations during the developmental period. These reasons require little explanation or defense.

What kind of Military Establishment do we need to accomplish our purposes under existing conditions? We must face the facts of these conditions and devise plans for an establishment which can operate as successfully as possible under them. A force which will be effective in the eyes of foreign nations is a necessity. Since the speed of any aggressor attack upon us would be its most important characteristic, and since it is generally conceded that there is presently no adequate defense against this type of attack, we are forced to the conclusion that our establishment must be able to retaliate in kind, and that the fear of retaliation will be the main deterrent of aggressor nations.

There are three principal means, which I shall discuss, of ensuring that our future Military Establishment can accomplish these purposes—the first is the preservation of our present technological and scientific leadership, the second is the emphasis upon the importance of mobility in all armed forces, and the third is the coordination of our military strength with that of the United Nations as it develops.

The problem of maintaining the leadership which the United States undoubtedly holds in the fields of technological and scientific achievement is not capable of solution by the armed forces alone. This is a national problem to be solved with the help of the whole Nation unless we are to build an ineffective Military Establishment or build it without proper economy. The duplication of facilities and the failure to coordinate research activities can be avoided only if there is a national program of research in technology and science. In such a program the military departments of government will need the continual help of educational institutions, scientific foundations, and industrial laboratories. Their services will undoubtedly be given as effectively as during the war.

The Congress now has before it for consideration a bill to provide a national science foundation, and it is to be hoped that this bill will become law during the current session. The so-called Kilgore-Magnuson bill is supported by many individuals and representatives of educational institutions, scientific foundations, and industries which unite in agreeing that such a national foundation is necessary, however widely they may disagree as to its specific provisions. The proposed foundation is based upon recognition of the necessity for stimulating scientific research through the provision of national funds, and this is considered to be a necessity whether or not we engage in war. There is no intention to supersede existing research agencies nor to exercise control over the agencies or the subjects of research—rather, the policy of the proposal is to stimulate scientific and technological research by adding the contribution of the national government to the contributions of all nongovernmental research agencies.

That these civilian contributions will be important in the maintenance of scientific and technological leadership in the development of instruments of warfare is a certainty but, if we desire proof, we have only to turn back to the history of our most recent preparation for war. The contributions of civilian scientists and technologists are considered by military authorities to have been among their major weapons, and this evaluation is overwhelmingly confirmed by the facts.

In addition to acknowledging the continuing contribution from all civilian sources, the armed forces have recognized the importance of carrying on their own programs of research and development. In general, these programs include the establishment of offices on the highest staff level to coordinate research activities, thus preventing overlapping of effort and ensuring coverage of all necessary fields. The armed services are associating civilian experts with them in their work so that the civilians will know what the military problems are and what research is being undertaken to provide solutions. Furthermore, this enables the military experts to keep abreast at all times of the current research in progress in civilian institutions. The armed services have developed programs to encourage officers and men to pursue studies in civilian institutions, and the promotion systems of the Army and Navy will give recognition to this type of professional training.

The bill now before the Congress to provide for unification of the defense services contains detailed provisions for the administration of the program of research and education. Four assistant secretaries are provided for the proposed new Department of Common Defense, and one of the four is to be assigned to perform the following functions:

"(1) To foster, supervise, and coordinate scientific research and development activities in the Department of Common Defense; to coordinate such activities in the Department of Common Defense with those of other Government agencies, and with those of private industry, individuals, laboratories, and educational institutions; and to promote educational programs designed to assure an adequate supply of trained personnel to conduct such activities of the Department.

"(2) To foster, supervise, and coordinate intelligence activities in the Department of Common Defense; to assure the prompt dissemination within the Department and to commanders in the field of adequate military intelligence to enable military authorities to take action in the interests of common defense; to coordinate the intelligence activities of the Department with those of the Central Intelligence Agency and other Government agencies; and to promote educational programs designed to assure an adequate supply of trained personnel to conduct such activities of the Department.

"(3) To supervise and coordinate activities of the Department of Common Defense with respect to the procurement of military supplies, logistics, industrial mobilization, and medical care and hospitalization; to develop programs designed to promote economy, efficiency, and the elimination of duplication and overlapping in the procurement and distribution of military supplies and in the furnishing of medical care, hospitalization, and other services; to coordinate the programs of the Department with those of the National Security Resources Board and other governmental agencies performing functions with respect to the procurement and distribution of supplies, the furnishing of services, or the maintenance of inventories and information relating to the actual and potential manpower, resources, and productive facilities of the Nation; and to promote educational programs designed to provide an adequate supply of trained personnel to conduct the military logistics of the Department and to promote educational programs designed to accustom industry to the actual and potential procurement programs of the Department.

"(4) To supervise and coordinate educational and training activities in the Department of Common Defense with a view toward the constant maintenance of our armed forces as a highly trained organization, the provision of adequate opportunities to all members of such forces to fit themselves for greater responsibilities, the joint education and training of members of the armed forces, and the training of members of the armed forces to fit them for command and staff responsibilities involving all the components of the armed forces; and to coordinate the educational and training activities of the Department of Common Defense with those of other Government agencies and of educational institutions."

But mere research, however comprehensive its results, is not enough. Research is a product of the mind which needs intellectual leadership if it is to become effective. There must be a full understanding of the broad aspects of the problems and the possible application of new inventions to their solution, and this is just as necessary in civilian as in military activities. A proper coordination of the contributions of all the sciences is required since few of our important problems, civilian or military, can be solved by the specialists in a single area of knowledge. The coordination of all the sciences must be interpreted to mean the social sciences as well as the natural sciences. Our greatest discoveries in physical science and technology will never help us to realize the world we want to live in unless the social scientists can teach us the proper utilization of such discoveries. It was in recognition of this obvious fact that the bill for a national science foundation, mentioned a short time ago, contained provision for several divisions in the agency, including in addition to divisions based upon the various physical sciences a division of the social sciences. Although the argument has been presented that it would be better to have two national foundations, one for physical and one for social sciences, there are compelling arguments for their inclusion under one roof. Perhaps the strongest reason is the necessity just mentioned of cooperative research in the social implications of our scientific and technological discoveries. It is to be regretted that, by amendment, the provision for a division of the social sciences has been stricken from the bill, and effort should be made to have it reinstated before final enactment.

In addition to guaranteeing that the United States shall continue to hold the leadership in technological and scientific development as a means of maintaining an adequate Military Establishment, we must recognize the importance of mobility in all armed forces, and our new military organization must be adapted to a modern type of military warfare based upon such mobility. In the past there was sufficient time for a gradual coordination of the various branches of the armed forces after war had commenced, but in future wars split-second decisions, not action by deliberative committees, will be required. All missions will have to have been assigned previously and direction will have to be centralized. Plans must be made which will provide for economical use of personnel both scientific and military. We do not have an inexhaustible reservoir of manpower, and there is an actual shortage of men with great ability for leadership. Whatever form the Military Establishment may take, the organization must produce capacity for quick and effective action with little or no advance warning.

The third essential means of accomplishing the purpose of building an effective Military Establishment is that this establishment must provide for the coordination of our national military strength with the strength of whatever military force is developed under the United Nations. This is an important subject, deserving of extended treatment, although the guiding policy in itself is relatively simple. The objective of our National Military Establishment is the preservation of our national security, and the force which is necessary at the present time must be adequate in itself to guarantee that security. As the United Nations, in the course of its development, becomes strong enough to be able to protect its members against attack, our national establishment can be reduced, part of it can be fused with the new international peace force, and the remainder can be organized as coordinate or supplementary forces. Exact details of such a division of function and power can scarcely be stated at such an early date in the life of the United Nations.

As for disarmament or a weak Military Establishment I am convinced that either would be disastrous at the present time. Instead of being interpreted as evidence of the peaceful intentions of the United States, it would be interpreted as weakness by other nations and as a sign that we planned to shirk our international responsibilities as we did after the First World War. We are not imperialistic, and as evidence we can point to our recent action in connection with Philippine independence. But our moral rule in the world must not depend alone upon the force of good example. If we wish to have such moral rule established in the world, we must have an adequate Military Establishment to demonstrate to those nations not yet subscribing to it that it has our effective support.

The program as outlined is not an easy one to accomplish. Neither was the program for the defeat of Germany and Japan. How did we accomplish success in our wartime efforts? You realize as I do that the tremendous energy and the unselfish devotion of every citizen was required, and that no amount of work or of sacrifice was denied. That same energy and devotion must now be dedicated to the cause of peace, and we must continue to support a Military Establishment no matter how much we may wish to abolish it as a visible and distasteful evidence of war. Peace cannot be created merely by wishing for it, and pretending that it exists. The stakes of peace are just as high—in fact, they are the same stakes as those of war. The survival of a nation is our object in both cases. No exercise of energy and no amount of self-denial is too much to ask from American citizens in such a cause.

We fought and won the First World War because of the bulk of our strength. We fought and won the Second World War because we were able to put our whole national energies unitedly into the task. We learned many things in the First World War, the most important of which was the necessity of the complete coordination of our entire economic life with the war effort. Many lives were saved because of this fact. Steps toward the proper coordination were taken immediately after the First World War in the passage of the National Defense Act of 1920, which resulted in the solving of that Nation-old problem of uniting the State with the Federal forces in the creation of the Army of the United States. This resulted in better training and in the development of our leaders in the upper ranges of our staff organizations. Advanced schools, too, were encouraged. The revitalization of our Navy was brought about in time for it to do its part in the Second World War despite the terrific set-back at Pearl Harbor.

The passage of the Scrap Brass Act, sponsored by myself, marked the beginning of making our economic life in a sense contributory toward our national defense. This was a very small act, but the theory behind it was extremely important. One scrap-brass company in America needed Government support in order to stay in business. This was given on the theory that the business was essential to our national defense. Then, in rapid succession, came the following acts, all sponsored by me: The Strategic Materials Act, the Helium Act, and finally the development of the theory for the Selective Service Act, which is expressed in the opening sentence of that act and which, if it had been lived up to wholly, would have avoided those inconsistencies which caused us trouble in selective service and which would have kept the act wholly selective, recognizing the fact that the Army must not be a cross-section of all individuals in our Nation but a selective section taken from all individuals of those persons who are most worthy to serve and most able to serve in the armed forces, without upsetting the economic, cultural, and social strength in our united Nation.

The war has been won. I have already considered the constructive elements toward our future defense—the scientific foundation, the reorganization of our Army and Navy, based upon unitary control of the services. This will make for efficiency and cut wastes. This will make a strong nation—strong in every fiber of its being—a nation made up of trained citizens—a nation trusting in itself and knowing the strength of itself. This will make a national defense built around the theories of our founding fathers, realizing that until these theories are universally accepted in the world we will not have peace, and that until they are accepted with honor in the world the purposes of the American Revolution will not have been accomplished.

Article Regarding Senator Wiley's Address on OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the current issue of the syndicated feature of the National Industry's News Service, whose director and editor is Mr. J. E. Jones, reports on an address which I delivered over the radio last Sunday.

I ask unanimous consent that this feature be reproduced in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CALLING A SPADE A SPADE

The OPA expired the last of June, but the old thing revived 4 weeks later. "America was emancipated from OPA's wild collectivist planners who hate free enterprise and want state socialism," declared Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, in a coast-to-coast broadcast address last Sunday. He added: "The Senate, following the House's action, restored OPA. The Senate had been pressured by the administration, pressured by the 34,000 OPA bureaucrats who wanted to retain their jobs, pressured by Communists and "pinks," and pressured, too, by some misguided folks who had unfortunately swallowed OPA's fear propaganda. I personally voted against the restoration of OPA. I voted against it because I believe in mama and papa. I believe that mama is wiser than Chester Bowles and papa is wiser than Paul Porter. Mama can control prices by herself, by refusing to patronize gougers and chiselers. I believe in the soundness of the American people. I know that they are not racketeers or suckers. They lived 165 years without OPA. I believe that with the war over, OPA has no more justification for existence."

He made an exception of rent controls in a manner equitable for the property owner as well as for the tenant—to be handled by the States.

He charged OPA with having fostered black markets and crimes, and evasion of tax payments by some Americans.

"I know that OPA has stifled production," declared the Senator, and added:

"Unless the producer can make a profit, there will be reduced production. Without such production, prices will remain high. Production in a free economy is the answer to inflation, not price controls. The American free-enterprise system and the natural laws of supply and demand are entitled to a further testing period without OPA controls."

Senator WILEY deserves to enjoy his reputation as a Republican leader—plus the confidence of Wisconsin, which is exceptionally particular—particular about its Senators. After stating his beliefs he continued to call a spade a spade, by reviewing actual results during what he called the short period of "emancipation from OPA controls"—the period between June 30 when the old OPA died, and July 25 when the President signed the new OPA bill. The results, he declared, "proved adequate, while production soared."

While some prices rose, it was because they had been set at an arbitrarily low level—with producers denied any profits. Other prices rose by just the amount represented by the loss of the Government subsidy—the subsidy you would otherwise have had to pay in taxes. The Senator proved his statements by reviewing the improved market conditions of milk, meat, and other household supplies.

"But where do all of us go from here?" queried the Senator of his Nation-wide audience. His own advice was direct: "Let mama and papa and all of the American public maintain undiminished their faith in the free-enterprise system. Let them not lose heart because OPA has won a temporary battle. Let the American people vote in the primaries and go to the polls in November to vote out the collectivists from office, and vote in men who have faith in mama and papa, men who would restore our free way of life and end government regimentation."

Address of J. P. Seiberling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. P. Seiberling, president, Seiberling Rubber Co., Akron, Ohio, delivered to National Industrial Advertisers Conference, Thursday, June 20, 1946, Atlantic City, N. J.:

Mr. Chairman and members of the National Industrial Advertisers Conference, I am going to surprise many of you on this occasion and refrain from talking either on the subject of industrial advertising or the rubber tire situation. I suspect that all of you here today know considerably more about the first subject than I do, and with respect to the second subject are not interested in a rubber man's alibis.

Instead I have chosen to speak to you on a subject of considerably more importance to each of us than either of the two subjects mentioned, because the implication of my remarks will relate to basic considerations of our most precious possession, namely, our individual freedom, and to what, for want of a better name, we call the American way of life.

I have entitled this address "Humbug and Double Talk—Twin Perils to Freedom." Rather than to attempt to define what is meant by humbug and double talk, I am going to illustrate both for you by a story I recently heard about Abe going into Ike's store to buy an all-wool suit of clothes. Abe said, "Ike, because you are my neighbor and my friend, I have come to buy from you an all-wool suit of clothes." Ike, getting out a 75-percent cotton and 25-percent wool suit, replied, "Abe, because you are my neighbor and my friend, I am going to give you this $100 all virgin wool suit—not for $100, not for $90, not for $80, not even for $70—but, believe me, for $65." To which Abe replied, "Ike, because you are my friend, I am not going to give you $65 for that suit, nor $55, nor $45—not even $35—but, believe me, I am going to give you for that suit $32.55." Whereupon, Ike replied, "Sold—now that's the way I like to do business. No chiseling."

That story illustrates more perfectly than I could describe what is meant by humbug and double talk, as both of those elements are readily apparent in the story. Because you recognized them and appraised the ridiculous and unsubtle inconsistencies involved, you refused to take them seriously and enjoyed a good laugh.

Unfortunately the humbug and double talk to which this Nation has been exposed in large doses for much of the past 15 years or so has not been similarly received, because it has come from apparently important people—in serious talks on serious subjects, and for the most part has been cleverly disguised so that the mass of the people have failed to recognize the humbug and double talk as such and, instead of laughing at it, have accepted it as so much truth. Who was it that said, "What fools we mortals be!" For example, let us take the last two of the so-called four freedoms of the nonexistent Atlantic Charter, so solemnly enunciated and seriously regarded by millions of unthinking the world over. Here we have humbug and double talk at its best. Freedom from fear and freedom from want. The first bit of humbug lies in the fact that freedom from is not really freedom at all, but rather the idea of escape or immunity. The true idea of freedom is not negative or contractive, but rather is positive and expansive in character. A man in jail is free from a lot of things but he enjoys none the less little freedom. Freedom to, and freedom of, and freedom for are read freedoms because they are positive and expansive, but freedom from, properly regarded, is a phony freedom any way you look at it.

The second bit of humbug lies in the fact that freedom from fear and freedom from want are as impossible of attainment as the attainment is undesirable. How can you be without fear so long as the body of man is mortal and evil exists, and the only certainty in life is death and taxes, and the known is but an infinitesimal segment of the unknown—particularly so, now that the atomic age has arrived? How can you be without want when the wants of man are limitless—such as the want for eternal youth and the want for eternal life?

Even if freedom from fear and freedom from want were possible attainments, they are scarcely desirable ones—for fear, properly regarded and controlled, is not the enemy of man but rather the friend of man, and human want has been and continues to be the single greatest spur that exists to the progress and development of mankind.

Fear is mankind's greatest protector and want is mankind's greatest stimulator. Fear teaches us what to avoid and what to prepare against that would harm or destroy us, while want spurs us to strive for improvement of our lot. Imagine, if you can, life on this planet where no one feared anything and everyone wanted nothing. Well—so much for the humbug of the so-called third and fourth freedoms. What about the double talk?

Here the plot thickens and what has seemed senseless begins to make sense, for is not freedom from fear the sly appeal to the natural human desire for so-called security, and does not freedom from want suggest that alluring heavenly goal known as "the more abundant life?" Security and abundance—there we have it—the two basic appeals of the collectivists, be they Communist, Socialist, Fascist, or various combinations of all three—such as the planned economists would have us accept. Anyone who thinks at all knows that collectivism and freedom are like oil and water. They just won't mix, because they are the antithesis of each other. But that's where the double talk comes in—you talk the ideas of collectivism and clothe the ideas in the verbiage of freedom to snare the gullible and the unthinking.

Possibly the most astonishing piece of humbug which has been solemnly asserted in our times and widely accepted as truth was the idea sold here by the British Lord Keynes that we needn't be concerned with the size of the national debt because we owe it to ourselves. If such doctrine were true, one would think that the British, instead of working so hard to borrow $4,000,000,000 from "Uncle Sugar Able," would just borrow it from themselves—for then, according to Lord Keynes, owing it only to themselves they would not have to worry about it at all, nor would we, and everybody would be happy. It is indeed amazing that someone in Congress has not yet thought of making that suggestion not only to the British, but also to the French, Poles, Czechs, Italians, Chinese, and Russians—just to mention a few who have not yet become acquainted with the ideas of the Honorable Lord Keynes and still have the quaint idea that it is better to owe "Uncle Sappo" than themselves.

But humbug and double talk is not limited to politicians and lords. Even Walter Reuther has found the answer to economic depressions. All you have to do, according to Walter, is sustain purchasing power by raising wages and refrain from raising prices, and presto, the depression is ended, prosperity returns and everybody is happy again. It would be truly interesting if Dr. Gallup would take a poll and see just how many millions of persons actually believe such humbug, even though I fear the results as a reflection upon average American intelligence might prove to be depressing.

One could go on for hours citing examples of the humbug and double talk to which this Nation has been exposed, by simply quoting Chester Bowles, Henry Wallace, Lee Pressman, Walter Winchell, and so on. But what's the use, when an editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer so neatly summed up the matter in an editorial entitled "Are You Confused?" which reads in part as follows:

"Consider the manner in which we are fooling ourselves or others these days by calling a loose association of scrapping countries the United Nations or by referring to one who supports Russian imperialism as a liberal, or a follower in the footsteps of Alexander Hamilton as a Democrat.

"In this era of double talk, a free press is one that prints only your side of the story; an unfair practice is any legitimate step taken by a businessman to keep from losing his investment; a combination of Government measures resulting in a scarcity of goods which produces a black market is an anti-inflation program; a planned economy is urged as the only means of saving free enterprise, and any measure designed to benefit a minority group at the expense of the majority is for the public welfare.

"Propaganda is the nice things other nations say about themselves; the nice things our Government says about itself are information or education. A combination of business enterprises for the purpose of hiking prices is in restraint of trade, a combination of labor unions for the purpose of hiking wages is industry-wide collective bargaining.

"But you carry on the list. We're going out and join the CAIC."

The foregoing is all very interesting, but where and how does the peril to freedom come in? Well, almost 2000 years ago the greatest philosophic mind of all time asserted, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free", and so experience has proven it to be. As man has learned the truth about the laws of nature and the laws of God, his burdens have been lightened, his well-being has been advanced, his life on this planet has been lengthened, and his body, mind, and spirit freed. It is only as truth is banished or concealed, or mankind is deceived or kept ignorant, or mankind stupidly or perversely ignores the truth, that freedom begins to die and lose its force. Truth and tyranny were never fellow travelers and no tyranny has ever prospered in the light of truth. That's why those who would restrict or destroy freedom invariably resort to the concealing or stifling of truth through the artifice of humbug and double talk.

Today the world is confronted with the greatest conflict in its history. The conflict basically is ideological—the stake is the freedom of the individual, and in due course the United States of America will become the final battleground where the issue will be settled for generations to come. If this is true, is it any wonder that those who favor collectivism and are opposed to private capitalism, individualism and the free enterprise system have availed themselves of our freedom of speech to confuse and divide us as a people and as a nation by specious reasoning, deceptive plausibilities, appeals to prejudice, and all of the other components of humbug and double talk?

Only recently Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson, in describing Hitler's methods, spoke as follows:

"With this as a start and with all the perverted ingenuity of propaganda, which uses familiar and respected words and ideas to implant the exact opposite standard and goal, a whole people have been utterly confused and corrupted. * * * The base practice drives out the better. The cheaper, the more fantastic, the more adapted to prejudice, the more reckless the appeal or the maneuver, the more attention and excited attention it receives; and the less chance there is that we shall listen to the often difficult analysis of the facts and the always difficult consideration of duty."

Well, here are two facts that in closing I feel it my duty to leave for your consideration.

Fact 1 is that among the 7 subjects laid down for study in the second Russian 5-year plan for science was a "provision of the historical and social theory for combating the ideas of capitalism, and dissolving the prejudices which survive in the minds of people and have been transmitted from earlier forms of society."

Fact 2 are statements taken from the writings of Prof. Harold J. Laski, chairman of the British Labor Party—now in control of Britain—and the darling of the American Reds and pinks.

"I have come to learn that the private ownership of the means of production makes it impossible for the democratic idea to transcend the barriers of class without the capture of the state power by the working class. * * * The conclusion I draw from it is the necessity of a unified working class party able either to win political power or, if it meets the challenge of fascism, to emerge victorious from the conflict. * * * The time has come for a central attack on the structure of capitalism. Nothing less than wholesale socialization can remedy this position. * * * There is no answer to the philosophy of Marx."

Do you see the nature of the conflict that is upon us? Do you recognize the potency of the twin perils to freedom? Do you appreciate that the time has come for businessmen everywhere to cast out considerations of expediency and become articulate in this great and basic struggle for economic freedom and individual liberty?

There is an answer, Mr. Laski—an unanswerable answer—to the false philosophy of Karl Marx, and that answer is the United States of America and all that it stands for and has meant in human history since the day the Declaration of Independence was signed and the Liberty Bell rung and the Constitution of the United States formed, and through all the years down to this very day. For here in this great land of ours, more people have had more freedom, more opportunity, more material wealth, more education, more happiness, under private capitalism and free enterprise and the freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States than in any other country or under any other system or under any other economic or political philosophy in the world. Tell that truth to the Russians, Mr. Laski, when your good will mission arrives in Moscow—if they dare to let you speak; and tell them too, if they will let you, that the majority of the people of this country are fed up with the humbug and double talk of you and your fellow travelers in England, in Russia, and in the United States—and even within the Government of the United States—relating to the alleged wondrous glories of your foreign isms, because the majority of the people of this country are at heart real Americans who believe with all their hearts and souls that the greatest "ism" in the world is just old-fashioned, plain, every-day Americanism. And that's the truth, Mr. Laski—the whole truth and nothing but the truth. It is not humbug or double talk.

Brooklyn American Labor Party Candidate Signed 1942 Nominating Petition of Communist Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday I made the charge here on the House floor that the Communist-dominated Brooklyn American Labor Party candidate in the Twelfth New York Congressional District, Vincent J. Longhi, signed the 1942 nominating petition of the Communist Party in the New York State election that year. What do you think his answer was? I quote from yesterday's New York Times:

On the subject of communism Mr. Longhi made his own reply. Representative ROONEY had said Mr. Longhi had signed a Communist nominating petition in 1942.

"It was quite possible I signed such a petition," Mr. Longhi declared. "I signed various petitions for various candidates without committing myself to their programs."

As to Longhi being a registered Republican, the records in the office of the board of elections in Brooklyn prove he is not and never was a registered Republican. As to his being a member in good standing at the Seventh Assembly District Republican Club, I will let the captains and members of the Republican organization decide that question.

Profit Enhancement Through Compensation Incentives

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, Horace H. Hull, who is the president of the Hull-Dobbs Co., in Memphis, Tenn., is a most successful businessman. He is a man of fine character and unimpeachable integrity. He is the type of churchman who goes about his work quietly and with deep sincerity. He is what men call a man's man.

Recently he delivered a speech before the National Federation of Sales Executives at Chicago—one of the finest speeches I think I ever read. He believes in sharing interest in business with those who are associated with him. In his case it has paid substantial dividends. In addition, he has been rewarded with that which money cannot buy.

In order that my colleagues may have an opportunity to study this successful man's philosophy, I have asked and have been granted permission to insert his speech as an extension of my remarks.

It follows:

PROFIT ENHANCEMENT THROUGH COMPENSATION INCENTIVES

THE HULL-DOBBS PLAN

(By Horace H. Hull, president, Hull-Dobbs Co., Memphis, Tenn., delivered before the National Federation of Sales Executives, Chicago, Ill., May 22, 1946)

I can assure you that I make no pretenses as a platform speaker or as an orator, but I think that even though oratory is something greatly to be coveted, there are occasions and discussions which are better served by plain, simple everyday language. In such manner will I talk to you this afternoon about the subject in which we are all interested; namely, Profit Enhancement Through Compensation Incentives.

I do not think I am overshooting the mark when I make this flat statement: Soon, very soon, in fact possibly too soon for a procrastinating generation, we must definitely, resolutely and calmly decide whether America is to continue to enjoy the system of free enterprise and individual initiative that has made her the powerful Nation that she has grown to be, or turn our backs upon this system to adopt one of submission to regimentation and dictatorship by those who will become our masters and who will dictate the road we shall take and the gait at which we shall travel. You can be sure that it will be a hard and painful journey along that road, no matter how beautiful the approach be camouflaged to make it inviting by those who would entice us there. Once we enter, we will have chains tied around our ankles and loads placed upon our backs. Any sane, thoughtful man need be no prophet to visualize the misery into which this road will lead.

Should we be stupid enough to enter, after being warned, we will deserve the contempt of our forefathers and the condemnation of our progeny. On the other hand, if we decide to cling to this fine system to which we have been accustomed, then, I say, we must do more than merely make a pronouncement; we will have to work and work fast to restore the damage which already has been done, and to build additional and stronger safeguards for the future. We must work, each and all, individually and independently, as well as all together.

Today, we can see on all sides, sinister forces working with might and main to lead us from a safe, sane, and sensible existence, a happy and prosperous order, into chaos, despair, and servitude. What do you want to do about it? What will be your answer? Naturally, your first question will be, "What can we do?"

In my humble opinion, you are one class of people who can do a great deal about it, and when I refer to you, I am referring to salesmen—salesmen of every class—salesmen of products, salesmen of opinion, salesmen of sound ideas and ideals.

What can we do? I cannot tell you everything that we can or cannot do. If I could do that, I would be omniscient. I am not smart, but I do not have to be smart to tell you some things we can do. We can be honest. We can be fair. We can be unselfish. We can lose ourselves in a great cause and, in the losing, we can save ourselves and the cause too. I shall come back to this in a moment.

For about 15 years, we have heard and read much from the mouths and pens of so-called economists, who have never been in business, and who have never done anything but read and write books about how to run a business; how to run the economy of the country, and the theories of how to have more by having less.

We have been listening to and following the experts who hold that waste makes for abundance; that pigs slaughtered and made into soap put more pork chops into hungry stomachs; that one bale of cotton will clothe more people than two bales will, while a large percentage of the world's population has been, and still is, hungry and naked; that wheat dumped into the ocean makes starving nations revere and respect us.

We have listened to the demagogic preachments of "prices for plenty." No sensible man can believe that destruction of commodities to establish prices is the route to satisfying the needs of a hungry and destitute world. One year we burn corn to establish high prices. The next year, the price of corn is too high to feed to hogs, because the established price of hogs is too low to allow the hog raiser to buy corn from the corn raiser.

We have lost our vision and perception looking to the near and to the easy. We have been seeking a paternalistic and benevolent government to solve our problems. Shortsightedly and phlegmatically, we have permitted our businesses to pass into the control of a lot of swivel-chair bureaucrats who would not know a business if they met it face to face in the road. I heard of one of them who knew so little about the steel business that when advised that a concern had the bolts, but the threads were not on them, wired back, "Ship the bolts and let the threads follow."

But these are not the theories of the economist whose philosophy I adhere to.

What I shall say to you today is based upon a faith in that philosopher who expounded the greatest, yet simplest, economic theories that I have ever been privileged to examine and test by practical application.

This economist "Never wrote a book, he never held an office, he never owned a home, he never went to college. He was never in a large city. He never traveled 200 miles from the place where he was born. But the system of ethics and economics taught by him was true 2,000 years ago; is true today, and will be true forever. No man today, no matter whether he follows the doctrine of Mills, Marx, or George as to property, can find a false principle in this economist's theory of property."

I am sure that I am not exaggerating when I say that mankind has never been able, nor ever will be able, to assemble armies, navies, nor might of any description that will guarantee to man the abundance, the happiness, the satisfaction, and the hope that the application of his economic pronouncements will be able to do. The United Nations organization, without the guidance of the principles laid down by him, is as surely doomed to failure as was Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations. I am as sure as I stand on this platform that if we, as a nation, reject the philosophy and theory of economics to which I now refer, our sons and grandsons will pay for our mistake with their blood and lives upon future battlefields and their distraught and helpless mothers, wives, and daughters will look up from the remotest recesses of the earth to see hell rained down upon them in the form of atomic bombs and poison gases.

Who is this economist? I am sure that you have already guessed. He is none other than Jesus of Nazareth.

He taught that abundance comes through free enterprise and individual initiative. He taught that brains and thrift and courage are entitled to their rewards. He taught that he who could but would not work should not eat. He taught that wealth comes from saving, not from wasting. He taught that a well ordered system of industry was dependent upon brains, capital, and perspiration. He taught that no work is worth the doing that does not include the heart as a vital component of the effort. Adherence to the ideas and ideals enunciated by Him in the Sermon on the Mount would guarantee to the people of this earth peace, happiness and abundance for all. He taught how we might have the proper distribution that would guarantee these things. What was it He said? "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it," and "Therefore, whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets."

Men and nations have been breaking themselves on these laws, but they have not broken the laws. They stand today as immutable as when proclaimed. There has been no shadow of turning in them.

I know what is in your mind. You are immediately beginning to say, "We have a preacher with us."

No, I am no preacher. I claim to be only the modest peddler of Ford automobiles who is trying to find in his business the answers to some of the problems that now baffle us. While I lack a lot of having found all, I have at least found some that are sound, practical, and profitable. If we are to save our system of free enterprise and individual initiative and its accompanying rewards and benefits, including personal liberty and the right under Heaven to order our own lives, then, now is the time for action, and, my friends, I mean now.

We must be men before we become businessmen, then we will conduct our businesses as human ventures. We will then be fair, honest, clean, aboveboard, and unselfish. We are going to have to put an unbiased appraisal on the contributions that others make to the success of our businesses, as well as those that we make, in all of its phases, and, having done this, to allot the rewards accordingly. We are going to have to quit being hogs, and abandon the slogan which has long been uppermost in most people's minds that "What is mine is mine, and what is yours is mine too if I can get it." It may seemingly have worked to a degree up to a few decades ago, but it is not working now, and it is not going to work any more. We should have sense enough to realize this.

Man's greatest fear is want; his greatest ambition, security. Fear and ambition have goaded people since Adam to more desperate deeds and acts than all other emotions. Through fear and ambition, men have broken every law of God and man, and they will continue to do so as long as they are motivated by these two emotions. What we must do is to so revamp our system that the masses of people will no longer live in the fear of want or be apprehensive as to their security. For security, men will barter their freedom and resign themselves to servitude and regimentation and there are those abroad who would readily buy with counterfeit promises the power to dominate and dictate our every thought, word, and act. They prey on the weaknesses of those who yearn for security and would attain it by any method or at any price. There are still many Esaus who, ignorantly, will sell their birthrights for messes of pottage.

It is, then, up to us to evolve plans that will guarantee to the worthy (and most are worthy), this security they so eagerly desire without having to surrender their liberties and our democracy in so doing. Against fear and want, men have also the correcting instinct of ambition. Ambition is the antidote. Because of ambition, man will forget fear. We must first of all encourage ambition, but there is righteous ambition and there is the unrighteous or inordinate ambition. We must be able to distinguish between the two if we would curb the unworthy and promote the worthy. In proper balance of one man's ambition against another's, we have a contented and peaceful society, but the efforts to satisfy inordinate ambition creates hatreds, struggles, wars; it violates the laws of God and man; it establishes the power of might over right.

To find a plan to allay fear and subdue inordinate ambition is a goal worthy of our best efforts. God Almighty put His people on earth, and He put the fruits of this earth here for His people's enjoyment. We must get on the basis where these fruits can be distributed, not destroyed; where the production of men can be enjoyed by men in just proportion to the contribution that each makes to the production. There are many and diverse problems involved, but if we are unselfish and fair, we can certainly labor until we have found some sort of a satisfactory answer. We shall have to start in our own back yards. Some of us must be trail blazers or pioneers; do what is right and set the pace, and it will not be long until others will be following.

It cannot be done en masse. It cannot be done by law. It must, at first, be a voluntary step on the part of individuals and minorities—but—

"Minorities, since the world began,
Have shown the better part of man,
And oft', within the course of time,
One man or one woman hath made a cause sublime."

This country has gotten far out on the wrong road, gentlemen, and now is the time for us to turn back and take the right road, but we are going to have to turn back quickly. Might does not make right, but we can reverse it and we can be sure that right does make might. If we, as a nation of people had been inclined to do that thing that I first suggested in my opening remarks, of appraising and rendering unto each and every one compensation in proportion to his contribution, I do not believe that this country would be laboring under a $300,000,000,000 war debt. This last war has cost us the entire worth of our country. Financially, we are near the brink. How did we lose it? We lost it by endeavoring to save it. How much better off we would have been had we seen the light and had we heeded the injunction, "Do unto others as ye would that they should do to you."

What we have today in our country is a dissatisfied, discontented, antagonistic, jealous, envious nation of people, and this is true of the entire world. Race has been arrayed against race, creed against creed, the "have nots" against the "haves," and vice versa—everybody for himself and the devil take the hindmost; most people seeking to shun responsibility, most wanting the best and most, while giving the least and worst. Most rendering the least possible service for the largest reward that can be exacted and extracted. Capital seeking a hide-out while labor strikes against capital and even against its own interests, when all should be striving to secure the cooperation of labor and management and capital to the end that all may have more of everything that their combined efforts can produce. Labor has allowed itself to become a pawn in the clutches of self-seeking, greedy, avaricious, and inordinately ambitious leaders, whose only motive is to gather unto themselves prestige, wealth, and the power to dominate their uninformed followers who are dazed and confused in the search for a solution to their problems. There can be no question but that capital (and I do not apologize for the word; it is an honorable designation, and I have yet to see one man or woman who does not desire it), has put too much emphasis on its contribution to the success of business enterprises, and in many cases has sought special privilege at the expense of labor. Thus, demagogs, racketeers, regimenters, bureaucrats, Communists, and Socialists have seized upon the foibles of both capital and labor to sow seeds of discord, hate, and jealousy, to array one against the other to the end that deprivation and want, chaos and bloodshed have resulted to plague us all, whereas, by each reccgnizing its own responsibility and by discharging it, peace, prosperity, and plenty might have been our rewards. Nobody is satisfied with what he is getting. Nobody is satisfied with what the other fellow is doing, and it stems back to that greatest of all sins, "selfishness." We must eliminate the talk of this one or that one being "master." No word has ever been responsible for so much discord as that word "master." I hate it. It is an abomination. My economist says that "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." We must not attempt to be each other's masters—we must resolve to be each other's brothers. Nor was our democratic system of government conceived and brought forth to become the master of the people, but rather the servant—a government by the people, of the people, and for the people. The creature must not become greater than the creator. When the driver of a car loses control of it, he is headed for his doom. We need more attitude of the right kind. I have often said that I would rather have a man with 90 percent right attitude and 10 percent ability than the reverse.

Now, I want to tell you of the glamorous and intriguing experiences of Hull-Dobbs Co. I am only one member of this fine organization, so possibly, I may say something about the others and not be accused of egotism.

Back in 1921, Hull-Dobbs Co. was organized. My partner and I started in business to make a success and we did fairly well up to 1938. In 1938, we came to the realization that the business was not our business in toto, but it was the business of every person that was in the organization. Upon it all of us relied for a livelihood, and for the security of the future. We all had a stake in the business. It was a business in which every person in the organization should and could, under the right circumstances and conditions, have a pardonable pride and become an enthusiastic participant. And so, we decided to put our business on the incentive basis, where individual initiative, where brains and courage, thrift and industry, not only would result in greater profits to us, but likewise to everyone who made his contribution thereto.

We started in our stockroom. The manager of our stockroom was making $250 per month and his five assistants were making an average of $150 a month, the going salaries of the average men performing this work. We were doing $18,000 gross parts business per month. After raising the parts manager's salary to $350 per month, we called all the parts men together and made them this proposition. We told them that we would pay the parts manager, in addition to his salary, 1½ percent on gross sales over $18,000 per month. We told the other men that we would divide among them 5 percent on all sales over $18,000 per month.

In our service department our mechanics were working on a weekly wage scale. We put the service department on an incentive plan like that of the stockroom.

Up to that time, salesmen had received commissions only on cars that they sold. Those that were sold by the management or the house were house sales, and no commission was paid. We changed that. We said that each car carried a discount that permitted the payment of a sales commission; that the salesman's only avenue of compensation was sales commissions; that that was their part of the business; that they were entitled to it and they should have it, and from that day on, salesmen have been paid a commission on every car that has been sold.

Up to that time, it had been our custom to clip salesmen, if that be a good word. Not steal from them, no, but when they came in with a deal that was not too profitable or not as profitable as we thought it should be, we would take the deal only on the basis that they got only a part of the sales commission.

Now, let's see what has happened since, and what is happening now. Take the parts room. Sales immediately began to skyrocket when these men got on the incentive basis. They were in business for themselves. Month by month and year by year up they went, and today, we are selling more than $200,000 of parts each and every month (in the Memphis operation alone), or more than 11 times the sales in 1938. The manager, last year, made approximately $25,000, (the 1938 $3,000 man), and his assistants all made between $5,000 and $15,000 each, and all will make more this year.

What about the service superintendent and his assistant? The superintendent last year made $14,500 and his assistant $8,400. It will interest you to know that the superintendent was quite ill during the year. We sent him at our expense to Mayo Bros., then to the seashore for several months to recuperate. His salary went on just the same, but through his efforts, interest, loyalty, and industry over the years, they had increased our service business over three times that of 1938.

What about the mechanics. All working sincerely and honestly to do the very best job possible, each one being paid for everything that he does. All that is required of them is that they do the work right in the interest of the house and customer, and guarantee their work. That is their responsibility.

What about the salesmen. We have salesmen making from $5,000 to $15,000 per year. We have many salesmen, and there is not a single one of them who has owed us a dime in 8 years. Prior to 1938, we did not have a salesman who did not owe us money and who was not constantly in debt; who did not have to have advances from week to week, and who, when he got too deep in debt, moved on to some other place, and we were compelled to write off the advances. We were selling, at that time, a reasonable average number of cars, but we were not setting the world on fire. They are happy—they are working—they are enthusiastic. They work for the parts department and for the service department, and, in turn, every department works for the other departments.

What about our office. We think we have the finest office force in the country. We do not think it—we know it. We have tried to see that they were well paid. We have employees in our office who are making two or three times the amount made by employees in like offices; they are happy and they are ambitious and loyal. When the United States entered the war, we did not let out a man or woman, nor did we ever take on any war contracts. It looked very discouraging for a while, but it looked no more discouraging to us in January, 1942, than it did to everyone else in the organization. Our first impulse was to start cutting the force, but we knew that was unfair, so I decided that I would be the first man to be removed from the pay roll. We all talked it over and all of us decided to go to work, sure enough, so I didn't lose my job and none of them did either.

But, I hear someone saying, "And those fools are giving away everything they make. They are idealists, theorists, impractical."

No, sir. Not so. We did start out to try to divide what we were already making, but, of course, in the hopes of increasing the volume, consequently, the profits. What do we find? We find that today the Hull-Dobbs Co. has grown to be the largest Ford dealer in the world (I refer to the one company in Memphis); that it leads the entire world in Ford car sales, parts sales, and service work, and, to date, our people have not felt that there was any necessity for a union to protect their interests. More than that, the records of the Ford Motor Co. will reveal that, even after the rather unusual and, what might appear to be, exorbitant amount our employees earn, this company was the first in profits among 10,000 Ford dealers in the United States, even after the incentive bonuses.

Was the Itinerant Economist wrong when He said, "He that will save his life shall lose it," or to paraphrase it, He that will save his business must give it away? Our experience proves that He was right, and that in the losing, as it would appear, has been the saving.

We have another thing in which we take a great deal of pride. I do not recall a single instance in our organization of a defalcation on the part of any employee in 8 years. Is that not a most unusual thing? But should there be? There is no necessity. Our people are happy. They are contented. They live in good homes, and their families have nice clothes, and not only the necessities, but many of the luxuries of life. They are able to send their children to good schools and colleges and give them the advantages, and yet, what have Hull-Dobbs given up? Nothing! In the giving, they have made, and made more, and so far as I know, we haven't a person who begrudges us the increase. Another intriguing thing in our plan has been that we have been able to expand. We now have establishments in Louisville, Minneapolis, Cleveland, and two in Chicago, and we have men, with one exception, managing those places who came up in the organization at Memphis. They are running those businesses on the incentive plan. They are in business for themselves. We invest the capital; they the management, and they are prospering. Mind you, these places range in age from 3 months at Cleveland, Ohio, to 6 years in Chicago. They are young organizations, but every one of them is among the first five dealers in their branch territory. We opened at Cleveland, Ohio, on March 1, 1946. We were second in Cleveland in parts sales the first month. Why? Because our organization is on the incentive plan. They went into lead, and I am confident that they will always be leaders.

We never have to discharge anyone. The organization will do that. They do not allow drones around. If a man is not willing to do his share of the work and shoulder his responsibility, they show him the door. We are not bothered with that detail, and so, in our trying to do unto others as we would that they should do to us, we have found as nearly a utopia in business as we believe can be found on this earth.

There are just a few things that we require: courtesy, industry, honesty and fair dealings, not only among ourselves, but with the public at large.

And so, I say, gentlemen, when the business of this country shall have come to the realization that free enterprise and private initiative will live only through a system similar to that that we have inaugurated, then, and then only, will we be able to eliminate strikes, class hatred, envy, bad humor and distrust. Our people are able to buy the things that are offered for sale. They are able to buy many products sold by men here today that they would not have been able to buy but for the incentive plan. I maintain that this is the only way to get distribution, for distribution is dependent entirely upon purchasing power, but many of us have been too selfish and greedy to evolve and invoke the right methods to produce the greatest possible purchasing power.

If I were motivated by selfish impulses, I would not divulge to you, many of whom are my competitors, the secret of our delightful experiences—rather, it is my hope that all business enterprises will grasp the plan and put it into operation.

I believe that America is potentially the richest nation under God's sun, and could produce and distribute necessities and luxuries to all.

I believe that improper distribution of our products is the root of all of our trouble.

I believe that purchasing power is dependent upon a just, equitable and fair distribution of the profits resulting from our business and industrial ventures.

I believe that all who will work will be able to secure work, once the system of fair compensation is inaugurated and resultant distribution made effective.

I believe that a system of free enterprise and individual initiative is a guaranty of our democracy.

I believe in the absence of a plan for incentive and division of profits, we will have a government-administered economy which will reduce us to servitude, want and an intolerable existence, and that this will be followed by a dictatorship.

I believe that, if and when this purchasing power is provided, that we shall go on and on to a higher scale of living for all, and that we can lead, by example, a confused world from chaos, want, despair and distrust into a state of order, abundance, happiness, confidence and goodwill.

But we must lead the way. We have got to get the money into the hands of the people to buy with in order to keep our wheels turning. Mr. Henry Ford, that pioneer and genius of mass production, in 1914, instituted the minimum $5 a day wage. It is reported that what inspired him to do so was the realization that he could produce more cars than the public was able to absorb on the then existing wage scale, but by raising the scale, more purchasers would be brought into the market, thus allowing him to produce more cars, and when he was able to produce more cars, he would be able to produce them for less. I believe that the same theory will work in any business. We hear the "Booger boo" very often of reaching the point of saturation. I do not believe that the point of saturation could be said to exist in this world until every human being lives in a comfortable home, is well dressed, well fed, and all are in a position financially to enjoy the full production of the world. This cannot be accomplished by Government subsidies and bureaucratic mandates.

Again, I say America must lead in this, and when we shall have pioneered and blazed the trail and seen for ourselves, the miraculous results of free enterprise, individual initiative and rewards for incentive at work, we can send emissaries and ambassadors to teach the world the system that would bring plenty to them. Then, and then only, can we beat our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks. I do not believe that any other kind of ambassador or minister or representative can do anything to lead this confused world into clear thinking.

My friends, if we are to save ourselves, our families, our homes, our businesses and our country, we shall have to lose ourselves in the effort to do so. Then, I am positive that a new era will dawn for all mankind and at the dawn, we shall behold our own salvation.

Russia Fills the Vacuum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from Human Events by Felix Morley:

RUSSIA FILLS THE VACUUM

(By Felix Morley)

Over a year ago, on June 27, 1945, Human Events published an article entitled "What Unconditional Surrender Means." It pointed out that this policy, so ardently sponsored by President Roosevelt and continued for Germany under President Truman, could have only one outcome. "Unconditional surrender," this article said, obviously produces a "political vacuum" which must be filled and will be filled by that government agency "most conveniently placed and best prepared for the political operation."

The article, which our readers may check in their files, continued:

"That agency, obviously, is the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, operating through its ingenious federal formula, giving a large degree of autonomy to satellite socialist republics not yet formally a part of the Soviet Union, so long as they meet the essential condition of subordination to the general policies of Moscow. To criticize or condemn the Russians for moving into the German vacuum is as idle as it would be to condemn the wind for pouring through an open window. The westward movement of Russia is at least as much the result of our policy of unconditional surrender as it is of any imperialistic design on Stalin's part.

"That westward movement will absorb all of Germany, probably permanently, which is not garrisoned by effective American, British, and French Armies. And if those armies are withdrawn before stable government is built in the districts they hold these western parts of Germany will also come under Russian control, not because the Kremlin planned it that way but simply because nature abhors a vacuum."

While the accuracy of this diagnosis must now be clear to the most superficial intelligence, no credit for prescience is in order. Anybody with any knowledge of history and any training in political science could as easily have foreseen the Russian effort to take over Germany which is now clearly intended. As a matter of fact many close students of Russian policy had even earlier warned that this was the outcome to be expected. Thus, David J. Dallin, in his book on Russia and Postwar Europe, published by the Yale University Press in 1943, wrote (pp. 209–210):

"It will consequently be the policy of Soviet Russia, after the defeat of Hitlerism, to see Germany preserved as an important European power. Such a state of affairs is demanded not only by prospects * * * of revolutionary communism, but by realistic policy as understood by Soviet Russia, with her * * * distrust of all allies, and her satisfaction at dissension within the capitalist camp."

II

The Soviet Government, which since its origin has worked steadily in behalf of an allied Soviet German republic, has rarely concealed that aim. During the war, when Churchill and Roosevelt were maintaining that the only good German is a dead German, the far more intelligent Russian statesmanship was concentrating on the elimination of the Nazi control over Germany. As early as February 22, 1942, when the military picture for Russia looked very dark, Stalin said publicly that:

"It would be ridiculous to identify Hitler's clique with the German people and the German state. History shows that Hitlers come and go, whereas the German people and the German state remain."

And in the same order of the day to the Red Army, satirizing the bloodthirsty wartime editorials in American and English newspapers, the Russian dictator added:

"Sometimes the foreign press engages in the prattle that the Red Army's aim is to exterminate the German people and to destroy the German state. This is a stupid lie and a senseless slander of the Red Army. The Red Army has not and cannot have such idiotic aims."

Again in November 1942, presumably weary of Anglo-American obtuseness as to Russian war aims, Stalin reiterated that "It is not our aim to destroy Germany" and "It is not our aim to destroy all military force in Germany."

Even before this, Stalin had endeavored to make clear to President Roosevelt, obsessed with the disastrous formula of unconditional surrender, that Russian war aims were very different from the meaningless nonsense with which OWI and other propaganda agencies bemused the American public. As the late Harry Hopkins revealed in an important article in the American magazine for December 1941, Stalin had told him in Moscow immediately after the German attack on Russia was launched in June 1941 that Russian hatred of Hitler was not a hatred of the German people nor of the [German] General Staff.

III

It is against this background that one must consider the very important statement made by Foreign Minister Molotov in Paris on July 10, just prior to the adjournment of the last meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. Of that Russian program, which so shocked Secretary Byrnes and millions of less well-informed Americans, the New York Times said, in a plaintive editorial on July 11: "This would mean the permanent partition of Germany and the complete sovietization of the Russian zone even under the central administration to which Russia agrees."

A careful reading of the Molotov statement, against the background of Soviet Russia's constant policy toward Germany, shows that the purpose is not the partitioning but the unification of Germany, and is not the sovietization of the Russian zone alone, but that of Germany as a whole. Of course, the latter aim cannot as yet be openly announced, for it involves withdrawal of the American, British and French armies of occupation. But Russia is patient, and can afford to wait confidently for the day when the American people will grow weary of pouring money into Germany for the dubious pleasure of maintaining a purposeless army of conscripts there.

What Mr. Molotov actually said in his statement is that "it would be incorrect to adopt a course of Germany's annihilation as a state, or that of its agrarianization," as urged by former Secretary Morgenthau. What he said further is that before Russia will consent to writing a peace treaty with Germany "there should be set up a single German Government sufficiently democratic [i. e., communistic] to be able to extirpate all remnants of fascism in Germany * * *" and what he said emphatically is that:

"It should now be admitted that the peaceful industries of Germany must receive an opportunity to develop on a wider scale, provided only that this industrial development should really be used to satisfy the peaceful needs of the German people and the requirements of trade with other countries."

And, as a particularly sardonic jab at the bankruptcy of Anglo-American policy, Mr. Molotov emphasized in his statement that "the spirit of revenge is a poor counselor" in the making of permanent peace.

IV

There can be little doubt that the Governments of the United States and Great Britain have done almost everything in their power to further Russian plans for the development of a German Soviet republic, allied to and under the protective custody of Moscow. Whether or not this plan bears fruit would seem now to depend primarily on two factors over which the western allies no longer have much control.

The first of these factors is the Russian will to develop a Soviet Germany in the near future. On this subject there has certainly been a difference of opinion in Moscow. It has been argued there that German communism cannot be trusted, and that Russia should strip Germany for the industrial development of the former rather than unify and support a communistically democratic Reich as a Russian ally. The Molotov statement indicates that, while an irrevocable policy decision may not yet have been made in Moscow, the advocates of building a strong Soviet Germany are gaining the upper hand.

The second uncertain factor is the attitude of the Germans themselves. Though utterly helpless and broken, the German people are given a certain freedom of choice by reason of the developing antagonism between Russia and the western democracies. How they will use this freedom is difficult to predict, for fear and hatred of Russia are still strong in Germany and the preponderant leaning of all of Germany's cultural leadership has for centuries been toward the west.

Because of the depth of German attachment to western civilization, there is still some hope that a denazified Germany, politically united and eager to follow Anglo-American leadership, may be created. But the chances of this outcome, which would involve American insistence on a just and speedy peace for Germany, grow less daily. Russia, of course, has a tremendous advantage in the fact that a Nazi can become a Communist merely by changing his shirt, while to reeducate the German people in the ways of democracy requires at least some prior indication that Allied objectives are to restore rather than to destroy the basis of German livelihood.

The ruthlessness of British and American postwar policy toward Germany has been so pronounced, the failure to give any encouragement to democratic elements so marked, that the evident growth of Russian influence is understandable. For a people who have lost everything and to whom the prevalent Anglo-American attitude holds no encouragement, the alternative of subordination to Russia can easily become at least relatively attractive, especially if it is Stalin's settled policy to make it so.

In this connection the chorus of German acclamation for the Molotov statement, as transmitted over the Soviet-sponsored Berlin radio, is significant—the more so because much of it comes from non-Communist German leaders. One can understand the enthusiasm aroused in Berlin by Molotov's placid assertions, so different from the attitude of our own Christian leaders, in regard to the form of Germany's postwar government:

"We, the Soviet people, hold that it is incorrect to impose upon the German people a solution of this question."

Columbia River Salmon Fishery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH B. MITCHELL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 1 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1946

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a report outlining the aims of my bill, S. 2318, which has passed the Congress.

As will be noted, the legislation provides State and Federal cooperation to the end that Columbia River salmon fishery may be protected and built up in the tributaries to the lower river.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2318

S. 2318, which amends the act of May 11, 1938, authorizing an extensive program for the conservation of the fishery resources of the Columbia River, quite definitely changes the concept of the relation of the State and Federal interests in the development of fishery resources of an interstate character. Originally it was considered that problems connected with the conservation of the fishery resources of the Columbia River could be performed most economically by the Federal Government. Now it has been demonstrated that the various programs and activities relating to the development of the Columbia River Basin, at least insofar as they affect the fishery resources of that area, require the joint and coordinated attention not only of Federal agencies but also of the agencies of the States primarily responsible for the conservation and development of these fishery resources.

Presently proposed and completed hydroelectric navigation and irrigation projects in the Columbia River Basin have presented many new problems with respect to the conservation and protection of the valuable fishery resources of that area. Many of these problems already have been considered by the State agencies specifically interested therein and these agencies have cooperated wholeheartedly with the Federal Government in attempting to carry out the program of conservation originally contemplated by the act of May 11, 1938. However, these fishery resources actually are resources of the several States and it is only proper that such assistance as the Federal Government may grant in protecting and developing these resources should be coordinated closely with the plans and programs of the States. In many instances it will be more economical to utilize the facilities and services of the State agencies in carrying out these plans, but heretofore direct participation by the States has been limited under the authorizations contained in the act of May 11, 1938. The amendments made by S. 2318 will permit of a closely coordinated and economic program which is absolutely essential if the valuable fishery resources of the Columbia River are to be protected and developed properly.

A major portion of the present runs of fish of the Columbia River Basin spawn in the tributaries of the Snake and Columbia Rivers above the site of the authorized McNary Dam and above the sites of several other major dams proposed on the main river. Although every effort is being made to preserve these valuable runs, it is apparent that the best measures already developed are still in the nature of experiments, there being no assurance that these runs can be maintained in the face of the tremendous engineering developments on the Columbia River. Thus the new amendment of the act of May 11, 1938, provides a means for the States to properly assume their responsibilities in furthering a coordinated program utilizing all available means for the protection and development of these State resources.

It is anticipated that the program of protecting and developing the fishery resources of the Columbia River will require, among other things, the removal of the log jams and minor stream obstructions, the preparation of engineering plans for overcoming major obstructions such as waterfalls, rapids, and old or abandoned dams that have outlived their usefulness, the construction and maintenance of fish hatcheries and similar facilities, the screening of escapements to prevent the loss of fish, and intensive cooperative planning and investigation with a view to developing means and measures to overcome the definite losses that will follow the construction of the proposed major dams on the main river.

Report on Pan-American Highway, Panama City to Mexico City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH PETERSON
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith a detailed report on the inspection trip made by myself and others who composed the special committee to investigate the Pan-American Highway from Panama City to Mexico City.

The overland trip as described in the following report was made by Col. W. W. Zass, of the United States Corps of Engineers, War Department, who had charge of construction work for the Army on the Pan-American Highway from Mexico to Panama City, and myself. The data as herewith submitted was compiled by Col. W. W. Zaas.

Summary of mileage, inspection trip, Central America

	By railroad	By ship	By automobile	By air
Washington to New Orleans	1,116
New Orleans to Colon		1,613

San Antonio to Washington	1,652
Total	2,768	1,613	1,776	1,265
	7,422

Thursday, February 7, 1946: Little Rock. Received teletype from Office of Chief of Engineers to report in Washington on or about February 10.

Friday, February 8, 1946: Little Rock. Left Little Rock at 11:20 p. m. for Washington via St. Louis.

Saturday, February 9, 1946: En route to Washington.

Sunday, February 10, 1946: En route to Washington, arriving at 8:30 a. m. Reported to Office of Chief of Engineers in a. m.—Capt. Cline in office.

Monday, February 11, 1946: Washington. OCE. Was advised of congressional committee trip to be made over the Pan-American Highway, scheduled to begin February 18. Discussed the matter in general with Colonel McKay and Lieutenant Colonels DeBardeleben and Haffner. To Pentagon Building and State Department concerning procurement of passport.

Tuesday, February 12, 1946: Washington. OCE. References to Pan-American Highway work.

Wednesday, February 13, 1946: Washington. OCE. References to Pan-American Highway work.

Thursday, February 14, 1946: Washington. OCE. References to Pan-American Highway work.

Friday, February 15, 1946: Washington. OCE. References to Pan-American Highway work.

Saturday, February 16, 1946: Washington. Left Washington on 6:25 p. m. train via Southern Railway for New Orleans.

Sunday, February 17, 1946: En route to New Orleans, arriving at 9:30 p. m.

Monday, February 18, 1946: New Orleans. To Panama via the S. S. Florida, leaving at 11:50 a. m. Distance New Orleans to Colon equals 1,300 nautical miles. The Florida is about a 5,000-ton vessel and is carrying approximately 800 troops. The congressional party is made up as follows:

Congressmen: ROBINSON, chairman, Utah; PETERSON, Georgia; MCGREGOR, Ohio; COLE, Kansas; BEALL,[1] Maryland; and RANDOLPH,[1] West Virginia.

Consultants: Upham, ARBA; Hale, AASHO; Johnson, ASE.

FWA: General Fleming, Thos. H. MacDonald, E. W. James.

Corps of Engineers: Lieutenant Colonels DeBardeleben, Haffner, Zass.

State Department: Mr. Henry.

Tuesday, February 19, 1946: On board S. S. Florida. Some informal discussion at intervals during the day between various members of the party toward a revision in schedule, at least in part, to allow a ground trip over the work from San Jose to Tapachula.

Wednesday, February 20, 1946: On board steamship Florida. Conference in afternoon which established a ground party to traverse the routing from Panama City to La Concepcion and from San Jose to the Guatemalan-Mexican line.

Thursday, February 21, 1946: on board steamship Florida. Discussion in afternoon concerning work accomplished on the Pan-American Highway. Congressman PETERSON present throughout, Congressmen ROBINSON and COLE at later stage. On question by Congressman PETERSON developed that approximately $111,000,000 had been expended or authorized for expenditure on the work to date; this being made up in the following approximate amounts:

(1) Administered through PRA	$35,000,000
(2) Administered through United States Army	36,000,000
(3) Various republics, matching PRA funds	11,000,000
(4) Various republics, direct expenditures	29,000,000
Total	111,000,000

[1] To Panama by air.

Also that an additional appropriation was being considered to be administered through the PRA	25,000,000
To which the republics would add a matching fund	4,000,000
Total	29,000,000
Approximate grand total to complete	140,000,000

The Army cost of about $36,000,000 was discussed as well as the results achieved and Mr. James advised that the PRA considered that the value of the work which they could incorporate in the finished routing would approximate 50 percent of the cost; this being predicated on a nonwar activity basis of cost as well as the excepting of certain types of structures and also the exclusion of approximately 200 miles of routing not accepted on the inter-American routing, namely the lower level location in western Guatemala and the San Miguel-Santa Rosa location in El Salvador. This development of cost concurred in as being reasonable from a peacetime tempo point of view. In addition it was pointed out that there were certain intangibles that the Army had made available, such as access, that it was impossible to evaluate but which were of material benefit to the current progress of the work.

Friday, February 22, 1946: On board steamship Florida. Docked at Colon in the early morning and disembarked at 7:30 a. m. Party proceeded to the Hotel Washington. Left at 9:30 a. m. with Governor Mehaffey for inspection of Gatun Locks. The Governor presented a very lucid explanation of operations and outlined the study now being made of further canal enlargement, with comments on the Nicaragua and Tehuantepec alternate locations. Party were guests of Governor Mehaffey for both luncheon and dinner at the Hotel Washington. Discussion of Pan-American Highway routing by Mr. James following the luncheon. No mention of Army activities.

Saturday, February 23, 1946: Cristobal. Departed via automobile at 9:15 a. m. for Panama City, arriving at 11:30 a. m., with several stops en route. Party was presented to the President at 4 p. m. and attended reception at 6 p. m. and dinner at 8 p. m., the latter two functions being given by Ambassador Hines.

Sunday, February 24, 1946: Panama City. Portion of party to Rio Hato via automobile and return by plane. Did not make trip, as the overland group will cover the same routing tomorrow. Attended reception given by Ambassador Hines at 6 p. m. and dinner given by the PRA at their camp at Madden Dam at 8:30 p. m. The President has been present at all functions to date.

Monday, February 25, 1946: Panama City. Left Panama City at 2 p. m. via automobile en route to David, arriving at Santiago at 9 p. m. and stopping for the night. Tire trouble twice during the day. Party composed of Congressman Peterson, Mr. James, Ingnierio Tomas Guardia, and Zass. Panamanian gas tax amounts to the equivalent of 16 cents per United States gallon. Registration fees low at about $2 per passenger automobile and $20 per truck.

Mile 0, Panama City: 18-foot concrete pavement.

Mile 2, Ferry: Mile 0 to 21.

Mile 21, La Chorrera: 20-foot concrete pavement.

Mile 33, Capira: Mile 21 to 76.

Mile 75, Rio Hato.

Mile 76, End of concrete pavement and beginning of asphaltic type.

Mile 94, Penonome.

Mile 116, Nata, early 1500 church.

Mile 122, Aqua Dulce: 10- to 16-foot asphaltic type of surfacing, mile 76 to 159.

Mile 159, Santiago: Old Indian burying ground near Santiago.

Tuesday, February 26, 1946: Santiago. Left Santiago at 7:15 a. m via automobile for David and arrived at 3:30 p. m. New hotel at David, excellent, the party being the first guests. Overland party meets with plane party at David.

Mile 0, Santiago.

Mile 3, End of asphaltic type, gravel surfacing.

Mile 87, Remedios: Mile 3 to 148.

Mile 148, David: Rough, narrow, poor alinement, and grade.

Main party on inspection of road north of David as far as La Concepcion, and return to David. Army work between David and La Concepcion. Further Army work and camp north of El Volcan. Reception and buffet luncheon at Country Club in afternoon.

Wednesday, February 27, 1946: David. Breakfast at Country Club at 7 a. m. Plans of over-land party to continue from David to north of El Volcan canceled. Entire party to San Jose by plane leaving at 8:35 a. m. (7:35 a. m.) and arriving at 9:55 a. m. (8:55 a. m.). Main party on trip north, overland party remaining in San Jose. To reception and dinner in afternoon at Country Club given by Ministro de Fomento. Presidente de la Republica met party at San Jose airport, being recalled from San Isidro, where Army planes had been scheduled to land.

Thursday, February 28, 1946: San Jose. Main party to San Isidro, overland party remaining in San Jose.

Friday, March 1, 1946: San Jose. Left San Jose at 7 a. m. via automobile for Liberia, instead of 6 a. m. as scheduled, and arriving at Liberia at 6 p. m. Party composed of Peterson, James, De Bardeleben, and Zass. Breakfast at Alajuela. Speedometer of car broken.

Mile 0, San Jose.

Mile 43, Palmares.

Mile 47, San Ramon.

Mile 87, Guacinal Camp: Lunch (former Army camp).

Mile 95, Rio Lagartos: Mileage between 0 and 95 approximate. Change to jeeps at mile 95.

Mile 119, Las Canas (former Army camp).

Mile 123, Rio Corobici: Troop of white-faced monkeys.

Mile 150, Liberia: Wild turkey, deer, wolf.

Asphaltic type surfacing mile 0 to mile 43, good condition but narrow. Army executed contract with Republic of Costa Rica for widening and resurfacing mile 43 to mile 47. Poor performance. Approximately 2 miles of resurfacing completed; good condition. Approximately 2 miles of base widening completed; now in poor condition. Mile 47 is end of asphaltic type of surfacing and beginning of Army work north. Road generally completed by PRA between mile 47 and mile 95 plus, with crushed stone surfacing. Nice alinement and grade. Some several kilometers of Army work utilized, balance abandoned. No maintenance on the Army work immediately north of San Ramon. Approximately 20 miles of Army grading work north and south of Las Canas, mile 119. Lack of maintenance evident as subgrade is washed and rutted on gradients throughout length of work. No grading work between the end of the PRA work mile 95 plus and the beginning of the Army work about 8 miles south of Las Canas. None also between the end of the Army work about 12 miles north of Las Canas to Liberia.

Saturday, March 2, 1946: Liberia. Left Liberia at 6:40 a. m. for Managua, via jeep cars, arriving at 10:30 p. m. Party composed of Peterson, James, De Bardeleben, and Zass.

Mile 0, Liberia.

Mile 14, return to trail after taking wrong fork. Lost about 1 hour. Mileage reading compensated.

Mile 40, La Cruz Camp. Lunch (former Army camp).

Mile 48, rain: Sonsicuite section. Lost about 1½ hours getting jeeps through.

Mile 51, ford of the Rio Sapoa. Lost about 1½ hours getting jeeps through.

Mile 54, Costa Rican-Nicaraguan border 7:30 p. m. Intermittent rain. Survey distance Liberia to border is 49 miles. Beginning of Army work in Nicaragua.

Mile 119, end of Army work.

Mile 146, Managua.

Poor trail mile 0 to mile 54. Portion of trail on different location than former Army access. PRA survey between Liberia and border generally on Army line, with refinement of curves. Mile 54 to mile 116 well maintained, crushed stone surfacing in excellent condition. Mile 116 to mile 130 asphaltic type surfacing, well maintained. Republic has placed asphaltic type surfacing on Army work between mile 116 and mile 119. Concrete and steel structures between mile 54 and mile 119 constructed through PRA; timber truss bridges and approaches constructed by Army.

Met with main party in Managua.

Sunday, March 3, 1946: Managua. Main party to Tegucigalpa in morning; overland party remaining in Managua. Prehistoric footprints. Informal meeting with Presidente Somozo in afternoon; Peterson and Zass.

Monday, March 4, 1946: Managua. Left Managua at 11:20 a. m. via automobile for San Marcos, Honduras, arriving at 7:10 p. m. Party consisted of Peterson, James, Jones,[1] and Zass.

Mile 0, Managua.

Mile 61, Sebeco, lunch.

Mile 88, camp site at Esteli. Living quarters moved to Sebeco.

Mile 90, bridge at Esteli.

Mile 112, Rio Pirie at Condega.

Mile 116, army camp at Ducoli. All buildings in place.

Mile 133, Somoto. Retreat parade by La Guardia forces. Town crier.

Mile 136, Army camp. All buildings in place.

Mile 145, Nicaragua-Honduras frontier.

Mile 157, Camp Comali, San Marcos. Army camp now operated by PRA.

Asphaltic type pavement mile 0 to mile 61. Gravel surfacing mile 61 to mile 157. Camp buildings at Sebeco chiefly composed of structures removed from Esteli. Hospital and shop buildings still in place in Esteli. Mile 61 is beginning of Army work to the north. Consists of completed road in various sections integrated by all-weather connecting links. All being satisfactorily maintained. No work other than maintenance been performed since army demobilized. Various stops made between mile 0 and mile 157.

Tuesday, March 5, 1946: San Marcos (Camp Comali). Left Camp Comali at 7:30 a. m. via automobile for San Salvador, arriving at 6:30 p. m. Party consisted of Peterson, James, Terzian,[2] and Zass. Numerous stops en route.

Mile 0, Camp Comali.

Mile 31, Choluteca Bridge.

Mile 54, San Lorenzo, port.

Mile 63, Jicaro Galan.

Mile 88, Rio Goascoran, Honduras El Salvador frontier.

Mile 99, Santa Rosa.

Mile 125, San Miguel, lunch.

Mile 211, San Salvador.

Gravel surfacing Mile 0 to Mile 120. Asphaltic-type surfacing between Mile 120 and Mile 211. Army work in El Salvador located between Mile 88 and Mile 125, the Republic having placed an asphaltic type of surfacing between Mile 120 and Mile 125.

PRA considering the adoption of a routing between Favanna and San Lorenzo, and San Lorenzo and Jicaro Galan rather than a direct routing between Jicaro Galan and Pavanna. If routing adopted, Army work between Jicaro Galan and Pavanna to be abandoned. Work in Honduras being well maintained. Maintenance on military routing in El Salvador somewhat inferior. One three-span framed timber bent and stringer bridge east of Choluteca attacked by dry rot and middle span dropped. Mention made of other structures of native woods being similarly attacked. Also of termite infestation in some instances where untreated timber is involved.

Army work in Honduras located along entire length of routing, with completed sections made accessible by all-weather connecting links. Camp at Nacome still in place as well as material yard at Choluteca. Construction now in progress and nearing completing between Las Cabezas and El Banquito on about an 8-mile section lying between two completed army sections.

Reception at American Embassy in p. m., followed by dinner at the Casino. Marked signs of destruction visible in San Salvador due to the revolution.

Wednesday, March 6, 1946: San Salvador. Left San Salvador at 3 p. m. via automobile for Guatemala City, arriving at 12:30 a. m. Numerous stops en route. Party consists of Peterson, Terzian, and Zass.

Mile 0, San Salvador.

Mile 20, Old Mayan ruins, right.

Mile 41, Santa Ana, old church, Casino.

Mile 61, El Salvador-Guatemala frontier.

Mile 129, Rio Esclavos-Spanish Bridge 1530.

Mile 167, Guatemala City.

Asphaltic type surfacing between mile 0 and mile 61. Gravel surfacing between mile 61 and mile 167. Maintenance evident between mile 61 and mile 167 although some sections in need of attention. Army work starts at mile 61 north and is continuous except for two gaps, one in the vicinity of Asunción Mita Hill and the other in the vicinity of Limones Hill. Considerable sliding occurring on Conora Hill; being removed though in satisfactory fashion. Conora Hill work finished except for slides, although unable to determine if on Army alinement and grade. Do not believe Republic has initiated any further work on the east routing other than the finishing of Conora Hill. Current maintenance keeps work well shaped, however, on those sections on which maintenance has been recently performed and it is indicated that the program of shaping and resurfacing will be completed by the end of the present dry season. Was advised that the survey for the PRA routing would miss the current routing throughout a considerable portion of its length.

Thursday, March 7, 1946: Guatemala City. Meet up with main party. Party received by the Guatemalan Congress at 11 a. m. Luncheon at noon. Reception at Nacional Palace in afternoon and presentation to the Presidente.

Friday, March 8, 1946: Guatemala City. Main party to Mexico City in morning. Arranging details for overland party to Tapachula, Oaxaca, and Mexico City. Also, determining choice of route between Guatemala City and Tapachula. Alternate of Army work via Escuintla and Coatepeque at 2,000 feet or lesser elevation and the so-called high line via Escuentros, Totonicapan, and San Marcos with elevations of 8,000 to 10,000 feet.

Saturday, March 9, 1946: Guatemala City. Left Guatemala City at 11 a. m. via automobile for Chichicastenango, arriving at 4:40 p. m. Party consists of Peterson, Terzian, Coronel Obials, and Zass; Obials being in charge of Pan-American Highway work for the Republic. The latter advised the Republic levied a gasoline tax amounting to about 22 cents a gallon, United States, but that registration fees were low. Also advised that the Republic has expended the value of the equipment, materials, and supplies transferred to them when the Army work was suspended on the Army routing and in addition were expending further funds on this same routing as they deemed it important to complete. These expenditures, except for Conora Hill, being west of Guatemala City.

Mile 0, Guatemala City.

Mile 34, Chimaltenango, old Spanish fountain.

Mile 73, Lake Atitlan, lunch.

Mile 96, Chichicastenango.

Gravel surfaced road Mile 0 to Mile 93, maintained in fairly good condition. Mostly poor throughout length in regards to line and grade. Approximately 13 miles of grading in various stages of completion underway immediately west of Guatemala City; being cooperative work, two-thirds United States and one-third Guatemala. No other PRA construction in progress. Surveys and plans being completed throughout, both east and west of Guatemala City. Present agreed Guatemala-Mexico connection located about 60 miles north of Talisman Bridge (near Tapachula) but advices received indicate that Mexico may desire to revert to the former location at Talisman.

Sunday, March 10, 1946: Chichicastenango. Church rites of Indians. Indian marriage ceremony. Left Chichicastenango at 9:40 a. m. via automobile for Tapachula, arriving at 6:30 p. m. Party consisted of Peterson, Terzian, Obials, and Zass. Numerous stops en route. Met by American consul's representative at frontier.

Mile 0, Chichicastenango.

Mile 10, Encuentros.

Mile 34, Tatonicapan.

Mile 52, Quezaltenango.

Mile 85, San Marcos.

Mile 118, Malacatan.

Mile 126, Guatemala-Mexico frontier, 5:45 p. m.

Mile 138, Tapachula.

Gravel-surfaced road mile 0 to mile 126. Maintenance satisfactory, poor line and grade. Army routing followed from mile 118 to mile 126. Asphaltic type of surfacing mile 126 to mile 138.

Monday, March 11, 1946: Tapachula. Met with American Consul in morning. Left Tapachula at 12:15 p. m. via plane for Oaxaca, returning after take-off and leaving again at 12:30 p. m., arriving at Oaxaca at 3:45 p. m. Distance, 386 miles. Landings made at Tuxtla and Ixtepec. Advised that Pan-American Highway routing between Oaxaca and Ixtepec had been completed, surfaced with gravel, and that the grading between Ixtepec and Tuxtla was well advanced and open to normal automobile traffic. Section between Tuxtla and Tapachula not developed and practically impassable.

To Monte Alban (Indian ruins dating back into the pre-Christian era) in the afternoon. Party consists of Peterson and Zass.

Tuesday, March 12, 1946: Oaxaca. Left at 6 a. m. for Mitla via automobile and returned to Oaxaca at 10 a. m. Site of old Indian ruins. Met with Governor of State of Oaxaca after return from Mitla. Party consists of Peterson and Zass. Left Oaxaca at 1 p. m. via automobile for Pueblo, arriving at 8:30 p. m.

Mile 0, Oaxaca.

Mile 268, Pueblo.

Asphaltic-type surfacing between mile 0 and mile 268 except for about 20 miles of gravel surfacing in central portion. Much mileage of heavy work involved. Good location. Well maintained. Greater portion through mountains, sparsely settled. Little traffic.

Wednesday, March 13, 1946: Pueblo. Left Pueblo at 12 noon via automobile for Mexico City, arriving at 2:50 p. m. Party consists of Peterson and Zass. Met with United States Ambassador in afternoon.

Mile 0, Oaxaca.

Mile 268, Pueblo.

Mile 356, Mexico City.

Asphaltic-type surfacing between mile 268 and 356. Good condition, well maintained. Heavy traffic. Good location. Charge for car from Oaxaca to Mexico City, 500 pesos ($104.16), approximately 30 cents per mile. Necessitated through previous arrangements for Government transportation being upset, and impossibility of making new arrangements within a period of 36 hours.

[1] Jones, Chief Engineer Departmento de Carreteras, Republica de Nicaragua.

[2] Terzian, Bridge Engineer, Public Roads Administration.

Thursday, March 14, 1946: Mexico City. Left Mexico City at 12:50 p. m. via Army plane for San Antonio, arriving at 4:35 p. m. Distance by air, 720 miles. Party consists of Peterson and Zass.

Friday, March 15, 1946: San Antonio. Peterson to Atlanta via railroad at 3:30 a. m. Final split-up of party. Excellent trip. Left San Antonio at 8 a. m. by railroad for Little Rock, arriving at 12 midnight.

Saturday, March 16, 1946: Little Rock.

Sunday, March 17, 1946: Little Rock. To Washington via St. Louis by railroad, leaving Little Rock at 9 p. m.

Monday, March 18, 1946: Arrived St. Louis at 7:30 a. m. En route to Washington.

Tuesday, March 19, 1946: En route to Washington. Arrived at 9 a. m., 1½ hours late. Reported to OCE.

Résumé of Army work, Central America—Approximate mileage constructed

	Completed	On location line, serviceable but not completed	Tractor trace on location line	Connecting links, all weather, but not on location line
North Panama	28.94	0.24	24.45
South Costa Rica	0.32	0.93	8.70
North Costa Rica	33.74	2.17	1.90
South Nicaragua	64.52
North Nicaragua	41.45	20.84	0.72	20.29

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to insert in the RECORD a letter from ex-Senator Robert L. Owen dealing with the outstanding work he has done on the adoption of the global alphabet:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 31, 1946.

Hon. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY,
Member of Congress,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: Permit me, before you adjourn, to express my appreciation of your services to the people of the United States, and especially for your address of June 21, 1946, on the importance of making English a world language, in which you cited the endorsements of the global alphabet and the mechanism for teaching the world quickly to read and understand English as currently printed. May I not confirm your faith by a few additional citations which I deem of importance?

For example, Mr. A. E. Giegengack, Public Printer, United States Government Printing Office, whose office deals with over 100 foreign languages, said that my plan for teaching the world to read and understand English as printed contained "revolutionary potentialities."

Rev. Frank Charles Laubach, Ph. D., director of the Committee on World Literacy and Christian Literature, representing the foreign mission societies of 25 American religious denominations since 1930 has taught over 90 nationalities to write their own language in a simple phonetic alphabet. There is no higher authority on the use of phonetic alphabets than Dr. Laubach, who wrote me recently:

"I have repeated many times my judgment that the global alphabet is the best alphabet yet devised."

Mr. E. C. Ropes, head of the Russian Division of the United States Department of Commerce, said:

"After careful study, I believe that your Global Alphabet provides a quick and intelligent system for eliminating the language barriers that now exist in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Dr. Shou Hsin Liang of the Chinese Embassy who translated our phrase book and glossary into Chinese said:

"I was pleased yesterday to have Dr. Meade read me 16 pages of the Chinese Phrase Book written in the global alphabet, and which I had no difficulty in interpreting as she read it. Considering that Dr. Meade has had no instruction in pronouncing Chinese and pronounced the Chinese words entirely from the global symbols, I consider this the best possible proof of the efficacy of the global alphabet in writing Chinese."

Mr. Chau Wing Tai, of the Office of War Information, speaking of the global alphabet, said:

"I had a talk with Senator Owen some time ago about the global alphabet invented by him and was highly impressed by it. I think that it is the very thing that now-a-day China needs in order to facilitate and expedite the education of the great mass of her illiterates.

"I have studied the sample sheet very carefully and have come to the conclusion that the system provides all signs necessary to cover all the sounds of the Chinese spoken languages.

"By utilizing this system, a student of Chinese may save many years of hard study in order to master the Chinese written language."

Dr. R. Walker Scott, professor of Japanese, Trinity College, Hartford, and 10 years in Tokyo University, Japan, said:

"I see no reason why the global alphabet could not easily be applied to Japanese. Japanese sounds are clear and simple, in fact, as clear as and very similar to the ancient Roman pronunciation of Latin. Japanese could be written in the global alphabet more easily even than English or French. The Japanese are in sad need of a simple alphabet. The average Japanese boy spends about 7 years in school before he can read an ordinary newspaper with any kind of ease, so difficult are the Chinese ideograms in which he writes."

Mrs. Rose Ettinger, born in Russia, has prepared the Russian phrase book and glossary in the Russian language.

Mrs. Anna Gordon, born in Germany, prepared the German bilingual text of the phrase book and glossary.

It seems unnecessary to add that I have submitted the global alphabet to hundreds of educated men and public officials of high standing, and your emphasis of the importance of making English a world language I value.

The phrase books and glossaries would enable the Russian or Chinese to make a world language of their own native tongue, if they desired to do so. I should rejoice to see them teach the Russian and Chinese languages to the whole world as a further means of establishing mutual understanding and good will.

My objective is to increase the production of commodities and services throughout the world and make this a world of abundance. This policy will increase the value of the products of the people everywhere, including the value of the products of the people of Oklahoma.

Thanking you for your friendly cooperation, I remain,

Sincerely your friend,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

How Much Money Has the Government Paid on Your Grocery Bill?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, a large percentage of the people in this country are not aware of the fact that the Federal Government, out of funds collected in taxes and the sale of bonds, has paid out more than $4,000,000,000 during the past 4 years to help pay a part of the grocery and meat bill of every American consumer. There has been no discrimination in this respect. Wealthy persons with incomes over $100,000,000 a year like the Garsson firms, now being investigated by a congressional committee, and the low-income individuals who receive $15 per month old-age assistance, have all received the same kind of financial assistance from the United States Treasury, to help pay on their individual grocery bills. Of course, the people with large incomes, who could spend more money for food and choice meats, received greater financial assistance from the Treasury on their food bills, than those with low incomes. This inequitable scheme, which was wholly unwarranted and unnecessary, was instituted by the late President Roosevelt over the protest of Congress.

After President Truman killed price control during the last days of June with his veto of the price-control bill approved by a majority in Congress, the country returned to a free economy wherein the law of supply and demand began to function after 4 years of Government control. The President's veto also eliminated subsidy payments for the consumers' food bills, and many people felt that the rise in prices on foods was excessive. Most consumers did not take into consideration that in many instances the price increase was not in excess of the amount of the subsidy paid by the Treasury.

The purpose of this statement, together with the tables to follow on subsidy payments by the Government to consumers, will be to disclose the actual facts on price increases since July 1, 1946, the date when OPA died at the hands of the President.

One must not overlook the fact that prior to June 30 at least 80 percent of the meat sold in this country was sold at black-market prices, which were far in excess of the OPA ceiling price. In this respect I call your attention to the following article and table of prices, which appeared in the New York Sun on July 29, 1946:

BOX SCORE OF CITY'S FOOD PRICES

Most meats continued in liberal supply in retail markets today, and there was a noticeable improvement over the week end in the quantity of veal. Pork prices were down slightly in several stores, although the price range for most varieties of meat was virtually unchanged. Increases of 3 to 5 cents a pound for chicken were noted in some stores, although supplies were reported plentiful.

Fresh and processed fruits and vegetables were technically under the new OPA price controls today, as were mayonnaise, black pepper, chili sauce, jam, and jelly. The ceilings of June 30 were in effect on these foods, although OPA price charts were not displayed in the stores pending a price revision expected August 1.

Below is a comparison for various foodstuffs of OPA ceilings, black-market prices, the week-end costs, and what was being charged today. In reading them it should be remembered that Federal subsidies to producers ended with the OPA for dairy products and meat, and the equivalent had to be added to retail prices. The sums were 13 cents a pound for butter, 2 cents a quart for milk, 5 cents a pound for domestic Cheddar cheese, and for meats amounts arrived at by complex formula which averaged roughly 6 cents a pound.

	OPA price range	Black market price range	Week end price range	Today's price range	Present supply
Butter	$0.67	$0.95	$0.69–$0.85	$0.73–$0.83	Plentiful.
Sirloin steak	.40- .46	.95- 1.25	.55- 1.10	.60- 1.00	Do.

Leg of lamb	.38- .45	.90- 1.10	.45- .75	.46- .75	Good.
Loin of pork	.33- .36	.80- 1.00	.45- .60	.43- .60	Do.
Pork chops	.31- .40	.85- .90	.44- .70	.48- .60	Do.
Hams	.35	1.00	.49- .76	.55- .65	Very scarce.
Bacon, sliced	.42- .43	.75- 1.00	.47- .69	.48- .69	Fair.
Chickens (dressed)	.51	.65- .80	.42- .64	.47- .65	Good.
Fowl (dressed)	.44	.60- .70	.42- .58	.42- .55	Do.
Milk (in store)	.16	None	.19- .22	.19- .21	Plentiful.
Eggs (Grade A)	.55	None	.55- .69	.55- .67	Do.
Cream cheese (3 oz.)	.12	.15	.12- .17	.12- .16	Good.
American Cheddar	.43- .48	.60- .65	.43- .69	.55- .69	Very scarce.
Evaporated milk	.12	None	.11- .15	.11- .15	Plentiful.

To illustrate how much, in dollars and cents, the consumers' food subsidy amounted to, when the subsidy was discontinued by President Truman's veto of Federal subsidy payments, and the additional cost of food was transferred from the United States Treasury to consumers' pocketbooks, I am citing a few examples of food prices in Washington, D. C., on August 1, 1946, which prices were taken from the leading food store advertisements appearing in the Washington Star as of August 1. It must be remembered that prior to July 1 the Government sold bonds and collected taxes to pay the consumers' subsidy, as listed below, on every individual's grocery bill. Under the law as it stands today, in the case of meat and dairy products, every consumer pays his entire grocery bill—no taxes or bonds are sold to help pay it, and nothing is left for future generations to pay on the food that you buy and consume today.

Washington Evening Star advertisements, Aug. 1, 1946

Commodity	OPA ceiling price June 30	Average Government subsidy	Total cost to Government and consumer	Retail price Aug. 1, 1946, no subsidy
Butter, pound	$0.65	$0.13½	$0.78½	$0.69
Bread, loaf	.10	.01	.11	.10
Chuck roast, pound	.26	.124	.384	.38
Rib roast, do	.29	.124	.414	.42
Sirloin steak, do	.41	.12	.53	.63
Porterhouse steak, do	.49½	.135	.63	.69
Round steak, do	.39½	.20	.595	.69

Coffee, do	.30	.03	.33	.30
Milk, 2 quarts	.30	.038	.338	.31

All meat AA or A Government grade.

It should be noted that prior to June 30, 1946, it was not possible to buy either meat or butter at most of the food stores. These commodities were only available in the black market, whereas, after control had ceased to exist, an abundant supply of meat and butter is freely offered for sale at all food stores at prices, which in many instances are less than the OPA ceiling price plus the Government consumer subsidy.

It will be of interest to study the following table of Government consumer subsidies on individual items of food:

Estimated subsidy on food items, June 30, 1946

[1] The failure of the OPA to agree on actual consumer subsidies paid, between the different branches of the agency on meat and dairy items, has made necessary the inclusion of the average cents subsidy actually allocated by the industry on the various cuts according to OPA allocations, taking into consideration 5 cents per pound roll-back on meats. The actual subsidies are listed as follows, as consumer subsidies paid by the Government:

	Grades

[2] Dairy products: The Dairy Branch of the OPA advises me as of June 30, 1946, the consumers subsidy on butter is 14.58 cents and on milk 1.9 cents, while the Research Branch of the OPA lists the subsidies as 12.0 cents on butter and 1.3 cents on milk. The dairy industry has calculated the subsidy on butter at approximately 15 cents and 2 cents on bottled milk.

The following table shows the important part that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation took in the consumer subsidy program:

Reconstruction Finance Corporation, direct subsidies on foods, cumulative since commencement of programs, actual payments through July 20, 1946

	Amount
Livestock slaughter program	$1,508,930,031
Butter production program	183,314,390
Flour production program	332,604,590
Coffee program	34,370,242
Sugar distribution program	24,990,185
Total	2,084,209,438

The following table on price control subsidy payments giving totals of $4,369,135,407, discloses the amount your Government has paid out in food subsidies during the consumer subsidy program:

Bellamy Sees Attlee; Pays Britain Honor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the sixteenth of a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called A Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

We flew very comfortably from Rome to London, arriving at the Bovington airport on the afternoon of April 28.

I said to myself quite fervently, "Thank God I am home among my own people."

For the British, although they get on our nerves terribly at times, have given us most of our ideas about liberty and we gave them back a few of our own. They gave us our language and we have changed it and adapted it to the uses of a new country. They gave us our bringing up, and now we are in a position to help them in their old age.

I never felt that Britain had any monopoly on the British constitution, on Magna Carta, on John Milton, or Shakespeare. I always felt they were as much my constitution, my Magna Carta, my John Milton, and my Shakespeare as they were Britain's.

They put up our party at Claridge's, which came through the blitz very well, although there were heavy hits on either side of the building. The old-style magnificence, however, is still in evidence and the service is excellent. Whereas in Germany, in spite of the best efforts of the Army, it was hard in certain places to get towels and soap, and the plumbing often would not work, in Claridge's everything was shipshape; in fact, very elegant.

The next morning I had a call from Commander Rodney Sutton, of the United States Navy, formerly of Cleveland, and husband of our columnist, Eleanor Claridge. Rodney doesn't know just when he will get out of the Navy. He thought he was out once, and they recalled him. He turned out to be one of the most valuable public-relations officers in the whole show. He, too, was hungry for news of Cleveland and fairly overburdened me with the weight and fervor of the love he wanted to send his wife.

Accompanied by several other members of our party we took a taxi the next morning and went through the blitzed part of London, which is down below St. Paul's, which itself was damaged, and along the docks. London got it pretty badly in the blitz, but with our help repaid the damage one hundredfold.

One could not help noticing the difference in the cleaning-up job which had been done in England as compared with the mess still underfoot in Germany. In one respect it may be the difference between the victorious and the vanquished, and I suppose that has a good deal to do with it. But the British people certainly have plenty of resilience left in them.

BRITISH GIRLS CHIC

The first afternoon we were there it was very rainy, and yet the British girls, some without umbrellas, and all with pink complexions, walked up and down the street looking at shop windows as carefree as a bird. And they were good looking and chic, too; the best-looking that I saw in Europe. Even my beloved Paris could not come up to London this time. Paris seemed a little duller than ever before, the result undoubtedly of the long occupation by the Germans and short rations since.

The most illuminating flash I saw in Paris was a class of school children being dismissed at noon from school. The class was divided into 2 parts, one of little boys, headed by a priest; and the other, little girls, headed by a nun. It would make your hearts sad to see how thin and pale were their faces. Another of those little flashes, not in itself important, but illuminating the whole scene, was at the Folies Bergeres, which I attended with an officer of the United States Army public-relations office. I noticed for the first time that the chorus girls' costumes were soiled and mussy, which had never been the case in the old Paris.

FEARS FOR FRANCE

Much as I love France, I doubt if it ever comes back as a first-class power, and much as I fear for England's present financial and economic outlook, I think Britain will, given time and help from the United States.

The high spot of our stay in London was a private interview, off the record, with Mr. Clement Attlee, Premier of Great Britain, at 10 Downing Street. Because, as I have said, the interview was off the record, I cannot report his conversation, but I can tell about the setting.

We attended the Prime Minister at 4 p. m., and were ushered into his office by his secretary. Present also at the interview was Lord Addison, minister for the Dominions, and several private secretaries. Mr. Attlee took us into the cabinet room, where I noticed only one photograph, that of the worst corruptionist who ever ran the government in Great Britain—Robert Walpole—and I asked why the picture was there. The answer was quite sufficient and it was that Walpole was the first Premier to live at 10 Downing Street.

Mr. Attlee asked us to step into the garden with him, because the afternoon was lovely and it was rather stuffy indoors. We spent the next three-quarters of an hour in a circle around him, asking about the policy of the British Labor government.

I had heard that Attlee is dull and colorless and that he is, compared with Churchill, but who wouldn't be? But that he is a deep student of politics and government and an efficient operator, there is no doubt whatever, in my mind.

From others, but not from him, I got the impression very definitely that the Labor government is not going to pull any punches in proceeding with socialization of industry. Its plan includes the nationalization of telegraph, telephone, main transportation lines, steel, textiles, coal, and the use of the land, by which I mean that, although the Government does not intend to buy the land from its owners, it will exercise its right to say what use shall be made of the land, and if a duke has a large acreage remaining out of cultivation, the Government is likely to order it put into cultivation, or to serve as a site for a public-housing project. The position of the government is that there is still room for private entrepreneurs to play around in, provided these essential industries and services are conducted by the people for the people.

Many Americans certainly do not agree with this and would hold that, given control of these industries and services, the rest would not offer enough incentive to a private entrepreneur.

REHABILITATION NEEDED

I asked several highly placed Englishmen why the Government had pressed for nationalization of steel, just at the time when the British loan was at its crisis in the United States Congress. The answer was that the rehabilitation of the steel industry was essential to the rehabilitation of British industry as a whole and that the Government felt it could not wait any longer. In addition to this, I learned that because of the pressure from some of the back seaters along this line, the Government had to act when it did, and it was also pointed out that if the loan could be got through Congress in spite of the steel announcement, the whole thing would turn out better in the long run than if the loan had been secured and the steel announcement made later.

The setting of our interview with the Prime Minister was exceedingly lovely. The garden back of 10 Downing Street is a square spot of greensward, around the edges of which are beautiful beds of tulips. The building, time-worn and shell-pocked, told a mute story of Britain's struggle against the latest attempt from the Continent to enthrall her. Likewise did the monuments of imperial glory down by the Abbey, not only the great church itself, but the Houses of Parliament and the heroic bronze equestrian statue of Richard the Lionhearted, whose sword in his upraised right hand, badly bent by the explosion of a heavy bomb nearby, will never be straightened, as a token that Britain fought on, though a less-courageous nation would have felt in its heart that "the jig was up."

We all felt that the stay in England was a fitting climax to our trip and that the trip therefore ended on the right note.

Equal Rights for Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend and revise my remarks, I include an editorial on equal rights for women recently appearing in the Christian Science Monitor, and written by Mary Hornaday:

ANOTHER WAY TO WOMEN'S EQUAL RIGHTS

(By Mary Hornaday)

WASHINGTON.—After personal interviews this past year with vigorous young women of the resistence in Italy, France, Greece, and Yugoslavia, I arrived home in Washington just in time to watch the United States Senate vote down the equal-rights amendment to the Constitution.

This will take some explaining to the women of Europe, most of whom have a glorified idea of the status women have attained in these United States. It can be explained.

Maybe the Senate was right, despite the fact that members of both parties went against their 1944 party platforms in opposing the amendment.

Ever since 1923 Alice Paul and her National Woman's party have been trying to get Congress to initiate such an amendment. The objection of Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and others has been that the amendment would automatically wipe out all protective legislation for which laboring women have fought several decades.

Finally last Friday, 23 years after it was introduced, the equal-rights amendment reached a vote. The Senators gave it a majority vote, but not the necessary two-thirds.

The Senators admitted there are still certain discriminations against women on American statute books in the matter of property ownership, child guardianship, and other legal rights, but more than a third took the view that these should be removed by the State legislatures rather than at the national level.

Presumably the equal-rights amendment is now dead, but does this necessarily mean that American women must be relegated to the horse-and-buggy path of reaching their God-given right of equal contribution to the world's progress? Just recently another Federal amendment has been proposed by a brand-new group known as the Committee of American Women, affiliated with the Women's International Democratic Federation which held its foundation congress in Paris last November.

This amendment seems to a nonlegal expert like myself, to give women not only the rights insisted on by the Woman's Party but the privileges sought for them by Mrs. Roosevelt and her followers.

It says, "There shall be no economic, legal, political or social discrimination because of sex or martial status in the United States of America or Territory subject to its jurisdiction. Nothing in this article shall be so construed as to invalidate or prevent enactment of legislation benefiting women in their work or family status."

Drawing up their amendment in a recent New York conference Mr. Gifford Pinchot and other members of the CAW hailed it as marking "a new era of unity for all American women."

The aims of the new amendment are understandable to the women of Europe who would have puzzled long over the ins-and-outs of the old equal rights contest in which American women have participated for over 20 years. Senator Borah used to tell the women who buttonholed him, "Go home and get together on what you want, and the men will give it to you." But the women never got together.

Inspiration for the new amendment comes not primarily from American women but from women of the resistance in Europe. Most European women today have a more simple, clear-cut view of the necessity for greater economic and political privileges than American women. In the United States equal rights has become almost a shibboleth.

In Europe, women know they must get busy politically and economically if their children are to be fed, educated, and given a stable enough family life to enable them to live peacefully with their fellowmen in years to come. In Europe, this is a necessity, not a choice. There is little striving for equality for its own sake as there has been among some American women.

Women of most European countries are now voting for the first time in their history. Women of America have a 27-year head start in political equality, and women of England even a longer one. There is still a chance Anglo-American women will lead along the path of economic equality, but they won't do it merely by killing off such zealous efforts as that of the National Woman's Party without taking a more effective step.

A new era of unity among American women can grow out of the Senate defeat.

Statement by American Veterans of the Philippine Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELLIS E. PATTERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, American assistance to the heroic Filipino people who are suffering profoundly from the ravages of the war is a principle that no patriotic American can deny. We owe a debt which cannot be measured in dollars and cents to our loyal allies who saved so many American lives during the difficult years of guerrilla anti-Japanese warfare in the Philippines.

Many of the Filipino guerrilla fighters, notably the Hukbalahap, are today the victims of a reign of terror initiated by President Manuel A. Roxas. Peasants in central Luzon are being shot down, with arms and weapons contributed to the Philippine Army by the United States Army. Under these circumstances allocation of funds to the Philippine Government headed by President Roxas, as proposed in the pending Bell bill, must be questioned, since these funds may be utilized for the promotion of an undemocratic campaign of extermination against men and women who aided America in the war against Japan.

I should like to call the attention of the House to a petition submitted by American veterans who fought with the United States Army. This has been brought to my attention by the National Committee To Win the Peace, headed by that great American hero, Brig. Gen. Evans F. Carlson, of the Marine Corps' famed Carlson's Raiders. I ask for unanimous consent to insert this veterans' petition in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In the light of the facts brought forward by these veterans I urge that no funds should be allocated until peace is established in the Philippines, until the campaign of extermination against the peasants of central Luzon is called to a halt.

The United States Congress cannot contribute and lend support to the massacre of innocent people.

STATEMENT BY AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE PHILIPPINE CAMPAIGN (AFFILIATED WITH THE COMMITTEE FOR A DEMOCRATIC FAR EASTERN POLICY AND THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE TO WIN THE PEACE)

We, veterans of the United States Armed Forces who served in the Philippines, salute the Hukbalahap (People's Anti-Japanese Army), leading Filipino guerilla organization, and condemn the present campaign against it.

We are part of the countless American servicemen and servicewomen who are alive today because of the heroism and self-sacrifice of the Hukbalahap and other Filipino guerrilla fighters. That is a debt we shall never forget.

For more than three years the Hukbalahap were a constant thorn in the side of the Japanese. The Hukbalahap alone killed more than 25,000 Japanese, spies and traitors, and fought over 1,200 engagements with the enemy. Many towns and villages in central Luzon were liberated by the Huks without the firing of a single American shot. It was the Hukbalahap which provided the major forces for the thrilling attack which liberated the American prisoners of war at Cabanatuan.

Expressing the sentiments of many American fighting men, Major General Decker, Chief of Staff of the United States Sixth Army, declared that the Huk is "one of the best fighting units I have ever known."

The Philippines are the only dependency in the Far East which produced a large guerrilla army; yet we continue to maintain great concentrations of American troops in the midst of this friendly, allied people. American arms have been loaned to Philippine armies directed by former collaborators, and the Bloom bill (H. R. 6572), now law, proposes further arms to the Philippine armed forces. These arms are being used to terrorize the Huks. The Associated Press reported on May 5, 1946, that armed searching parties were roaming the countryside for Huks.

Manuel Roxas, elected president of the Philippines, thanks to United States intervention in his behalf, refuses to seat the Hukbalahap and Democratic Alliance leaders elected to the new Philippine Congress.

Tomas Confessor, famous guerrilla leader and new minority leader in the Philippine Senate, declared in May: "Fascism now is on the march in the Philippines. The majority party Senators in the opening session, determined to curtail the rights of the minority, have taken pernicious anti-democratic steps."

GI's now stationed in the Philippines, at a meeting in May of the Manila chapter of the American Veterans Committee, adopted a resolution paying tribute to the Hukbalahap as the representatives of "the finest sons of the Filipino people." They condemned the Fascist attack of Filipino MP's on the Filipino people and appealed to the American people to bring the campaign of "Fascist oppression in the Philippines to an end."

As ex GI's who have learned the truth about the state of affairs in the Philippines first hand, we endorse the appeal issued by the servicemen now in Manila.

We call for an immediate end to the drive to wipe out the Huks, a drive being conducted by Filipino MP's with American arms, who are still under the jurisdiction of the United States Army.

We urge the prompt withdrawal of United States armed forces from the Philippines; we urge the defeat of the Bloom bill, H. R. 6572.

We urge the withdrawal of American aid and assistance to the Fascist forces, led by President Roxas, in the Philippines.

American Shipbuilding Suffers From Shortage of Material That Goes to Foreign Shipyards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 31, 1946

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it would seem from recent announcements that the present administration does not appreciate the importance of maintaining our American shipyards as a means of providing employment for the thousands of skilled workers engaged in that industry, nor as an important part of our national security.

Recently an announcement was made by the Maritime Commission that the President had ordered it to discontinue its plans for building five postwar passenger ships. The reasons given by the President were the necessity to conserve Federal funds and the shortage of materials.

This action by the President was surprising in view of the fact that the Navy Department had recommended to the Maritime Commission the building of these speedy and up-to-date ships. They were to have been so constructed that they would have been readily convertible into troop transports to meet any emergency that might hereafter suddenly occur.

It is all the more difficult to understand this action of the President because, at about the same time he gave that order, the State Department gave its approval of an Import-Export Bank loan to Chile to enable it to purchase steel in the United States for the construction of five freight vessels to be built in England. And the exportation of this steel was given the approval of the Civilian Production Administration.

If we have steel to export to a foreign country for the building of ships, then, why is it necessary to prohibit the building of ships by the Maritime Commission in our own shipyards? While American shipyards are being closed down and workers dismissed for lack of business we supply material that foreign shipyards may continue. This is neither fair to our ship workers nor justifiable from the standpoint of national security.

Our national interest requires that our shipbuilding industry must be kept alive and efficient during times of peace if it is to meet the requirements of times of emergency. Our experience in both World Wars should teach us this lesson. We cannot afford to again take the risk that results when we permit our shipbuilding industry to deteriorate. It is our duty to encourage and strengthen this important industry that is such an important part of our national security.

Townsend Bills H. R. 2229 and H. R. 2230

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted, I include in an extension of my remarks a letter received today from the Townsend Legislative Bureau, of Washington, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 1, 1946.
Hon. PAT CANNON and Hon. HOMER D. ANGELL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In behalf of the Townsend organization and Dr. Francis E. Townsend, the Townsend Washington Legislative Bureau wishes at this time to express their appreciation to you, the sponsors of the Townsend bills H. R. 2229 and H. R. 2230, as well as to the members of the action committee and to all Congressmen who have put forth their efforts in behalf of these bills.

We wish also to express our appreciation for the courtesy shown by Members of Congress and their offices, to this legislative bureau.

While we have not had the opportunity of having our bills voted on by Congress, the membership of the Townsend organization has expressed themselves in many letters received at this office that they are really going forward and come what may, they will not stop until the Townsend plan is enacted.

We trust that our friends in Congress will have a pleasant vacation and a successful election.

Most sincerely,
TOWNSEND WASHINGTON LEGISLATIVE BUREAU,
MRS. J. A. FORD, Director.

Confédération Internationale des Sociétés d'Auteurs et Compositeurs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SOL BLOOM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, the Confédération Internationale des Sociétés d'Auteurs et Compositeurs will meet in the city of Washington, October 21 through October 26, 1946, and its sessions will be held in the Library of Congress:

CONFÉDÉRATION INTERNATIONALE DES SOCIÉTÉS D'AUTEURS ET COMPOSITEURS

The Confédération Internationale des Sociétés d'Auteurs et Compositeurs was created in 1926 with headquarters in Paris, at the initiative of the French Society of Dramatic Authors and Composers, of which André Rivoire was then president and Robert de Flers, honorary president.

Annual congresses were held during the followings years: 1926, Paris; 1927, Rome; 1928, Berlin; 1929, Madrid; 1930, Budapest; 1931, London; 1932, Vienna; 1933, Copenhagen; 1934, Warsaw; 1935, Seville; 1936, Berlin; 1937, Paris; 1938, Stockholm; 1946 (March), Paris.

The presidents of the confederation since its foundation are given below:

Messrs. Robert de Flers (1926–27), Vincenzo Morello (1927–28), André Rivoire (1928–29), Ludwig Fulda (1929–30 and 1930–31), Pietro Mascagni (1931–32), Charles Méré (1932–33 and 1933–34), Eduardo Marquina (1934–35), S. E. Dino Alfieri (1935–36 and 1936–37), Charles Méré (1937–38), Richard Strauss (1938–46), and Leslie Boosey (1946–47).

Prior to 1927, the confederation was composed only of societies of dramatic authors and composers. In 1927, it extended its scope to cover nondramatic societies (second federation), and modified its structure in 1932 so as to include societies for the rights of mechanical reproduction (third federation). At the Congress of Seville (1935), it was decided to add to the three federations already in existence, a fourth federation called Fédération des Sociétés des Gens de Lettres."

The following is a list of the officers of the four federations since 1930–31:

1930–31

Confederation: President, Dr. Ludwig Fulda (Germany); vice-presidents, Eduardo Marquina (Spain) and Célestin Joubert (France); honorary general secretary, Denys Amiel (France); general secretary, René Jeanne (France).

First federation: President, Eduardo Marquina (Spain); vice presidents, Eugène Heltai (Hungary) and Luigi Chiarelli (Italy); secretary, Paolo Girodani (Italy).

Second federation: President, Célestin Joubert (France); vice presidents, Leo Ritter (Germany) and Eugène de Huszka (Hungary); secretary, Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

1931–32

Confederation: President: Pietro Mascagni (Italy); vice presidents: Charles Méré (France) and Leslie Boosey (England); honorary general secretary: Denys Amiel (France); general secretary: René Jeanne (France).

First federation: President: Charles Méré (France); vice presidents: Hans J. Rehfisch (Germany) and Wladimir Welmar Jankovitch (Yugoslavia); secretary: Paolo Giordani (Italy).

Second federation: honorary president: Célestin Joubert (France); president: Leslie Boosey (England); vice presidents: Bernhard Herzmansky (Austria) and Kurt Atterberg (Sweden); secretary: Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

1923–33

Confederation: President: Charles Méré (France); vice presidents: Umberto Giordano (Italy) and Bernard Herzmansky (Austria); honorary general secretary: Denys Amiel (France); general secretary: René Jeanne (France).

First federation: President: Umberto Giordano (Italy); vice president: Mr. Goldbaum (Germany) and Waclaw Grubinsky (Poland); secretary: Paolo Giordani (Italy).

Second federation: Honorary president: Célestin Joubert (France); president: Bernhard Herzmansky (Austria); vice presidents: Peder Gram (Denmark) and Georges Krier (France); secretary: Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

Third federation: President: Alfredo Colombo (Italy); vice presidents: Max Butting (Germany) and Francisco Alonzo Lopez (Spain); secretary: Jean-Jacques Bernard (France).

1933–34

Confederation: President: Charles Méré (France); vice presidents: Heinz Bolten-Baeckers (Germany), Léo Lelièvre (France), and Alfredo Colombo (Italy); general secretary René Jeanne (France).

First federation: President: Heinz Bolten-Baeckers (Germany); vice presidents: Dr. Wenzel Goldbaum (Germany), Waclaw de Grubinski (Poland); and gino Rocca (Italy); secretary: Paolo Giordani.

Second federation: Honorary president: Célestin Joubert (France); president: Léo Lelièvre (France); vice presidents: Mario Labroca (Italy), and Dr. José Forns (Spain); secretary: Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

Third federation: President: Alfredo Colombo (Italy); vice presidents: Max Butting (Germany), Francisco Alonso Lopez (Spain), and Josef Haftman (Poland); secretary: Jean-Jacques Bernard.

1934–35

Confederation: President: Eduardo Marquina (Spain); vice presidents: Romain Coolus (France), Léo Ritter (Germany), and Alfredo Colombo (Italy); general secretary: René Jeanne.

First federation: President: Romain Coolus (France); vice presidents: Joaquin Guichot (Spain), Gino Rocca (Italy), and Dr. Hans Fritz von Zwehl (Germany); secretary: Jean-Jacques Bernard; honorary secretary: Paolo Giordani.

Second federation: President: Léo Ritter (Germany); vice presidents: Mario Labroca (Italy) and Victor Vreuls (Belgium); secretary: Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

Third federation: President: Alfredo Colombo (Italy); vice presidents: Kurt Atterberg (Sweden), Dr. Eugène de Huszka (Hungary), and Dr. Alfred Kalmus (Austria); secretary: Hans Geiringer.

1935–36

Confederation: President: S. E. Dino Alfieri (Italy); vice presidents: Henri Kistemaeckers (France), Bernhard Herzmansky (Austria), Joaquin Guichot (Spain), and Féderico Oliver (Spain); general secretary: René Jeanne.

First federation: President: Henri Kistemaeckers (France); vice presidents: Felix Bermudes (Portugal), Caton Theodorian (Rumania), and Emiel Hullebroeck (Belgium); secretary: Hans-Fritz von Zwehl (Germany).

Second federation: President: Bernhard Herzmansky (Austria); vice presidents: Hugo Rasch (Germany), José Forns (Spain), and Stéphane Chapelier (France); secretary: Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

Third federation: Honorary president: Alfredo Colombo (Italy); president: Joaquin Guichot (Spain); vice presidents: Antonin Cejka (Czechoslovakia), Hans Martin Cremer (Germany) and Lemoine (France); secretary: Hans Geiringer (Austria).

Fourth federation: President: Federico Oliver (Spain); secretary: Lino Ferreira (Portugal).

1936–37

Confederation: President, Charles Méré (France); vice presidents, Emilio Bodrero (Italy), Paul Graener (Germany), Adam Wieniawski (Poland), and Jean Vignaud (France); general secretary, René Jeanne; assistant general secretary, Ugo Gheraldi.

First federation: Honorary presidents, Henry Kistemaeckers (France), Heinz Bolten-Baeckers (Germany); president, Emilio Bodrero (Italy); vice presidents, Leo Lenz (Germany) and Jenö Mohacsi (Hungary); honorary secretary, Paolo Giordani; secretary, Hans-Fritz von Zwehl.

Second federation: Honorary president, Stéphane Chapelier (France); president, Paul Graener (Germany); vice presidents, C. A. Wiessing (Holland), G.-F. Malipierro (Italy), and Eugène de Huszka (Hungary); honorary secretary, Alpi Jean-Bernard; secretary, Ugo Gheraldi.

Third federation: Honorary president, Alfredo Colombo (Italy); president, Adam Wieniawski (Poland); vice presidents, Rudolf Sieczynski (Austria), Lemoine (France), Paolo Giordani (Italy), and Th.-O. Seeger (Germany); secretary, Hans Geiringer.

Fourth federation: President, Jean Vignaud, (France); vice presidents, G.-O. Stoffregen (Germany) and Luigi Bonelli (Italy); secretary, René Jouglet (France).

1937–38

Confederation: President, Charles Méré (France); vice presidents, Emilio Bodrero (Italy), Paul Graener (Germany), Adam Wieniawski (Poland), and Jean Vignaud (France); general secretary, René Jeanne (France); assistant general secretary, Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

First federation: Honorary presidents, Henry Kistemaeckers (France) and Heinz Bolten-Baeckers (Germany); president, Emilio Bodrero (Italy); vice presidents, Leo Lenz (Germany) and Jenö Mohacsi (Hungary); honorary secretary, Paolo Giordani (Italy); secretary, Hans-Fritz von Zwehl (Germany).

Second federation: Honorary president, Stéphane Chapelier (France); president, Paul Graener (Germany); vice presidents, C.-A. Wiessing (Holland), G.-F. Malipierro (Italy), and Eugène de Huszka (Hungary); honorary secretary, Alpi Jean-Bernard (France); secretary, Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

Fourth federation: President: Jean Vignaud (France); vice presidents: G.-O. Stoffregen (Germany), and Luigi Bonelli (Italy); secretary: René Jouglet (France).

1938–39

Confederation: President: Richard Strauss (Germany); vice presidents: Giorgio M. Sangiorgi (Italy), Leslie Boosey (England), Edgar Bielefeldt (Germany), and Jean Vignaud (France); general secretary: René Jeanne (France); assistant general secretary: Ugo Gheraldi (Italy).

First federation: Honorary president: Kurt Atterberg (Sweden); president: Giorgio M. Sangiorgi (Italy); vice presidents: Alex Madis (France), Leo Lenz (Germany), and J. J. Cadenas (Spain); honorary secretary: Paolo Giordani (Italy); secretary: Hans-Fritz von Zwehl (Germany).

Second federation: Honorary president: Stéphane Chapelier (France); president: Leslie Boosey (England); vice presidents: Saul Bornstein (U. S. A.), Léo Lelièvre (France), G.-F. Malipiero (Italy), Max Trapp Germany) and N. O. Raasted (Denmark); honorary secretary: Alpi Jean-Bernard; secretary: Ugo Gheraldi.

Third federation: Honorary president: Alfredo Colombo (Italy); president: Edgar Bielefeldt (Germany); vice presidents: Mario Labroca (Italy) and Eugène de Huszka (Hungary); secretary: Wolfgang Mann.

Fourth federation: president: Jean Vignaud (France); vice presidents: Luigi Bonelli (Italy), Jerzy Boczkowski (Poland), and Félix Bermudes (Portugal); secretary: René Jouglet.

At the conference of Paris in March 1946, an Organizing Committee of the Confederation was appointed, composed of the following: Leslie Boosey, president of the Confederation; René Jouglet, general secretary; Miss Madeleine Baugniet, general delegate; W. J. Rudnicke, secretary of the first federation; Marcel Henrion, secretary of the second federation; C. A. Wiessing, secretary of the third federation; René Jouglet, secretary of the fourth federation; Valerio de Sanctis, president of the legislative committee; John Paine, president of the second federation; Adolf Streuli, delegate to the organizing committee for European affairs; G. H. Hatchman, commissary for accounts.

H. R. 7039

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 7039 has been approved by the House and Senate and provides certain benefits to personnel of the armed services engaged in training duty prior to official termination of World War II. This is the direct result of the alertness of the Air Reserve Association through its executive director, William C. Lewis, and is for the protection of Reserve personnel in a hiatus period during which they are not fully protected while giving their services for their country.

Present laws protect reserve personnel with certain death and physical disability benefits during active wartime service and during training in peacetime. The period that is not covered is the training period after the shooting war is over and after having been placed on inactive duty but before the official termination of World War II. In other words, it covers the time that we are actually, but not officially, at peace.

This gap in the law was discovered by the executive director of the Air Reserve Association and he called my attention, and the attention of the Military and Naval Affairs Committees of Congress to it. Because their committee schedules were not as crowded as those of the Military Affairs Committees, the Naval Affairs Committees of the House and the Senate were able to report this legislation out first.

This legislation is but another example of the effective work of the Air Reserve Association for the benefit of Air Reservists and other reserve personnel for more than a decade. Such progressive and constructive work has been led by William C. Lewis since 1938 when he inspired the first legislation granting broad training benefits to Air Reservists and others.

The Real Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BYRNES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a new House of Representatives will convene in these chambers next January. The composition of that House will be determined by one of the most significant elections ever to be held in this Nation.

The candidates in that election have a remarkable opportunity to present to the people a single, clear-cut and definitive issue. It is my hope that that issue will not be confused by demagogery and insinuation. The stake in that election is too high to permit of pettiness and obtuseness.

That stake is the future course of the United States. The issue is simply this: To what extent should the Federal Government extend or reduce its control over the national economy?

I want to discuss briefly the implications of that issue and to outline the principles upon which I will stand for reelection to the Eightieth Congress. I do this in the hope that every candidate will take a forthright stand upon this all-important question, that they will present a clean choice to the voters of the Nation, and that, by so doing, they will help prevent the confusion and indirection that has characterized the national political scene for too many years.

The temptation to impose further controls upon our economy is not only great but ever present. Let us create another agency, some say, and we will give you low prices; give us another law, they plead, and we will give you higher wages; give us this control, and we will guarantee you steady jobs; pass this legislation, and we will insure you food, houses, and clothing.

All of us want fair prices, adequate wages, and steady employment. All of us would like to see the Nation well clothed, well fed, and well housed. If, however, by instituting complete Federal control over the economy, we could bring these things about permanently, I would still fight the imposition of that control with the last breath I possessed.

What the planners fail to tell us is this: There is a price that must be paid for these improvements. The price is the loss of our liberty.

Federal control of the economy might give us lower prices, but only if the Government can tell us where, when, and in what quantity we can make, buy, and sell the essential commodities.

Federal control might give us steadier jobs and higher wages, but only if the Government can tell us when and where we will work and how much we shall individually produce.

Federal control might give us more food, more houses and more clothing—but only if the Government can tell us where and when and how we shall eat, dress and live.

Federal control might, and I still speak hypothetically, do all of these things—but only if the Government is economically all-powerful, if its power is vested in a single head, and if we are willing to trust that head with our personal freedom, our unalienable rights, and our blood-won liberty.

Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy and Soviet Russia temporarily succeeded in raising the standard of living of the people by seizing control of all phases of the economy. Will the theorists point with pride at the prices those peoples have paid and are paying for those earthly benefits?

If you believe, as I do, that complete Federal control means complete loss of the right to carve out our own destinies, if you believe it means, as I do, the imposition of control, not only over our economy, but over our freedom of action and movement as well, then listen to a word of warning.

That control will not be imposed upon us by revolution and bloodshed. We Americans are too quick to recognize tangible foes. That control will be imposed subtly and gradually, with our own consent, under the guise of benevolence, humanity, and paternalism.

The sirens, even now, are singing their sweet song:

"Inflation threatens. Give us a law, a bureau, some money, and the power to control it."

"Men are underpaid. Give us a law, a commission, some money, and the power to control it."

"Racial prejudice is rampant. Give us a law, a commission, some money, and the power to control it."

"Men are unemployed. Give us a law, a bureau, some money, and the power to control it."

Bureau upon bureau, commission upon commission, control upon control, and power upon power, the advocates of the superstate, using as their tools the misled zealots of paternalistic liberalism, quietly lay the foundation for the final imposition of complete Federal control and the final loss of liberty in this land.

I have fought and will continue to fight the imposition of more needless Federal controls, urged in the name of emergency and humanity. I have fought and will continue to fight for the reduction of present unnecessary Federal controls.

I will fight against this extension of power, not only because of its grave threat to our liberty, but because of the corrupting byproducts of the continuing centralization of power. Listen to these words:

> By ignoring principles and the lessons of history, and accepting the theories of men and political expedience for our guidance, we have made vassals of our States and dependents of our people.
> By concentration of governmental power and drafts upon the Federal Treasury, we have now a financially busted, great piled-up mass of governmental confusion, impossible of democratic control, extravagant, wasteful, inefficient, and by its nature, the instrumentality of favoritism, tyranny, oppression and corruption, and the destroyer of the self-reliance and self-respect and governmental capacity of the people, qualities without which no people can remain free.

That is a statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], a Democrat, when he announced his intention to retire from politics recently. I concur in it.

The seekers of more control call those who fight it reactionary. They have some justification if the opponents of Federal control blind themselves to the social responsibilities of government and if their approach to basic human problems is purely negative. Therefore, let me briefly outline my positive political beliefs.

I believe in the competitive capitalistic system. It has and it will continue to provide more jobs, higher wages, and more goods at a lower price than any system devised since the beginning of recorded history.

I believe in a virile, efficient, and economical Federal Government, operating within the framework of the Constitution, under just and fairly administered laws, and alert to promote the general welfare.

I believe in a Federal Government responsive to the will of the people rather than a people responsive to the dictates of government; hence, I believe that the Government should be returned to the people, through their duly elected representatives, and taken away from the appointed minions of the executive branch.

I believe, with Jefferson, that a people are best governed who are least governed. I do not believe that the passage of a bill will cure problems similar to racial prejudice, drunkenness, and religious intolerance, which can only be solved in the human heart through education and enlightenment.

I firmly believe that the solution of our social problems is a most proper responsibility of government, but that in their solution, we must ever be conscious of the first responsibility of government—the protection of the individual and his basic rights. Hence, I believe further that the first responsibility for the solution of social problems rests with the State and local units of government, who are closest to the problem and to the people, and who are our bulwark against the centralization of power. Only where a problem is general in nature, where it assumes a standard pattern in all localities, where uniformity of treatment is advisable and necessary, and where it cannot be met by local units of government, should the Federal Government act. In all others, the role of the Federal Government should be advisory and cooperative rather than administrative and punitive.

I believe, in sum, in a strong and united republic taking its rightful position of leadership in a world which seeks a just and permanent peace.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the principles which will guide me.

The Road Back—To Peace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the pattern of Soviet aggression has unfolded relentlessly, and with steadily increasing speed during the past 12 months since the surrender of the Japanese on the deck of our battleship, the Missouri.

The pattern was evident long before that, and for the past 14 months on the floor of this House, within the limitations there are on debate here, and given the fact that Soviet Russia had been officially our associate, I have tried to keep before my constituents the trends of communism at home and abroad.

I have laid such stress upon this situation because I believe firmly that, as John Foster Dulles expressed it;

> The most urgent task of American statesmanship is to find the policies which will avert a serious clash with the Soviet Union. There can now be little doubt that such a clash is a possibility. Indeed, the more closely Soviet policies are studied, the greater does that danger appear * * * Soviet leaders assume that peace and security depend upon quickly achieving world-wide acceptance of Soviet political philosophy, which suppresses certain personal freedoms in the interest of achieving social harmony.
> The personal freedoms which they would take away constitute our most cherished political and religious heritage. We have, in the past, fought to defend them when they seemed in jeopardy. The methods which Soviet leaders use are repugnant to our ideas of humanity and fair play.
>
> It would be foolish to rest our hope of peace on any genuine reconciliation of our faith with that now held by Soviet leadership. The differences are fundamental. But peace does not require that men everywhere accept a common faith, as Soviet leaders seem to believe. Peace can prevail, despite our differences, if Soviet leadership will abandon the intolerant methods by which they now seek to eradicate those differences.
> That is a practical goal. Soviet leaders are shrewd and realistic politicians. If we demonstrate to them that our freedoms have such vigor and worth that to uproot them is an impossible task, we can expect that they will, as a matter of expediency, desist from methods which cannot succeed and which probably will provoke disaster.

The mistakes in American high policy which have encouraged Soviet leaders to speed up their seizures during this first postwar year, are now fairly well known to all but the most isolated Russophiles. Yet even many of those who know and recognize the facts continue to do so by examining separate items, ignoring the over-all pattern and its obvious implications.

Mr. William C. Bullitt, one of the earliest and most eager friends of Soviet Russia, expresses the basic error of American policy vis-à-vis the Soviets most succinctly in his book, The Great Globe Itself, when he says:

> The primary task of American military policy in Europe was to sustain the powers that were fighting against Hitler. The primary task of American foreign policy should have been to make certain that the defeat of Germany would liberate fully from all foreign tyranny, Nazi or Soviet, the independent states which existed in Europe before Hitler began his career of conquest by seizing Austria in March 1938.

The fact that we failed to do that probably comes from a curious and very American misconception of the purpose and meaning of war. As Mr. Bullitt says, elsewhere in the same book:

> War is not a prize fight. The winner does not go home from the ring and receive a purse. Military effort unaccompanied by equal political and moral effort produces no constructive result. Power in international affairs is a fleeting thing. The most justifiable use of power is to forward the growth of moral ideas. It was in the interest not only of the United States, but of all the Allies and all the peoples of the world—the Russians included—that we should use our power to make certain, so far as humanly possible, that at the close of the war the peoples of Europe and Asia would find liberty and peace.
> Mr. [Harry] Hopkins' failure to demand of Stalin a specific written guarantee with regard to Europe was the first of many similar omissions which finally led to the conflict at the Conference of Foreign Ministers in London in October 1945. The second brilliant opportunity to promote our interests, and those of Europe and of peace, while aiding the Soviet Union came—and was not seized—when Mr. Averell Harriman and Lord Beaverbrook conferred with Stalin from September 26 to October 1, 1941. Stalin then asked for an enormous quantity of war matériel of all sorts. Mr. Harriman accepted most of Stalin's demands, but did not ask for any commitment from Stalin with regard to Europe.

Surely, warning against a continuation or repetition of such a policy cannot be clearer, particularly when the results that policy has brought about are so plain.

Last year I traced the pattern of Soviet expansion in a series of inserts in the RECORD, which included the records of the personnel of the various puppet governments set up under Red army guard in eastern and southeastern Europe. These regimes were chiefly manned and absolutely dominated by graduates of Communist international training schools, all of whom had had postgraduate work in practical revolutionary techniques, such as the liquidation of all political and religious opposition and the establishment of dictatorships holding authority from the Kremlin.

This pattern for Europe I had compiled and printed in a pamphlet called Leaning Over Backward in Europe. The title came from a statement made in June 1945 by the then Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Joseph C. Grew, when he described United States foreign policy as "leaning over backward to avoid giving offense to the Soviets."

Later on, last year, Mr. Byrnes provided another apt description of our foreign policy in his public report on the failure of the London Conference. Mr. Byrnes' phrase was: "We have not been unduly exacting as to the pledges given us by Russia."

Very recently, however, Mr. Byrnes has struck a more optimistic note. In his report on the July 1946 Conference of Foreign Ministers in Paris he said—and without giving the exact basis for his new assurance—"that we are now on the road back to peace."

Few conscientious observers doubt that we are, indeed, on a road back to somewhere. But there are as many reasons to fear it as a road back to war as there are to hope, with Mr. Byrnes, that it is a road back to peace.

For my constituents and others who may want to study the pattern by which the foundations of all our futures are being fixed, I am compiling another final collection of factual reports gathered under the general title of "The Road Back to Peace?"

This last compilation will include the warnings of many of my colleagues in this House, as well as those I have chosen on the subject; and, the careful reader will find that none of those included are of the group often—perhaps, unfairly—called professional and habitual Red-baiters. My fellow Cassandras are unhysterical, but troubled plain Americans, who have been chosen by citizens of their various districts to look in all directions from this Hill, and to report on what they see that may concern the present or future security of the United States, and the welfare and freedom of all its citizens and guests.

Homes for Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK L. SUNDSTROM
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. SUNDSTROM. Mr. Speaker, the problem of finding homes for the veterans and their families is the most pressing issue facing our Nation today.

As a Member of the Seventy-ninth Congress, I have been pleased to support several housing bills. I have also voted favorably on appropriations bills for housing, totaling many millions of dollars, in a sincere effort to assist in the veterans' housing program. Instead of more laws and legislation at this time, I believe we need less red tape and regulation and a more realistic approach by those administrators charged with this responsibility.

The necessary relief must be forthcoming now. The veteran wants a home, not a promise. One veterans' organization, through its officials, recently made the following comments in a Washington paper regarding the housing program:

> The officials accused the administration and all its bureaus of a lack of frankness with the American people by claiming that the WET bill is a veterans' housing measure "when this is not the fact."
>
> On the basis of having had more contact with Federal housing officials than any other veterans' organization they said:
>
> "We have reason to lack confidence in certain of these (housing) officials. We remember that these NHA officials 'sat out' 4 years of war and 8 months of postwar, some with occupational draft deferments. We remember that these officials guessed wrong on the postwar needs of the country and denied building priority permits to private builders on the grounds that many cities, including Washington, were already overbuilt.
>
> "TOO MUCH REGULATION
> "The veterans housing program already suffers from too much Government regulation for the successful operation of the free enterprise system and too little regulation for the successful operation of the socialistic system.
>
> "We believe that the veterans' housing program will be best served if NHA officials will concentrate on getting houses under the ample legislation now existing, rather than by devoting time and manpower to lobbying for additional legislation."

Worthy Efforts in the Battle Against Cancer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, cancer is such a terrible disease that has scourged the world in all generations we are glad that in this age when science has made such great advances that we are encouraged to think that the time will soon come when we can successfully combat this scourge.

I am glad to print as part of my remarks an article written by Rt. Rev. Msgr. James H. Cotter, L. L. D., Litt. D., a very distinguished scholar and churchman from my home city of Ironton, Ohio. In this article Dr. Cotter writes of the accomplishments of a distinguished scientist against cancer:

> THOUGHTS
> (Specially written for the Irish World by Rt. Rev. Msgr. James H. Cotter, LLD., Litt. D.)
> CANCER UNDONE
> The Irish World takes off its hat, makes its bow, and tenders its most profound congratulations to Dr. George Speri Sperti, director of the Institum Divi Thomae, founded 11 years ago by the Most Rev. John T. McNicholas, Archbishop of Cincinnati.
> The American Medical Association at its annual meeting in San Francisco paid glowing tribute to Dr. Sperti and the Institutum Divi Thomae before its thousands of doctors hungering for the cure of humanity's arch enemy, dreaded cancer. To the delight of the medical men, Dr. Joseph C. Amersbach of the skin and cancer clinic of Columbia University of New York City, took the floor and announced for the first time in history the curing of 39 cases of skin cancer by the tissue extract substance, discovered by a genius that humanity will ever extol—Dr. George Speri Sperti. Thunders of applause greeted the glorious news, only a presage of the myriads of mankind that will ever bless the name of the discoverer.

Dr. Sperti received the benedictions on his name with that humility ever expressive of his spiritual character, readily noticed by his friends. Although ranked high in his profession as one of the seven members of the Pontifical Academy of Science and decked with the Catholic Action medal and Mendel award, he has never exploited himself. His life has been immersed in thought and his tongue has never lost itself in vanities. We hail with joy this benefactor of men. His discovery will never cease to bring thanks and praise from a world that, until this blessed hour, well-nigh despaired to outwit cancer.

What honor, too, he brings to the Catholic faith, a faith, repudiated by the thoughtless, to be an enemy of science. He has shown that science is the handmaid of religion for deeply learned, he knows what is really true in science must be true in religion and vice versa.

With heartfelt gratitude for your discovery, Dr. Sperti, I join the universal acclaim.

We Should Have a New Policy Toward Our Friend, China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to invite the attention of the Congress and the American people to the present American policy toward China.

The United States should have a new policy toward our friend and ally, China.

The first thing I want to say is that our great General Marshall is doing an impossible and probably a very wrong thing in China. I do not think any single person in this world can successfully put Communists together with other political elements. Soviet Russia is a good example.

General Marshall is working on a plan of putting Chinese Communists in the Chinese Government, while we Americans and this Congress are keeping American Communists out of our own American Government. Is this a reasonable policy and a realistic one?

The American leftists say that the Chinese Communist Party is a liberal party, not the type of Russian Communist. A few Chinese experts of our State Department held this point of view 1 year ago, although they have changed their opinions now. We must realize that all Communists and Communistic ideologies come from Soviet Russia. There is no exception of Chinese Communists. Communists all over the world, believe that Russia can do no wrong.

The Chinese Communist leader, General Chow En-lai even appraised Russian policy in Mongol and Manchuria. They would rather sacrifice their fatherland for their political headquarters—Moscow. Our American Communists get their political inspiration from Moscow also.

Let us, as Members of the Congress, and American citizens, think of what will happen when the armed and fighting Chinese Communist Party succeeds in China. Can we Members of this Congress of the United States expect any free trade, free enterprise, and free press in China? The American citizens would not be able to do anything in China if the Chinese Communist Party, through the force of armed might, dominates China. Who is furnishing the Chinese Communist Party with the munitions of war with which to wage a war against the regularly constituted Chinese Government which the United States has pledged to assist in the effort to maintain a true peaceful democracy? Not only that, once the efficiently armed Chinese Communist Party conquers the regularly constituted Chinese Government—which the United States has recognized—the whole of Asia would become Soviet Russia's sphere of influence.

Do we Americans, and does the Congress of the United States like this kind of business of pushing the Japanese out of China and then let the Russians take over Asia? Is this the aim of our American policy in this World War II?

It seems we have no other alternative, either the United States must help Gen. Chiang Kai-shek clean up the armed Chinese Communists, under certain conditions, or the United States withdraw our troops out of China. Do we like to go back to isolationism? If not, I say to every Member of the Congress, and to every American citizen, we must take some prompt and constructive action. The consequence of our failure of stopping Japan in Manchuria in 1931, was the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941. Does the Congress of the United States want history to repeat itself? We Americans want to see a free and democratic China, but not a Chinese Tito Government. The situation of China at this time is very grave. We probably have no time to hesitate. The United States has recognized the Government of Gen. Chiang Kai-shek and we are morally pledged to help China. What are our conditions in helping Chiang? When should our Government call General Marshall back to the United States? Please let me answer that second question first. I do not believe General Marshall can ever achieve his mission if his mission is really that of mediator between the Chinese Nationalist Government and the armed Chinese Communist Party. We better call General Marshall back. It is no use for him to stay in China any longer. The more time General Marshall wastes in China, the more complicated internal affairs and the internal situation becomes in China.

I have no prejudice toward the Nationalist Government of China. If my judgment is not wrong, the Chinese Nationalist Government cannot survive under its present inefficient administration. The first condition to constructively help China, I would like to say, is to officially and very firmly ask Gen. Chiang Kai-shek to do his governmental housecleaning work immediately. Many Chinese people hate the United States because our Government supports the most unpopular Kung and Soong families. We must make it clear to the Chinese Government and the Chinese people that we American do not have any particular interest in any particular Chinese citizen. We are interested in bettering the horrible condition of the millions of undernourished and underfed poor citizens of China. Simultaneously, the American Government should also ask the Soong brothers and Kung's wife and children to leave the United States. We should not let these money squeezers—who bleed the wealth from the poor classes of China to have expensive good times at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York when the majority of the 400 millions of Chinese are underfed and are dying from starvation. An action of this kind is not only the most efficient method to curb the armed Communist Party offensive movement against the regularly constituted Government of China, but it will also show our great faith in the Chinese people. And it must be done quickly. It might be too late if we allow a few months delay.

Unfortunately, most Chinese high-ranking Government officials are questionable politicians and selfish creatures. Take for example one well known Chinese politician by the name of Sun Fo, the son of Sun Yat-sen, the founder of the Chinese Republic. He is doing his best to build up his popularity in the United States. Some American newspaper correspondents call him a symbol of Chinese liberals. We know very well about his strong attitude toward Japan in 1937. But few American people know the absolute fact that he sent all of his children and his wife to the United States when China was fighting Japan. Sun also used his political influence to get his son out of the American draft. Our American Department of State probably has his son's record on this matter. Can we Americans trust this kind of a politician to patriotically and efficiently serve the cause of true Democracy in China? I don't mean to say that all Chinese are no good. In fact there are many millions of good Chinese men in China. They are very anxious to do their part for their country. Unfortunately this good group of Chinese citizens are oppressed by the bad political influences in and outside of China. We Americans should use all of our power and good influence to back up and substantially support this good group. Otherwise sooner or later, the Chinese Communist party, through the force of armed might, will dominate China and we Americans will suffer the consequences.

In other words, China needs political new blood badly. We Americans should help her to build up this new blood. There is no choice. Shall we Americans constructively work out a concrete plan to carry out this idea? We must do it for our great friend—China. Once we have a practical concrete policy we should concentrate our effort to carry out this policy. No matter how much it will cost us. A high price is always worth while to be paid in doing and accomplishing a right thing. It will be too late to regret if we lose our Chinese friendship to Russia. I say to my colleagues of the Congress, please do not pretend to be smart and informed on what is happening in China. Please do not let us fool ourselves, in that we are not interfering with Chinese internal affairs. The problem of today is how can the United States work it our more efficiently, so that the Chinese Communist Party can be disarmed, peace restored in China, and the 400,000,000 Chinese citizens be given an opportunity, under a democratic form of government, to banish famine and armed strife within their country—so that China might once again be peaceful and prosperous.

Radio Address of Hon. Irwin Steingut

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW L. SOMERS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a radio address made by the Honorable Irwin Steingut, minority leader of the New York State Assembly, on Thursday, July 25, 1946:

Equality of opportunity for all people, regardless of race, color, or creed, is a cardinal principle of American democracy. Still it is another one of those domestic problems we keep deferring. It is our very unwillingness to discuss equality of opportunity, especially equality of higher educational opportunity to all who are qualified, that makes it an indictment against all of us.

Some people take it for granted that peace is something that comes automatically after a war. But you and I know that it isn't so. The fighting war is over, that's true. But the peace, which must be made, is something we have to work for, build and cherish.

One of the problems of the peace is to provide a full measure of equality of opportunity. Let's face the facts: People are discriminated against on the basis of their color, or the manner in which they worship. People are not given jobs because their skin is black or yellow, because they are Jews, Catholics, or Protestants. Too often the test for a job is not the applicant's qualifications. Discrimination, in too many instances, starts in some of the universities in New York State. Young men and women are denied the opportunity to study the arts, the sciences, and the professions only because they are born to parents of foreign ancestry or because their religious beliefs differ from that of the universities' governing boards. This is particularly true of the medical schools in New York State. Qualified students are denied admission to medical schools here because of the existence of a quota system which is predicated upon Hitler-like racial prejudices and religious bigotry. To deny the opportunity to study for a career for which a youth is qualified, is to fortify and perpetuate an un-American condition not in keeping with our love for freedom and democracy.

I am deeply concerned about those war veterans, and the recent graduates of high schools, and those who will be graduated in the future, all of whom are entitled to enter a university if they are qualified scholastically. I am deeply concerned about those youths who are now being stymied, and will continue to be stymied, in their efforts for higher learning, because of their race, color, or creed. I am deeply concerned about those who are prevented from training for professions because of limited finances.

With these thoughts in mind, I introduced a bill at the recent session of the New York State Legislature for the immediate establishment of a New York State university. This State university is to be built and conducted by the State of New York to enable youths with the necessary scholastic qualifications to study the arts, the sciences, and the professions. A student's race, color, or creed is to be of no concern to the university. If a qualified student cannot afford to pay the tuition fees, that student shall be admitted regardless of his financial position.

It is indeed a sad commentary upon the richest State of the Union, New York, to be the one and only State in the entire United States that does not have a State university of its own. The New York State university I propose would stand as a bulwark against the discriminatory practices of Columbia University. The New York State university I propose would enhance the position of a university like Fordham, which although a Catholic institution, yet admits without discrimination of any kind students of all religious beliefs. It is your job and mine to see to it that a New York State university is created without any unnecessary delay. Unless this State university is created at once, many of our war veterans and high-school graduates will not be able to enter college at all. The New York State university I propose will maintain the American tradition of equality for all, regardless of race, color, or creed. It will guarantee equal opportunity for academic and professional training for all applicants qualified by preliminary education. Its scholastic attainments will be of the highest order. Its faculty will be worthy of such an institution. Its facilities will be commensurate with the needs of our student population.

Governor Dewey has appointed a committee to learn whether there is need for a State university. I fear that this committee will delay the creation of the university. There is nothing which needs be inquired into. The statistics on the number of students seeking admission to universities in this State are available. The proof of discriminatory practices of some universities is available. It is agreed by leading educators that a State university is the proper capstone to the structure of any sound educational system. The facts in the matter of creating a New York State university is self-demonstrating. Then why a committee to cause delay?

I recently wrote to the President of the American Medical Association requesting an investigation of the quota system in the medical schools of our State. I asked the AMA to support the creation of a New York State university. But I regret to say that a spokesman for the AMA has completely ignored the issues and bluntly declared—and I quote him—"it is of no concern to us whether an applicant does or does not belong to a minority group."

By its admitted lack of concern, I say that the American Medical Association is condoning the continuation of the quota system. The association is lending its name and its support to discrimination. It is encouraging a nasty manifestation of un-Americanism in our medical schools. The AMA is refusing to encourage equal educational opportunity for all who are qualified. The association refuses to admit that every man, woman, and child is entitled to all human rights and privileges and that no one shall be discriminated against in any field of endeavor because of race, color, or creed. The American Medical Association renders a substantial disservice to its distinguished membership by taking a position that the basic principles upon which this country was founded have evolved to include life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to some, not all. It is hardly befitting an association of doctors, men and women who serve humanity, to declare that it is not concerned with a cancerous ideology of discrimination and hurt to fellow man.

I appeal to the medical societies of New York City to take up the investigation which the American Medical Association has refused. Time does not permit me to dwell at the length I would like to on this subject.

But let me leave this thought for action with you. Write to Governor Dewey at Albany and request him to speed the work of the special investigating committee looking into the need for the establishment of a New York State university. Let that committee start its work at once so that it can report to the legislature on the first day of the next session in January. At that time my bill for a New York State university can be enacted into law in double quick time. The university could be established as the finest educational institution in the country, and it would be liberally supported by the people.

With your support—with your pressure in defense of a just cause—we will create a New York State university, with equality of opportunity for all.

Summary of Activities of the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRIS ELLSWORTH
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, early in the first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress Republican Members of the House of Representatives recognized the need for an independent study of basic national problems from a Republican point of view. Accordingly the House Republican floor leader, Hon JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., named two special Republican committees—a tax-study committee and a food-study committee. Representative DANIEL A. REED of New York was named chairman of the tax committee and Representative THOMAS A. JENKINS, of Ohio, chairman of the food study committee.

Whether or not this Republican action and the ensuing successful and worth-while conduct of these special Republican committees was responsible for its action, it is nevertheless worthy of note that the special joint committee, known as the La Follette-Monroney committee which studied legislative reorganization during the Seventy-ninth Congress, gave its approval to the idea of party committees for the purpose of developing the policies of the respective parties in Congress.

Although the principle of party committees was not adopted in the bill, the essential features of the special Republican committees which have been functioning for more than 3 years are nearly exactly those which the La Follette-Monroney committee sought to include in the congressional reorganization bill:

First. To provide party members in the House with accurate, up-to-date information in their specialized fields;

Second. To develop and crystallize party policy on important issues confronting the House.

Because food and food shortages have been such an important factor during the recent war years, the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee has been the more active of the two special Republican committees and has established such a unique record of achievement in its assigned field that it may well have set a legislative precedent which will bring about the reforms aimed at by the La Follette-Monroney committee without formal action by the Congress.

Since the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee was formed, Mr. Speaker, I have served as its secretary. It seems fitting and proper, therefore, that I should, during this last week of the Seventy-ninth Congress, make a general summary of the work of the committee as I have observed it over a period of more than 3 years.

UNIFIED FOOD CONTROL

For the past 2 years each successive revision of the Price Control Act and other war emergency laws has made some progress toward the sensible and logical idea of placing complete control of a unified national food program under one agency. Credit for the progress which has been made in this direction goes almost entirely to the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee.

When the committee was first organized more than 3 years ago, its initial statement was to point out the logical absurdity of a so-called food program in which responsibility for production, processing, rationing, pricing, allocations, and Government purchases were divided among a dozen different agencies. It pointed out then that if we were to have a real food program capable of meeting the needs of our own civilians, the armed forces, and the war-ravaged populations of other lands, it could be achieved only by placing the whole responsibility for all aspects of such a program under one competent agency.

A bill to establish such a program was introduced by Chairman JENKINS and approved by the House Committee on Agriculture. It encountered strenuous opposition from the executive branch of the Government, however, and was never brought to a vote in the House.

Since that time the committee has fought continuously for adoption of this principle. It made its first big gain in June 1945 when the bill to extend OPA for another year was before the House.

An amendment by Chairman JENKINS transferring all authority over food except the mechanical job of rationing from OPA to the Department of Agriculture was adopted by teller vote. Two days later the administration was able to rally enough strength to defeat the Jenkins amendment on a roll call, but was not able to defeat an amendment couched in less pointed terms but having virtually the same effect introduced by Representative AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, of Minnesota, also a member of the committee. This gave the Secretary of Agriculture veto power over all OPA regulations affecting food and, theoretically, for the first time placed responsibility for both production and distribution over this country's food supplies under one head.

By one device and another, however, the administration was able to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from exercising the policy-making powers of food pricing and distribution intended by this act.

In the latest revision of the price-control law, therefore, it was necessary to strengthen the provisions giving policy control over food prices to the Secretary of Agriculture and making OPA in that respect virtually nothing but an administrative agency to carry out the policies laid down by the Department of Agriculture.

WAR INDUSTRY STATUS

Along with centralized responsibility for food production, the committee insisted that food production should be given the status of a war industry and farmers provided with the tools, labor, and priorities necessary to do their job. This became formal Republican policy early in 1945 when it was adopted by the Republican conference in the House and was one of the first major objectives announced by Secretary Anderson when he took over the Department of Agriculture.

BEEF

Including in its membership several Republican Congressmen with intimate knowledge of the cattle industry, the committee in October 1943 warned of the developing squeeze on cattle feeders and predicted a serious meat shortage unless the situation were remedied. Administration leaders scoffed at the idea of a meat shortage with cattle more plentiful on the ranges than ever before, and it was not until the summer of 1945 that the outraged protests of a meat-hungry populace forced the Administration to take the action relieving the squeeze on cattle feeders which had been recommended by the Republican committee 2 years previously. In the meantime, the committee had shown the way by recommending a guaranteed price program for cattle feeders and payments which would provide an incentive for them to fatten cattle—the very policies which were belatedly adopted by the Administration.

Incidentally, in connection with the meat shortage, the committee scored one of its quickest and most outstanding victories. In the spring of 1945, the OPA, in an announced effort to drive cattle away from small local slaughterers and into the establishments of the big interstate slaughterers, established a quota on nonfederally inspected slaughterers which limited their kill to a percentage of their reported slaughter in 1944. This move had the effect of preventing local slaughterers from operating at anything near capacity, even though there was plenty of livestock available, but it did not appreciably increase the output of the larger packing houses.

The Republican committee immediately protested this arbitrary quota system and led the fight to eliminate quotas which culminated in adoption by Congress of an amendment to the Price Control Act prohibiting OPA from establishing any such quotas if slaughterers were certified by the Secretary of Agriculture as maintaining sanitary establishments. In spite of the new law, OPA succeeded in entangling the certifying procedure with so many qualifications and red tape that by the end of August—2 months after adoption of the amendment—only 138 out of the 16,000 local slaughterers in the country had been relieved of their quota limitations.

On September 4, 1945, the committee publicly disclosed this situation and charged OPA and the Department of Agriculture with openly thwarting the will of Congress. On September 5, representatives of the Department of Agriculture were called before an official House committee and asked to explain this situation. On September 6, OPA and agriculture officials went into a huddle on the matter and on September 8, the whole quota system was abolished, resulting almost immediately in a flood of beef into retail markets.

PORK

The committee's outstanding failure to date has been its lack of success in getting either congressional or administrative action to correct conditions which it believes are responsible for the tremendous reduction in production of pork. A major factor in the recent famine, and one of the chief reasons for the present scarcity of fats and oils, is the drop in hog production of the past 2 years. The reason for this, says the committee, is the crazy-quilt system of price ceilings on hogs and corn which has been established by OPA.

The ceiling price on corn varies from State to State and from county to county, being as much as 45 or 50 cents higher in some parts of the country than in others. The ceiling price on hogs, on the other hand, was almost uniform throughout the country, varying by only a few cents per hundred pounds to allow for transportation differentials. Since hogs eat chiefly corn, the committee pointed out that this would make hog raising relatively profitable in areas where corn was cheap but entirely unprofitable in areas where higher ceiling prices for corn prevailed. It opposed establishment of a Nation-wide uniform ceiling price for hogs at the time it was proposed by OPA and predicted then the terrific drop in hog production which has resulted.

REPORTS ON FOREIGN FOOD SITUATION

As early as 1943 the committee pointed out that tremendous and urgent foreign demands on our food supplies would surely be made and that in the interests of intelligent planning to meet those demands, the fullest and most accurate reports of foreign requirements should be available to our Government. Resolutions were introduced in the House by three members of the committee, Chairman JENKINS, Representative CANFIELD, of New Jersey, and by me, calling for reports to Congress from American representatives on the Combined Resources Board, the Combined Shipping Adjustment Board, and the Combined Raw Materials Board.

These resolutions were sidetracked by the administration. Until former President Hoover's recent report, no comprehensive reports of foreign food needs and supplies had ever been made and the lack of such information has been the most serious obstacle to the relief of distress and hunger abroad. Congressional opposition to appropriation of further money for UNRRA arose chiefly from the fact that no honest and reliable reports of foreign food supplies or of the disposition of our food shipments were available to Congress or to the American people.

CONSUMER FOOD SUBSIDIES

At the time they were proposed by the administration, the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee pointed out the fallacy of consumer subsidies on food. There are two kinds of food subsidies, it reported to its colleagues in the House. One is for the purpose of stimulating larger production; the other is simply to keep down the retail price to the consumer. The two have been constantly confused and misused, the committee charged. Most subsidies put into effect by the administration have been used primarily to keep down the retail price, and, rather than stimulating production, most of them have actually discouraged it. Payment of subsidies to keep down retail prices, the committee said, merely passes on to taxpayers of the future part of our national grocery bill at a time when the Nation was well able to pay its own grocery bills. These subsidies on dairy products, meat, and other food products are now recognized by the administration as one of its major wartime blunders and a serious handicap to orderly reconversion of the food industry.

MORE FOOD FOR WORKERS IN HEAVY INDUSTRIES

In November 1943 the committee first pointed out a fact that OPA refused to recognize until the summer of 1945—that workers in heavy industries, such as miners, steel workers, and lumbermen, required more meat and other substantial foods than those engaged in office work and lighter labor. It recommended at that time the adoption of a system of rationing which would provide more red points for those engaged in essential heavy industries. This policy was finally adopted in a half-hearted manner 2 years later by OPA, when it was too late to be of any assistance to higher production for war purposes.

POULTRY

As early as June 1943, after holding hearings in Boston, the committee warned of a developing poultry black market on the east coast. The administration refused to heed these warnings, and the result was a black market which for more than 2 years held the eastern seaboard in its grip, prevented ordinary householders from securing any poultry for food, throve on prices two or three times as high as the legal OPA ceilings, and created a national scandal.

SUGAR

In 1944, the committee warned that Government sugar policies were leading directly to decreased production and an impending sugar shortage. It recommended more realistic price policies with regard to Cuban and Puerto Rican production, the elimination of the consumer subsidy on sugar, and a return to American sugar-beet growers which would at least induce them to maintain their production of 1940. These warnings, too, went unheeded and the committee could do little more than say, "I told you so," when the sugar shortage descended on the country. Since then, the Department of Agriculture has followed the committee's recommendations in increasing the return to sugar-beet growers but it will be another year before the unnecessary scarcity of this vital food product can be remedied.

PARTY BOAT FISHING

Typical of many unpublicized activities of the committee is the case of gasoline for party boat fishermen. Along the seacoasts and larger lakes of our country thousands of boats normally operate during fishing seasons to carry fishermen out for a day's angling. These boats run on a regular schedule, carrying usually 30 to 40 persons per trip. The fish they catch go directly into home consumption and commercial channels and their catch is estimated by the Fish and Wildlife Service to be in the neighborhood of 200,000,000 pounds anually, equivalent to one-fifth of the fresh fish consumed in this country each year.

In spite of the Nation's urgent need for high-protein foods during the war, one of OPA's first acts when gas rationing started was to prohibit operators of party fishing boats from obtaining gasoline. Apparently unable to distinguish between the passenger who was fishing for fun, and the boat operator who was engaged in a food-producing operation, OPA refused to allocate gasoline for this purpose. For 2 years, the supplies of fresh fish which would have been available from this source were denied to consumers. Not until a subcommittee headed by Representative JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS of New Jersey conducted formal hearings and presented OPA with iron-bound proof of the high efficiency and value of this source of food supplies did OPA reverse its stand and issue gasoline to party boat fishermen.

UNRRA

Second only to its leadership in efforts to place control over the Nation's food program under the Secretary of Agriculture, was the leadership of the Food Study Committee in House action in 1945 on additional appropriations for UNRRA. After a careful study of UNRRA reports and activities, the committee issued a report urging immediate appropriation of funds necessary to complete the relief job in Europe, with adoption of safeguards which would assure food and other relief supplies reaching those for whom they were intended, and provide some acceptable accounting of UNRRA operations. This report became the basis of House action on UNRRA, with Food Committee members leading the fight for immediate appropriation of funds and for an amendment giving American newspaper correspondents the right to enter and report from countries receiving UNRRA assistance.

COFFEE

Not the least valuable of the committee's functions is that of keeping a watchful eye on activities of Government agencies and recommending action where action appears to be required. A recent example of this is in a report of the committee pointing out that our price policies on coffee were preventing a normal flow of coffee from South American countries to the United States and endangering our friendly relations with Latin-American countries, at the time when we should have been making every effort to implement those good relationships. Steps are finally being taken by the administration to correct this situation.

1946 FOOD SUPPLIES

Long before the administration came forward with its famine propaganda and its frantic efforts to conserve dwindling food supplies, the Republican Committee warned that food reserves in the country were reaching an all-time low. Our carry-over of many important food commodities is smaller this year than for many years. Canned goods, for example, will have a carry-over this year 51 percent smaller than in 1941. This means, the committee pointed out, that for the first time since the war started the United States must depend almost entirely on this year's crops for the food we expect to eat and to share with others next winter.

FARM MACHINERY

Early this year, the committee reiterated the plea it had voiced throughout the war—that farmers be given adequate quantities of machinery with which to accomplish their tremendous production tasks. In letters to Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach and Civilian Production Administrator Small, chairman Jenkins asked their cooperation in settling strikes in the farm machinery industry and securing priorities for machinery manufacturers. The committee has contended from the first that production of adequate supplies of farm machinery was an essential war job and that priorities for production of farm equipment should have been as high as those for the manufacture of munitions tools.

In spite of all warnings, however, farm machinery production is still far below the minimum required and recent reports indicate that in many States the lack of adequate machinery will seriously handicap food production this year.

FERTILIZER

With all-out farm production vitally necessary this year, every effort should have been made to provide farmers with all the fertilizer they could use. Several months ago the committee pointed out that this was not being done. Government-owned nitrogen plants capable of producing enough fertilizer to more than fulfill all our needs were closed on VJ-day. Considerable quantities of fertilizer have been shipped to Japan, Germany, and other countries. Three cotton and tobacco producing States in the Southeast have been allocated more fertilizer for 1946 than will go to 25 food-producing States in the Middle West and North.

All these moves by the administration have been protested vigorously by the committee, with the result that some Government nitrogen plants have been reopened and the acute fertilizer situation is being eased.

FOOD SECRECY

To the Republican committee goes the credit for ripping aside the veil of secrecy surrounding disposal of American food supplies which had been imposed by the administration during the war. The committee opposed unnecessary secrecy even during the war and succeeded in making available to the American public a number of reports on disposition of their food supplies which otherwise would have been kept secret by administration officials.

Even after the war was over, the Department of Agriculture food allocation schedules, which allocate every pound of food produced in the United States and designate its disposition to other countries, were kept secret from the public by continuing the allocation sheets as restricted documents.

After informal efforts of the committee to secure removal of the restricted classification had failed, the committee addressed a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture demanding the removal of this secrecy. The result is that now, for the first time since the war started, the American public is privileged to know in advance exactly what disposition the administration intends to make of its food supplies. Except for the watchfulness of this committee, it is fair to assume that this important information would have been kept secret indefinitely from the American public.

CONSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION

Thus far the committee's activities have been confined of necessity primarily to an effort to correct the worst features of the administration's wartime handling of food and to prevent complete breakdown of food production and distribution processes. With many of its own measures forced upon a reluctant administration, the committee is now turning its attention to the more constructive job of considering and suggesting legislation to improve the conditions under which food is produced, processed, and distributed.

The first product of the constructive phase of its program has already been enacted by Congress. This was a bill sponsored by the committee to bring about higher levels of nutrition, more economic methods of processing and distribution, and broader use of American food products, by establishing for the first time a national policy of focusing scientific skill and research on the distribution and marketing of food.

The bill sponsored by the committee was introduced in the House in March by Representative CLIFFORD R. HOPE, of Kansas, chairman of one of the subcommittees, and was promptly acted upon by the House Committee on Agriculture. Combined with another marketing measure, it was recently passed by both the House and Senate.

The significance of this measure is that it lays the foundation for a self-sustaining, prosperous agriculture and for the complete abandonment of the economy of scarcity theory. The Republican-sponsored legislation will reorganize the Department of Agriculture on the theory that intelligent application of scientific principles can result in profitable use of all the food this country is capable of producing and pave the way for a real economy of plenty in contrast to the subsidized economy of scarcity inaugurated by the New Deal.

LEGISLATIVE PRECEDENT

The outstanding success of the Republican congressional food study committee in its field of operations is unquestionably setting a legislative precedent. It is a practical demonstration of a new conception of legislative activity which, if adopted by both parties and carried out to its logical conclusion, can go far in solving many of the problems with which Congress is now beset and providing this country with a more up-to-date and efficient legislative body.

There appears to be no practical reason why both parties in Congress should not appoint their own fact-finding and policy-making committees—such as the Republican food-study and tax-study committees—assigned to the several broad fields of activity in which most congressional action is centered. There might be, for example, party committees working constantly on foreign policy, governmental expenditures and appropriations, business and financial legislation, veterans affairs, reclamation and conservation, and military and naval affairs.

Such committees would be able to keep their colleagues constantly informed of developments in these fields, would provide them with information which in most cases they would not have otherwise been able to obtain and—equally as important as any other function—would make for more clear-cut and decisive legislation by publicly announcing party policy on important issues and serving as the leaders and focal point of legislative action on such issues.

Following is the list of Republican Members of Congress who are members of the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee:

Thomas A. Jenkins, chairman, Ohio; James C. Auchincloss, treasurer, New Jersey; Harris Ellsworth, secretary, Oregon; Clifford R. Hope, Kansas; B. Carroll Reece, Tennessee; Charles A. Plumley, Vermont; Raymond S. Springer, Indiana; Sid Simpson, Illinois; Max Schwabe, Missouri; August H. Andresen, Minnesota; Reid F. Murray, Wisconsin; William S. Hill, Colorado; Chester E. Merrow, New Hampshire; Dean P. Taylor, New York; J. Roland Kinzer, Pennsylvania; J. Edgar Chenoweth, Colorado; Hal Holmes, Washington; Frank A. Barrett, Wyoming; Clare E. Hoffman, Michigan; Frank L. Sundstrom, New Jersey; Christian A. Herter, Massachusetts; Carl Hinshaw, California; Clifford P. Case, New Jersey; Howard E. Campbell, Pennsylvania; Ralph W. Gwinn, New York; Bartel J. Jonkman, Michigan; Francis Case, South Dakota; Gordon Canfield, New Jersey; Lawrence H. Smith, Wisconsin; Paul Cunningham, Iowa; Howard H. Buffett, Nebraska; John Phillips, California; Charles B. Hoeven, Iowa; Chester H. Gross, Pennsylvania; Gerald W. Landis, Indiana; P. W. Griffiths, Ohio; Walt Horan, Washington; Jack Z. Anderson, California; J. Glenn Beall, Maryland; Charles W. Vursell, Illinois; Robert Hale, Maine; Lowell Stockman, Oregon; Joseph C. Baldwin, New York; John W. Gwynne, Iowa.

Not One Sound Reason for Curtailment of Labor Department's Most Useful Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend my remarks, I am glad to include an editorial from the United Mine Workers Journal of August 1.

This editorial calls attention to the lack of interest of the Congress in appropriating such a small sum of money for the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor. This service has done a great deal of good in the matter of labor disputes, and it is generally conceded by all those familiar with labor-management problems that the strengthening of the Conciliation Service would aid considerably in the settling of labor disputes. It just proves again that, as far as appropriations are concerned, we think more of our pigs and cows in this country than we do of our people.

NOT ONE SOUND REASON FOR CURTAILMENT OF LABOR DEPARTMENT'S MOST USEFUL SERVICE

One year after Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach took office with promises to reorganize and expand the Labor Department, a revolutionary policy that means curtailment of its most useful services has been adopted.

This backward step was a ruling by Conciliation Director Edgar L. Warren that the Labor Department shall no longer bear the costs of arbitrators to settle disputes between labor and management. Heretofore, the expenses and fees of such arbitrators were borne by the Department.

Why the Labor Department should be the sole arm of government to start economizing is unexplained. It is especially difficult to understand when one compares costs of the Department that serves labor with the costs of the one that serves agriculture.

Current appropriations for the Agriculture Department run more than $827,000,000, of which $28,180,000 is for the Extension Service alone. In sharp contrast the Labor Department is receiving a total of $140,000,000, of which only $2,300,000 is for the Conciliation Service. Thus the farmer gets nearly eight times as much service as does the worker.

The proposal that county agents of the Agriculture Department should no longer be paid by the Government would unquestionably raise a storm of objections in farm circles and in Congress. Yet the similar Government service of arbitrators paid from the Federal pay roll is wiped out overnight.

It is strange also that the economy ax should hit the Conciliation Service when it was precisely this service that was singled out by the labor-management conference last winter as offering the best prospects of industrial peace. Expansion, not curtailment, was proposed by the labor and management conferees.

Organized labor, which the Labor Department was established to serve, just as Agriculture promotes the interests of farmers, and Commerce those of business, has complained for years about the anemic condition of the Labor Department's appropriations and services. It looked to Secretary Schwellenbach to make a vigorous effort to obtain more funds for a more effective service. Instead it sees the Department being shorn of even some of its present functions by Government reorganization plans and misguided economy mover.

In stating the new policy, Director Warren said that because the Conciliation Service cannot provide arbitrators in all cases, then it should not do so at all. If this is good logic, then the Conciliation Service might as well fold up and quit. Obviously it cannot settle all disputes that occur, but none has yet seriously suggested it stop doing what it can. It was left to Director Warren to contribute this gem of official thinking.

Warren also indulges in another upside down piece of thinking when, after admitting that arbitration has become widely accepted as the final step in grievance disputes, he proposes to discontinue the Department's contribution to what all observers of industrial relationships have regarded as a forward step. In other words, it has worked so well we better stop it.

While withdrawing the Government's financial aid to arbitration, Warren nevertheless undertakes to state the fees that arbitrators should receive. He fixes these at $50 to $100 a day, plus expenses. It would not require many arbitration cases at this rate to break most local unions. This fee is to be charged not only for the day or days of hearing the case, but also for each day spent by the arbitrator in connection with and writing a decision in the case. It will be nice work if you can get it.

The new policy, Warren hopes, will "act as a deterrent to 'passing the buck' to arbitrators by officials in the lower ranks of managements and unions." Instead of considering such action as "buck passing" one would think the director of the United States Conciliation Service would welcome being called in to settle a dispute, even the minor ones. It might give his conciliators some badly needed experience that they could draw on when the really difficult cases come up instead of having to "pass the buck" to the White House.

One other thing that Warren seems to have lost sight of is that the men who work under him are now paid by the tax dollars of industry and labor. The workingman gets little enough for his tax dollar now. Taking away one of the important functions of the Arbitration Division will not mean a saving in taxes, but only that the money will be spent for some less useful purpose.

To make America safe for large fees for arbitrators Warren even presumes to tell labor and management what kind of arbitration clauses they can write into their contracts. He declares:

"Where presently existing contract provisions specifically call for the appointment of arbitrators by the Service without cost to the parties, such provisions will be honored by the Arbitration Division upon request of the parties for the life of the present agreement only, not including renewals thereof. It is expected that in the renewal of such contracts the parties will negotiate an arbitration clause in the ligh of the Service's new policy."

Uncovering Truths

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the August edition of Midwestern Bulletin, of Minneapolis, Minn., entitled "Uncovering Truths," by Dr. Eduard Rothkirch:

UNCOVERING TRUTHS

(By Dr. Eduard Rothkirch)

"Ye shall know the truth." John 8: 32.

The war in Europe has been over for more than a year. The propaganda mills are stilled and the war drums are muffled and the truth of much of the war propaganda is slowly beginning to lift its head from among the sordid debris of war. Today, we Americans who as a Nation have long been considered to be the champion of justice and truth in a world of power politics, petty hatreds, jealousy, and distorted propaganda, now can look a bit more dispassionately upon some of the material which was circulated.

Much evidence has come to light which confirms the tyranny of national socialism but in uncovering the brutalities practiced we are also bringing to light the untruths spread in order to incite the zeal of war. For example, in March and April of 1945, the papers of America carried the reports of Nazi horror camps and in the course of reporting these stories many distorted facts crept into these news releases and the impression was given that our soldiers who were caught and imprisoned by the Germans were interned in the political prisoner camps that existed for years before the European war and were started when the Gestapo was established by Hitler. An official congressional committee was appointed to investigate these concentration camps and found that no American prisoners of war had been imprisoned in these camps and that as a whole the treatment of American prisoners of war was in conformity with the rules of the Geneva Convention, that the mistreatment of a few American prisoners in POW camps was the exception rather than the rule. I quote from the "Prisoners of War Bulletin" of June 1945, issued by the American Red Cross:

"Much anxiety appears to have been caused in the United States by the lack of understanding of the difference between concentration camps and prisoner of war camps. The latter, so far as American and other allied prisoners of war (except Soviet Russian) were concerned, enjoyed the protection of the Geneva Convention. In spite of all their efforts, Swiss delegates of the International Red Cross were not permitted to visit the concentration camps for German and other European political prisoners and slave laborers. But they regularly visited prisoner of war camps.

"The disclosures recently made of conditions which existed for years in German political concentration camps have outraged civilized opinion throughout the world. Whatever shortcomings the Geneva Convention may have, it at least helped to place our prisoners of war and civilian internees on a different footing from political prisoners and slave laborers, who perished by thousands in camps which neutral inspectors were never permitted to visit.

"Outside of normal human mortality for the long years or months spent in Germany, over 99 percent of our American prisoners will return to their families in this country."

I also quote from a written reply by Mr. A. Henderson, Financial Secretary to the British War Office, to a question in the House of Commons on April 27, 1945:

"We have no information whatever to suggest that the prisoners of war camps were in any way to be compared with the appalling conditions prevailing in the concentration camps for German political prisoners such as Buchenwald."

This is the first of a series of articles which I shall write from time to time uncovering truths that are brought to light from responsible sources which require a revaluation of some of the stories born of war hysteria.

Good News for Puerto Rico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONIO M. FERNANDEZ
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein an editorial appearing in the Washington Evening Star of July 30, 1946, with respect to the appointment of our colleague, Mr. PIÑERO, as Governor of Puerto Rico. I am sure this editorial reflects the sentiments of the membership of this House toward Mr. PIÑERO, whom we all love and respect for his ability, his sincerity, and his devotion to the people of Puerto Rico:

GOOD NEWS FOR PUERTO RICO

President Truman has acted wisely in nominating JESÚS T. PIÑERO to be Governor of Puerto Rico, a post that has been vacant since Rexford G. Tugwell's resignation became effective on June 30. Assuming that the Senate confirms it—which certainly ought to be the case—the appointment will be unique in that it will turn over the office to a native for the first time since the island was brought under American rule almost a half century ago.

For the past year and a half Mr. Piñero has lived in Washington as Puerto Rico's Resident Commissioner in Congress, and all who have come to know him have been impressed by his sincerity and his capabilities. Leader of the Popular Democratic Party, which is dominant in the island, he has served his people well for a long time, not only in the United States but as a member of the insular house of representatives. It is a measure of his countrymen's confidence in him that a recent special session of the Puerto Rican Legislature, by an almost unanimous vote, petitioned President Truman to name him as Mr. Tugwell's successor.

There can be no doubt that the President's affirmative response will be greeted with widespread pleasure throughout the island. Few men know as much about Puerto Rico's problems and aspirations as Mr. Piñero, and since his party is a controlling political force, his tenure should be marked by a happy relationship between the legislature and the governorship. In any case, Puerto Ricans in general will read into his appointment an encouraging confirmation of our resolve to help them achieve a greater and greater measure of self-rule; nor can that fact fail to reflect creditably on us throughout Latin America.

Puerto Rico, of course, is one of the most densely populated countries in the world and it has numerous economic difficulties to overcome. Given our help, however, it can cope with these and achieve what it ardently and rightly seeks—a bright new status either as an independent land, one of our States, or an autonomous dominion closely linked with us. By naming Mr. Piñero, President Truman has offered them particularly reassuring evidence of our sincerity and good will in supporting their aspirations to that end.

General Spaatz Addresses Paterson Air Power Club and the Nation on Thirty-ninth Anniversary of the AAF

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have seen the Army Air Forces in action during the war and I have seen the effectiveness of its work in many theaters of operations.

When I was at SHAEF (Supreme Headquarters of the Allied Expeditionary Forces) near London shortly after D-day in June 1944, I feared the robot bombs, then being fired from the Continent, were going to erase SHAEF. I was consternated when I saw the bomb damage wrought close to the quarters occupied by Lt. Gen. Carl S. Spaatz, now Commanding General of the Army Air Forces. I feared the war had taken a turn for the worse. But "Tooey" Spaatz didn't think so. He and his boys of the AAF were raising hell with the enemy, paving the way for the victorious march or our armies into the Reich.

This afternoon, the thirty-ninth birthday of the Army Air Forces, I had the happy privilege of introducing General Spaatz in a radio address at a luncheon at Teterboro, N. J., sponsored by the Paterson Air Power Club. Approximately 1,000 members and friends of the AAF heard the general plead for a single department of national defense, laud the Air Force as the strongest insurance against war, and envision a Nation on wings dedicated to peace.

The general's speech in full follows:

I. THE WARTIME AIR FORCE IN BEING

One year ago today we had a wartime air force in being, at the peak of its strength.

In 1940 it did not exist. There was, of course, a small nucleus of professional personnel. The equipment for modern war was mostly in the dream stage on the drafting board. Then came the shock of Pearl Harbor. The country galvanized to action. We began to build the wartime air force, almost from scratch.

Thanks to the resistance maintained by our gallant allies we had 2½ years to forge new and decisive weapons. We had time also to train our huge, but raw, manpower as pilots, navigators, gunners, and technicians of all sorts. The acquired skill of these newly trained air and ground crews determined the high incidence of our ultimate combat efficiency. By the spring of 1944 we had nearly 80,000 aircraft on hand, of which half were on combat assignment. Our total personnel was two and one-third millions. That was an air force in being, engaged in all-out assault, in all theaters of the war.

The over-all purpose of that wartime air force was to shorten the war. Its strategic objective, which became possible for the first time in history, was to reach over the surface line of war, and to paralyze the enemy's war effort at the heart. That meant to destroy his vital industries, transport systems, and oil supplies, thus to force his collapse.

As a preliminary to the main objective it was necessary to nullify the enemy's air force, to win and maintain control of the air over his territory. In Europe it was also necessary to parallel the strategic destruction with tactical operations, to prepare for the invasion, and then to isolate the battlefields. In Japan, however, the circumstances permitted full execution of the strategic concept of air war from bases acquired by the efforts of all three armed services. A surface invasion of Japan was not necessary to force capitulation. We were thereby spared heavy casualties, estimated anywhere up to half a million.

In the final reckoning it must be recorded that victory was not won by any one armed service alone, nor by any one nation. All services, according to their specialized mediums, and all the Allies, contributed their shares.

The peculiar role of air power was to introduce a new element in warfare—the long reach which forced both Germany and Japan to collapse from within. Strategic air power unloosed an unprecedented power of mass destruction, with political and economic consequences yet to be determined. That power is magnified with every new advance in technical equipment. Air power also brings into new significance the old element of surprise. This enormous increase in the power to destroy, coupled with the alteration of the timetable of hostilities and the extension of the reach, fundamentally change the concept of war. Air power will likewise provide the incentive and means for peace.

By shortening the war, and by contributing its full measure of effort to the victory, the wartime air force met its responsibility to the American people. It tested in battle the most advanced instruments devised by American genius, and thus represented the American people in man's surge upward and outward to conquer the air. It fulfilled its war mission.

II. INTERIM PERIOD—AN AIR FORCE IN MEMORY

Then ensued an interim period. The collapse of Japan seemed to be a signal for frenzied demobilization. The wartime Air Force dissolved before our eyes. The greater part of our trained technicians departed. Much of our war equipment passed into obsolescence. The vast and intricate body of organized skill and instruments, called an Air Force in being, became an Air Force in memory.

The period of transition is almost over. Many of our technicians have returned to us on the voluntary basis. We now look forward to a peacetime, professional Air Force as worthy of America as was the Air Force of victory in the war.

III. THE PEACETIME AIR FORCE

We believe it is the will of the American people to have an Air Force in being. After Pearl Harbor we had time to build our striking force. That time lag is gone forever. We must be constantly on the alert in peace as in war. Our plans call for 70 groups and 400,000 officers and men, an Air Force kept up to the split second of scientific development and operating efficiency.

We believe it is the will of the American people that their Air Force shall have coequal status with the other services under a unified command. To that end we favor a single department of national defense, as recommended to the Congress by the President.

We believe that an Air Force in being is the strongest insurance against recurrence of war, and that the long reach of air power provides a new means to preserve world peace as directed by the United Nations.

Finally we believe that the pioneering spirit and industrial genius of the American people make them the true air people of history, destined to wield the scepter of air power in the new age.

All Americans may show pride on Army Air Force Day. On this day we look to the future. We see a nation on wings dedicated to peace.

Record of Jack Dempsey as Governor of New Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call the attention of the House to the article appearing in a recent issue of the Roswell (N. Mex.) Daily Record.

The article deals with the excellent administration of our former colleague in the House, Hon. Jack Dempsey, who is completing his term as Governor of New Mexico on December 31 of this year.

The article is as follows:

BELIEVE DEMPSEY'S BUSINESS RECORD IN GOVERNORSHIP TO AID DEMOCRATS IN FALL

(By Thomas G. Summers)

When John J. Dempsey was running for Governor of New Mexico in the summer and fall of 1942, he told the people that he would give them a sound, economical business administration.

He will step out of the governor's office on December 31, and it is apparent from the record that this statement was no mere political promise.

Due to the policies which have been carried out these past 3½ years the State finances are in the best condition in history, funds are available for needed improvements, and schooling of war veterans is going forward better than would have been possible had administrative savings not been made by the State's chief executive.

In round figures, Governor Dempsey has saved the people of the State more than $2,000,000 in the cost of collecting taxes and administering the various departments of the State government.

To understand what is meant by savings it is necessary to understand that in setting up the various taxes and bureaus, the State legislature allowed a certain percent of department income to be used for collections and administering the departments.

Historically, any department generally uses up all the money the legislature allowed it for administrative purposes.

Thus the school tax division is allowed to use up to 5 percent and the compensating tax division is allowed to use up to 10 percent of their collections in administration of the department.

On June 30, 1942, the end of the last fiscal year before Dempsey took over, the balance in these departments available for administrative cost stood at zero—the full amount authorized had been spent in salaries and other costs.

On June 30 of this year there was $236,-5'8.25 left in the school tax fund available for administrative costs and $36,594.80 was left in the compensating tax fund for the same purpose.

In like manner, out of funds which could have been spent for administrative costs of the various departments, this year there remained $3,528.77 in the severance tax fund, $92,314.66 in the gasoline-tax fund, $47,116.10 in the motor-vehicle-tax fund, $2,400 in the driver's-license fund, $81,616.90 in the income-tax fund, and $33,665.95 in the liquor-tax fund. An additional $3,500 which could have been paid for a commissioner was not spent.

As a result of this, a total of $537,255.43 was transferred from the administrative division of the State government and went into the specially created postwar planning fund, which the State legislature had approved for needed projects in the postwar period.

In order to draw the full comparison of Dempsey's economy with previous political practice it may be noted that on June 30, 1942, before Dempsey took over, the amount left from all these funds was $72.38, this representing an unexpended balance in the severance-tax division, which could have been spent for administrative costs under the law.

At the time Dempsey's savings were being made the work in the various departments had not decreased. In fact it had increased. Collections in the school-tax division increased 88.83 percent—from $4,664,318.45 for the year ended June 30, 1942, to $8,807,828.72 for the year ending June 30, 1946. Gasoline-tax income had gone up 21.28—from $5,617,767.25 to $6,813,382.47, and the total collections for all departments of the State government had gone up 50.98 percent, from $15,636,137.37 to $23,607,674.72.

In the absence of more precise data concerning actual cost of running the departments it might be argued that the larger income allowed larger expenditures and that Dempsey could have still added pay roll and yet have turned back money from his administrative funds.

Such, however, was not the case. The Governor increased the individual salaries of the people working for the government about 30 percent, absorbed the cost of handling the large increases of collections, and yet the financial record shows that the cost of collections for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1946 was $141,025.76 less than the cost of collections for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942. The average collection cost dropped from 5.23 percent to 2.87 percent.

At the present moment the state auditor reports in round figures a balance of $1,888,000 in this postwar fund, and advances of $133,000 which has been made from it to the various colleges of the State—more than $2,000,000 made available to the government because of Dempsey's economies.

Of the money which has been advanced to colleges $30,000 has gone to the State Teachers College at Silver City, $32,000 to eastern New Mexico State College at Portales, $25,000 to New Mexico University at Albuquerque, $40,000 to New Mexico State Agricultural college at Las Cruces, and $6,803.84 to the School of Mines at Socorro.

This money has been spent for the most part for facilities of one kind or another to allow veterans to take advantage of college training under the GI bill of rights. One of the most serious problems in most of the colleges has been the matter of housing for the veterans and a steady stream of requests for help on this has come in to the Governor's office from the various State institutions.

Aside from the $133,000 which has gone to the colleges, there remains still in the treasury $1,888,000 available for whatever purpose the people of New Mexico think is most pressing in the postwar period.

Another indication of Dempsey's desire to maintain the State on a business basis has been the problem of State debentures for building of roads.

When he took office on January 1, 1943, there were $22,250,000 in debentures on the books, owed by the State, and the annual interest on these debentures was costing the State the sum of $671,500 per year.

During his term of office Dempsey has steadfastly stood against the issuing of new debentures and the books on December 31, 1946, when he leaves office will show that these debentures have been retired in such a manner that only $16,686,000 will be outstanding, and that the interest rate will have dropped to $509,352.50 per year.

The first of these debentures was issued under Governor Dillon in 1927, when $2,500,000 were issued, and in 1929 when $5,600,000 were issued.

In the Seligman-Hockenhull administration $2,000,000 were issued in 1931, and $2,000,000 in 1933. In 1935 Governor Tingley issued $3,000,000, and then in 1937 hit the all-time high with $10,000,000. Governor Miles issued $6,000,000 in 1939 and $3,000,000 in 1941.

Since the issuing of debentures began, Dempsey is the first governor to say, "it is time to stop—let's catch up with our debt."

What has Governor Dempsey gained by this type of administration?

Obviously he did not gain the United States Senate, since the voters decided against him in the primaries. But by this type of administration he retained his self-respect as an official and as a businessman.

Men close to him are pointing to the record of savings he has made and the business administration he has given the State, and to the vote in the primary. They are saying that the people simply do not care—they will not protect the man who dares give them the type of governmen they ask for.

But that is not Dempsey's reaction at all. It is these very economies and business practices which crossed him up with many of the politicians of the State, some big and some small. They helped defeat him in the primaries.

"I have had many opportunities to patch things up with a lot of these fellows," Dempsey said, "but I have not been willing to run the government the way they wanted it run. I was not that interested in becoming United States Senator."

Nevertheless, it is the Dempsey record in office which will stand the Democrats in best stead this fall when they go before the people to ask a continuance of the Democratic Party in power at Santa Fe.

They will be able to and will point to a sound, businesslike administration, as proof of the party's qualification for staying in power. As one man on the ticket, who fought him in the primaries, recently said, "Dempsey's record is a good record. He made no administrative mistakes."

ATA and Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, more than 25,000 employees of the scheduled air lines of the United States are veterans of World War II, according to the Air Transport Association of America.

The veterans, representing nearly one-third of total airline employment within the United States, are working in a variety of jobs, including flight and ground operations, sales, and adminisrative positions.

While a considerable number of the air lines' war-veteran employees are men and women who left the lines to serve with the armed forces and have returned to their old jobs, a much larger number are new employees hired under the policy adopted by the air lines to give every possible preference to hiring service men and women.

The veterans' employment program of the air lines includes courses of instruction in flight and ground operations, communications, maintenance, and general administrative work.

There also have been several courses designed for the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped. One company reports that it can use regularly as many as 1,000 veterans with amputations.

In addition to the veterans employed by the air lines of the United States, ATA member air lines operating in Alaska, Canada, and the Caribbean area employ an additional 1,900 World War II veterans, today's report shows.

Congress on the Air

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. GEELAN
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. GEELAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert the following address I made over the air last evening in the program entitled "Congress on the Air":

Both the long-range objective and what I believe to be the immediate need is a better understanding between labor and management or employee and employer. I say long range because, unfortunately, I do not think this highly desirable and very necessary objective which, while it should be striven for immediately, will soon be accomplished. This is, of course, extremely unfortunate and I regret being forced to admit it.

An understanding on the part of labor of the problems confronting management and a similar understanding on the part of management on the problems confronting labor plus a sympathetic attitude and a strong determination to overcome these difficulties to the mutual benefit of both is a must if we are to realize the objective of fair treatment of employees by employers and a compensating honest day's work for employers by the workers.

Realizing the necessity for the attainment of that goal, some weeks ago I made a motion at a meeting of the Committee on Labor of the House that a subcommittee be appointed who would hear all interested parties as to their views on the cause of industrial unrest. I felt that in order to get to the bottom of the trouble, these charges which had been made by full page advertisements, by various columnists, and also by radio commentators to the effect that labor had an unfair advantage over the employer by reason of one-sided partial legislation, that labor was not responsible for its acts, and kindred charges, that this committee should be appointed to make a thorough investigation into them to ascertain the truth and, if found to be correct, make recommendations for changes.

This motion was unanimously adopted and hearings have been held at which Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, appeared and gave his version of the situation. Both the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Chamber of Commerce were also invited. The National Chamber of Commerce stated they would be unable to send a representative inasmuch as their president was ill and therefore could not attend. After four communications to the National Association of Manufacturers, they still refused to appear. This is why I state that the highly desirable and very necessary objective of harmonious industrial relationships between employer and employee is not going to be attained in the very near future because the cooperation necessary is evidently lacking on the part of those who charge that the present laws are unfair and are evidently pursuing a course to obtain satisfaction by passing what labor feels is harmful, restrictive, and unfair legislation.

I am sure all fair-minded people will agree that before a solution to this problem can be arrived at, that a full open discussion of all the charges as to why our present system of labor relations is not working out as satisfactorily as it might, should, and must be had.

Red Cross Reports on Austria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the people of Austria were victims of Nazi tyranny the rehabilitation of that stricken country is of special interest to the people of the United States and under leave to extend my remarks I include the following report of conditions in Austria which was submitted by the International Red Cross to the Central European Rehabilitation Association, of Minneapolis, Minn.

1. GENERAL REMARKS

During the last few months, the situation in Austria has been getting worse. Domestic supplies were not sufficient to feed the population and the imports of UNRRA arrived only in limited quantities. Already before the war Austria had to import food; an average of approximately 30 percent of its imports consisted of foodstuffs, of which the greater part were wheat and fats.

The quantities of foodstuffs imported into Austria by means of barter transactions are extremely limited. This is due on the one hand to the very small volume of the trade with foreign countries; on the other to the fact that Austria itself can only deliver small quantities of manufactured articles owing to the lack of raw materials and especially of coal.

Thus it is obvious that Austria cannot at the moment subsist without help from outside.

2. POPULATION

Before the war, Austria had 6,711,000 inhabitants, a third of whom lived in the larger towns like Vienna, Graz, and Linz. The natural increase of the population and the losses due to the war have largely balanced each other so that at present the country has some 6,500,000 inhabitants. The number of those living in towns has diminished in favor of those inhabiting the country districts. Whereas, before the war, Vienna had a population of 1,800,000, according to ration card statistics it only housed 1,600,000 in June 1946. The population of the large towns now represents a quarter of the total.

There exist at the moment some 1,500,000 children in Austria, of whom 20 percent live in Vienna. The infant mortality figure of 6.3 percent in 1943 has risen to an average of 19 percent during 1944; in certain areas and within the refugee camps it has even reached 27 percent.

Thanks to the distributions by UNRRA, some 91,000 children between 6 and 18 have received every day a supplementary meal; for many of them it was their only one (some 38,000 such children do not receive any additional food at all). In spite of this help—coming mostly from private charitable institutions and international relief organizations—it is estimated that half of the children of Vienna are underfed.

The food situation of children in lower Austria is particularly bad, as the supply of milk is entirely insufficient owing to the large decrease in livestock.

3. FOOD SITUATION

The food ration in Austria is approximately 1,200 calories per person per day. There are naturally differences between the towns, the country districts, and the isolated areas. The situation, however, is at its worst in Vienna and lower Austria.

In June 1946 the daily distribution was only 300 grams of bread, 30 grams of fats, 30 grams of powdered eggs, and 100 grams of pulses. The supply of bread could only be maintained because the American authorities released wheat from Army stocks. It is known that in June 1946 Austria could only supply, by its own means, a daily ration equal to 230 calories.

In lower Austria cattle has diminished by 70 percent, and pigs by 90 percent, so that the rest of the country has been obliged, to some extent, to provide for this area.

In Styria, the Vorariberg, and the Tyrol the situation is the least satisfactory, Vienna excepted. It is better in Carinthia, Salzburg, and the Alpin regions, these being agricultural areas and the occupying armies not being obliged to live on the country. Even here, however, the daily ration does not exceed 1,200 calories.

The harvest, very poor as it was in 1945—in lower Austria it only reached 15 percent of an average pre-War I—is more promising this year. It must, however, not be expected that Austria will be able to produce itself the necessary supplies.

4. CLOTHING AND FOOTWEAR

The clothing situation is bad, particularly among the population of bombed towns; warm clothing, blankets and footwear are lacking most of all. In this matter the refugees are particularly unfavored; they arrived in Austria with few clothes, already in poor condition. New footwear and clothing are not available on the market. Shoe factories have partly resumed work, yet in June 1946 they were only able to supply the quantities necessary to the occupation forces.

There is also a shortage of leather for repairs, and of thread and darning wool for the upkeep of clothes.

5. HOUSING

Several industrial towns of lower Austria, as well as Vienna and a few towns situated near railway junctions, have suffered great damage from bombing; this applies particularly to Wiener-Neustadt. Fifty percent of all houses in the latter are estimated to be destroyed. Twenty-five percent of all buildings in Vienna are out of use or badly damaged. Of those of Innsbruck 77 percent have been hit; the majority of them however has only suffered slight damage and is repairable. A few smaller towns in the Brenner region have also suffered much damage.

The housing shortage was already heavy in pre-war Austria; official figures published at the time showed that Vienna was short some 200,000 flats. The decrease in living space is therefore greatly felt.

6. COAL AND INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION

Before the war, coal imports amounted to 3,400,000 tons yearly. The country itself met 7 percent of its own demand, by a yearly production of 230,000 tons. Domestic output has meantime greatly diminished; it is now estimated at 20 percent of the prewar figure. Pits of extremely low productivity have even been reopened. This output can only satisfy an insignificant part of the country's needs.

During the winter 1945 Vienna has received 460,000 tons of coal, whereas the normal industrial activity of a town of its importance required three times that amount.

Lately arrangements have been made with Poland and Czechoslovakia to obtain coal by a system of barter.

Industrial production has declined sharply. The principal causes of this are precisely the shortage of coal and the fact that Austrian industrial plants largely depend on imported raw materials. Moreover, a large number of German concerns in Austria have to be surrendered as reparations. Austria thus looses an important part of its heavy industry, necessary though it be to the resumption of normal industrial production.

7. TRANSPORTS

Railway traffic has been reestablished on all lines, but rolling stock and transport conditions are so defective that the supply of food to the towns is continually hindered. The impression remains that an important part of the rolling stock is being kept in the western half of the country. Moreover, the stock available in the eastern half has been reduced by deductions made on account of reparations.

There are still but few motor vehicles on the road, compared with the prewar period.

The shipping traffic on the Danube has been reestablished between the Russian zone and Czechoslovakia. There are as yet no communications between the various zones. The larger part of the Danube fleet is anchored in the American zone.

8. HYGIENE

Health conditions in Austria are very poor. Tuberculosis and venereal diseases are spreading. The supply of medicines, particularly that of sulfa drugs, is insufficient. Hospitals of large towns have been able to meet the most urgent needs, thanks to foreign relief organizations, but chemists lack almost everything.

CONCLUSION

The situation of Austria seems particularly difficult; since the country is dependent on foreign trade which is now held in narrow limits.

The country as a whole suffers from hunger, Vienna and lower Austria being least favored.

Relief is needed in the form of large food imports to enable the country to meet its most crying needs.

Despatches, even in small quantities of medicines, clothing, children's footwear, sewing requisites, and shoe leather for repairs, would save the lives of thousands of children and adults.

Resolution of Italian-American World War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. GEELAN
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1946

Mr. GEELAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the following resolution adopted by the various posts of the Department of Connecticut, of the Italian-American World War Veterans of the United States, Inc.:

RESOLUTION OF STATE DEPARTMENT OF CONNECTICUT, ITALIAN-AMERICAN WORLD WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES, INC.

Whereas this organization consists of Americans of Italian extraction who have served in the armed forces of the United States of America in both of the recent world wars; and

Whereas more than 10,000,000 Americans of Italian extraction are an integral part of the United States of America, having contributed in its historic birth and development; and

Whereas it is our concern that peace, good will, and justice be promoted among nations, based upon the ideals of America's conception of the "four freedoms" and the Atlantic Charter, and not on power politics, for which we have sacrificed at great cost of lives and deprivations: Now, therefore, we the delegates of the various posts of the Department of Connecticut, of the Italian-American World War Veterans of the United States, Inc., in convention assembled on the 28th day of July A. D. 1946 at the Hotel Garde in New Haven, Conn., hereby solemnly

Resolve, That the Honorable President of the United States of America and the Honorable Senators and Congressmen from the State of Connecticut be and are hereby requested to lend their utmost support to adhere to the desire of Americans of Italian descent, and to grant Italy a peace which will insure her a position of honor among nations, in accordance with the promises made her, commensurate with the sacrifices of Americans of Italian descent and in accordance with the promises made to us.

Attest:

ANTHONY IANNOTTI,
State Commander.

Dated at New Haven, Conn., the 28th day of July 1946.

Keep Bomb Secret Now, Editor Urges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 24, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the following is the seventeenth in a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is called a Trip Through Hell, and depicts Mr. Bellamy's impressions of Europe as it appeared early in the spring of the year:

We have now completed our trip through hell and returned to God's country. It is time to sum up.

I am writing this article in the peace and calm of my own home on the shore of Lake Erie. The breeze is dimpling the waters of the lake and the sun shines on it like gold. It is the loveliest time of the spring. The crabapple blossoms are pink and the air is full of bird songs. Occasionally a redbird darts through the green foliage.

And yet there is a weight in my mind and on my heart which seems strangely out of keeping with the beauty of the scene. The ache comes from the memory of the ruin and destruction I witnessed, the stench of the dead, the sight of homeless, hunted people, and the general hopelessness of central Europe.

While I have been writing these articles my mind has been struggling with ultimate conclusions. I have had time, I think, to work some out. They are my own, and I do not ask you to agree with them, unless I have shown you facts which convince you that I am right.

My most deep-seated conviction is that it is nothing less than my obligation to be a flaming evangel the rest of my life to preach America's duty to the rest of the world. We cannot, like the Pharisees and Saduccees, pass by on the other side, because there is no other side. We cannot live in an ivory tower, because that tower is made of paper.

We are full partners, under God, in the greatest experiment man has ever undertaken, namely, that of guaranteeing peace to the world. I am not too sure of the motives of all our partners in this endeavor, particularly Russia, but I hope that we shall have patience and fortitude to bear with her examples of bad manners so long as they do not disturb the peace, and to deal firmly with anyone who does.

This is an awful responsibility. But we can't wash our hands of it, or, like Cain, ask: "Am I my brother's keeper?" We are our brother's keeper.

And so I should like to restate my faith, which is pretty much the same faith that I started out with in the first article of this series.

1. I believe that America has committed herself solemnly and sacredly to go through with the job this time and that there can be no turning back with honor to ourselves or profit either to ourselves or to the world.

2. I believe the most tragic event in all history, up to the start of the Second World War, of which it was a primary cause, was the wrong turning taken at the fork of the road by America when we ran out on the League of Nations. God grant we do not commit a similar error this time.

3. I believe the Army of the United States is doing a fine and effective job in a well-nigh impossible situation.

4. I believe the Army has been dismantled altogether too fast and that the present recommendations for its size recently sent to Congress by President Truman are inadequate.

PEACE TREATY NEEDED

5. I believe that Germany can never be handled properly under the quadripartite set-up which now prevails, whereby the country is divided into four zones—American, British, French, and Russian—and that the sooner a peace treaty is written which really settles boundaries and assigns responsibilities to the various victorious nations, the sooner we shall get on with the job.

6. I believe there are ruinous conflicts in the Potsdam Declaration and later orders governing the operation of the occupying forces in Germany and that until these conflicts are straightened out there can be no constructive effort toward a permanent solution of the German problem.

7. I believe that, with certain shining exceptions, the Germans as a whole are entirely unrepentant.

8. I believe that the active Nazis, those who are not executed, will have to be incarcerated for the rest of their lives, and this will be a long job, because many of them are still in their late teens.

THE FOOD PROBLEM

9. I believe that we must move on and solve the food problem of Europe or that we shall drive all the central portion of that continent into the hands of the Communists.

10. I believe that the Russian problem is paramount in Europe. Everything that we do there is measured by its effect on the ever-present Russian influence in Europe. The Russians are not cooperating with the other occupying powers but are running their own show blithely and confidently and sometimes in an openly insulting manner. My hope is that we shall develop firmness along with patience, because another war at this time would be fatal to western civilization, as also would be the absorption of all central Europe into the Soviet Republics. It is a job calling for rare judgment.

11. I firmly believe that the President of the United States has not supplied this country with the leadership which it should have in solving the German problem. I do not entirely acquit Congress, either, of failure in this regard. I am rather resentful that we have tossed into the maelstrom of Europe some of our best blood and brains in a military and political way, and not given them sufficient backing in Washington, either in money and men or in general instructions as to the kind of peace America really wants enforced on the Germans.

Much as I admire Walter Lippmann and value him as a Plain Dealer columnist, I do not agree with the nicely buttoned-up theory he has about the present situation in Germany. According to him, one would believe that the Russians and the British are furiously outbidding each other for the support of the German people in the next war, which he assumes will be between Russia, on the one hand, and Britain and the United States, on the other. In the first place, it is my observation that Germany will not be in a position to wage war again for a great many years and that, although she has a huge reserve of manpower, there can be no such thing as an integrated Germany army, as far as I can see.

It is only natural to suppose that all four of the victorious powers are doing what they can, along with denazification, to commend their methods and their ideas to the Germans, but the thought of any attempt to line them up sentimentally now for one or another power, while the punitive aspect of the occupation is still in full blast, stretches my credulity to the breaking point.

There is no doubt, however, that the Russians and the British are playing for keeps. Being Old World powers, that is the only way they know.

Britain is fighting to maintain her place in the world. This requires her to be intensely concerned in the future of Europe. She feels that Germany must never be in a position to invade her again. This, in turn, makes the disposition of the Ruhr tremendously important. Furthermore, Britain feels that if Russia gets a port on the Mediterranean her life line is menaced. Therefore, she must maintain a stiff attitude at Trieste.

Britain is also aware of Russian influence on the Middle and the Far East, on Islam, on China, and, in fact, all along the far-flung British frontiers.

Russia, for her part, as I have already stated, is, according to all evidence available, intending to extend her sphere of influence wherever she can, most obviously in the Balkans, but also in Germany, the Middle East and the Far East.
